The melody built to a triumphant anthem of major cadences. There were several breaks scattered throughout the tune, catching the audience off guard each time, bringing the music down with a swing or funky beat, sometimes accompanied by an atonal piano solo. Every time King reached a percussion climax, he would hit a cymbal and stand up briefly, as if the inertia of the drumstick in his hand had carried him out of his seat. The song ended with a crescendo of cymbals followed by King scraping the metal wires underneath his snare for a quiet, scratchy, tinny sound.

The Bad Plus played another new, jazz-fusion and progressive-rock influenced song before breaking out its classic "And Here We Test Our Powers Of Observation" off their album, Give, which featured heavily composed and tightly arranged melodies, bombastic drumming and dynamic changes in volume, meter and key.

At this point, Iverson stood up to accept a hearty applause, and introduced the band, while King and Anderson improvised a goofy drum-bass duet to accompany Iverson's words. He sat back down to begin a song he recently wrote called "3 PM," which was strictly composed but still had a free, loose sound. Anderson went for a bass solo, accompanied by King hitting surprisingly straight and simple quarter notes on his ride cymbal. Anderson faded out, leaving King to play a solo on his floor tom with his left hand, while pressing the stick in his right hand against the head of the drum to tune and change the pitch of the drum.

New songs and classic compositions from previous albums were performed, and the audience was exposed to sometimes abrasive and irregular time signatures, key changes, syncopation and several moments of The Bad Plus' patented, boisterous explosions of musical climax.

A new Anderson piece, entitled "Snowball" was introduced, and its serenity washed over the audience, cleansing the musical pallet, starting afresh, from almost silence. Its tranquil, pastoral melody calmed the listeners, and sounded similar to the calm before another raging storm of thundering polyrhythm and modulation. It ended so gradually that the audience didn't clap until at least fifteen seconds after the music ended.

After the classics "1979 Semi-Finalist," and "The Empire Strikes Backwards," they played an Anderson piece called "Dirty Blonde." The grand theme was announced by piano until it resolved to a breakdown. Next came a piano-heavy bridge.

There was no clear distinction between soloist and accompanists, as all the members improvised simultaneously. The interplay was incredible as themes and figures were passed between each player, creating a cohesive sound. The collective jam continued, invoking emotion in the crowd in the form of bobbing heads and intense gazes.

Their final song of the set was "Lost of Love," another Anderson composition. It featured a melancholy but hopeful melody, which reached its peak before collapsing gracefully into sustained, minor solo piano chords. The melody was retold, each time more triumphant, more reassuring and more hopeful, until everything stopped, and a few carefully selected piano keys were tapped to end the set.

The band walked off stage, and Iverson accidentally kicked Anderson's upright bass as he walks past it. As they stood talking and joking, the audience cheered and applauded while watching their conversation in a curious voyeur moment.

The Bad Plus returned to the stage and played "Him," by Aphex Twin. Then the group began the jazz standard, "Have You Met Ms. Jones?" This stylistic change started like a typical rendition of the tune, until they smoothly sped up the tempo mid-chorus. The song culminated in a stunning finish where the band teased the final part of "Physical Cities" from their album Prog.

The ending was an incredibly syncopated series of hard hits with varying lengths of rest in between. For fans familiar with this composition, this ending was a big tease, leaving them wanting the complete song while also finishing the concert with an invigorating and heady piece of music.

In an interview after the show, Iverson said that while on tour, The Bad Plus rarely has devoted practice time, and uses sound checks to work out new songs and variations to the repertoire. When Iverson composes, he explained, he simply sits down at any piano and, "sometimes it comes," but most times it doesn't.

King spoke about playing complicated music, saying that, for time signatures that are not standard 4/4, practicing the piece is the only way to become comfortable with it. For King, playing in odd time signatures is just another way to approach music. King also shared that several years ago the band tried to learn Anderson's complex composition "Physical Cities" by reading the music a few times until the group tried to perform it one night in Pittsburgh, and it did not go well.

The piece was then put aside until everyone had memorized it. Now, King says he knows the piece so well that rather than counting the meter to place the hits in the correct places, he just feels it happen.

All three band mates use unorthodox, powerful and wholly original approaches to composing and performing music. Each player is just different enough from one another to combine into the sleek collective that is The Bad Plus. They took the Iron Horse by surprise Thursday night, capturing minds and ears from the first click of the count-off to the first song, to the last sustained wail from the piano.

Dayton looking to capitalize on perfection

Flyers take top seed in Atlantic 10 Tournament after 30-game unbeaten streak from last year

By Steve Levine
Collegian Staff

The Atlantic 10 women's soccer schedule, which began in late September, needed every last game to determine who would be in or out in this year's tournament.

Headlining the field is Dayton, who enters the tournament unbeaten in thirty games dating back to last year, posting 14 shutouts along the way. The Flyers (14-0-5, 10-0-1 A-10) have let up five goals, good for fewest in the nation.

On top of that, Dayton's offensive numbers are staggering, outshooting the opposition, 446-127. The Flyers average 2.16 goals per game compared to the opponents' 0.26. Much of the stark statistical contrasts can be credited to Dayton's top five players, who all have at least four goals and nine points.

Leading its high-powered offense are Mandi Back and Lauren MacCormick, who each have eight goals and six assists.

In goal for Dayton is freshman Katherine Boone, who posted a 0.22 goals-against average, a .918 save percentage, and a league leading 12 shutouts.

To say that this team will be hard to beat is an understatement.

Charlotte is another force to be reckoned with in the tournament, which is seeking its third straight A-10 Championship title. The 49ers finished the regular season with 29 points, two fewer than Dayton's mark.

Like the Flyers, the 49ers own a huge advantage in scoring categories across the board this season. Look for that trend to continue in Charlotte's first game, when it will face the highest remaining seed from the opening round.

Leading the 49ers are Whitney Weinraub and Hailey Beam, who accounted for 62 of the team's 164 points. Weinraub's 32 points leads the conference, while Beam's 30 is good for second best. The one-two punch of these two is hard to ignore, as they have both averaged over 1.5 points per game.

Both Dayton and Charlotte received first round byes, and a meeting between the two teams in the championship game would be of no surprise.

The rest of the field will play in the opening round on Thursday, with the first match scheduled for 5:30 between No. 3 Fordham and No. 6 Massachusetts.

The winner of that game is very hard to predict. The Rams defeated the Minutewomen in overtime, 3-2, in their only other meeting this season. Both teams were statistically even as the match appeared to be headed for a tie. However, a costly UMass turnover in overtime led to a one-on-one goal against UMass goalkeeper Emily Cota, who didn't stop the shot.

Should Fordham win, it will go on to face Charlotte. Should UMass win, it will go on to face Dayton. Fordham and UMass will be the underdogs in either scenario.

Following the Fordham and UMass game will be No. 4 St. Bonaventure at No. 5 Saint Louis.

The Bonnies (10-10-0, 7-4-0 A-10) enter the tournament 3-3 in their previous six games, losing their last against Fordham, 2-0. They are slight favorites to defeat the Billikens because of a 1-0 victory they enjoyed during the regular season. Leading St. Bonaventure is Courtney Bosse, whose eight goals and 17 points lead the team. By no means is she shy to shoot, registering 50 shots on goal over the season.

It is unknown who the winning team of this match will go on to play because it depends on the outcome of the UMass and Fordham match.

Although a Dayton/Charlotte Championship showdown is foreseeable, upsets are not uncommon in the A-10. This tournament represents the most important point of the season for every team, nobody wants to go out quietly.

Kellogg still configuring depth chart as regular season opens

By Adam Miller
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts men's basketball coach Derek Kellogg knows the talent the seven players he recruited as transfers and freshmen possess. What he doesn't know is how they will fit in with the 2009-10 Minutemen 10 days before the regular season opener against Central Florida.

UMass had a closed scrimmage against Boston University scheduled for Saturday, but several Terriers came down with the flu, and Kellogg canceled it as a precaution. He is now looking for another team to scrimmage on Thursday before the Minutemen host Dowling at home on Saturday.

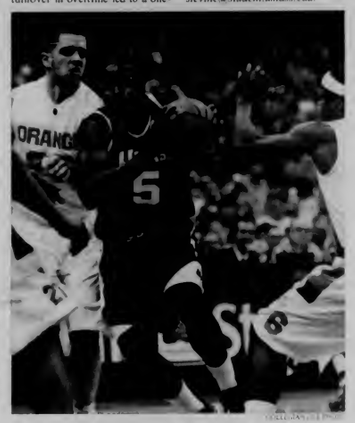
There are nine players who never played a minute of Division I basketball, and the remaining six, who played for UMass last season, also leave a bit of a question mark because Kellogg knows there has been improvement. He just doesn't know how much improvement they've had.

"It's been fun coaching them, but the tough thing for me is I'm not sure where we are right now because we haven't played anyone besides ourselves. That's pretty difficult," Kellogg said.

He knows that guard Ricky Harris is going to lead the team because of his senior leadership skills and what he brings to the court. Redshirt junior Anthony Gurley and sophomore David Gibbs have made substantial improvements under Kellogg's eyes, and are going to play major roles for the Minutemen this season.

As important as they'll be to UMass, all three players aren't necessarily going to start unless Kellogg feels that they give the Minutemen the best chance to win.

"I'm not sure if that combination (Harris, Gibbs and Gurley) is definitely conducive to winning the game," Kellogg said. "They have played better and are getting better together, but I need to play another team to get a gauge on who's going to be starting and who's going to be playing most of the minutes."



Kellogg expects to go 10 or 11 deep this season and believes that he has a better team than last year, but he's still unsure about which combination of players works best.

Along with mixing and matching different lineups, Kellogg has to get most of his team accustomed to playing at the speed and intensity level that comes with playing Division I basketball, especially with a schedule as tough as the Minutemen's.

Later in the season, Kellogg hopes to implement a full-court press, but that can't happen until the half-court defense is high enough for his standards. Early in the year, he expects that there will be plenty of mistakes and will have to be patient with his young team, but he also believes it can be successful later on in the year and improve on last year's record.

"I'm not trying to push them too far until we've mastered the basics," Kellogg said. "I think we still have a lot of work to do in mastering the basics."

Richmond earns spot in AP Top 25 poll after Towson win

By Chris Shores
Collegian Staff

A 42-14 road win by the Richmond football team over Towson last Saturday earned it a vote in the Associated Press Top 25 poll. The Spiders are the first Football Championship Subdivision team to be recognized by the poll since Appalachian State was recognized in late 2007 and the third in history.

The Tigers (2-6, 1-4 CAA) held their own against the Spiders (8-0, 6-0 Colonial Athletic Association) for the first 37 minutes of play. Down 14-13 with just over eight minutes left to play in the third quarter, Richmond gave the ball to Justin Forte who scored from 10 yards out for his fifth rushing touchdown of the season.

The Spiders connected on a two-point conversion attempt and then scored twice in the next two minutes. Kendall Gaskins ran for a touchdown following a fumble by Tigers quarterback Tommy Chroniger on the Towson three-yard line. On the next drive, Richmond's Tremayne Graham intercepted Chroniger's pass and then returned the ball 32 yards for the score.

In total, Richmond scored 29 unanswered points after surrendering the lead in the third quarter.

The Spiders' streak of 17 consecutive wins is second in the nation only to Florida, with 18. But to extend the streak, Richmond will have to defeat its toughest opponent yet, Villanova, in its homecoming match next Saturday.

JMU earns first conference win

James Madison collected its first conference win of the season with a 20-8 win in Delaware. The Dukes (3-5, 1-4 CAA) pulled off the victory despite allowing three offensive turnovers and turning the ball over downs twice.

The Blue Hens (5-3, 3-3 CAA) fared similarly on offense. Quarterback Pat Devlin threw interceptions twice in the game and went down in eight sacks thanks to James Madison's defense.

The first-half saw only one score: a 34-yard field goal by Delaware placekicker Jon Striefsky.

In the third quarter, the Dukes first put points on the board in the form of a 12-yard run by quarterback Justin Thorpe. He threw a seven-yard passing touchdown later in the quarter to Charlie Newman. The redshirt freshman threw for a career high 262 yards and posted an impressive 73 percent passer completion rating.

The Blue Hens rode a three-game win streak and were ranked 16th coming into their homecoming game against JMU. The loss is their second at home this season. They host one more conference game, a matchup against Hofstra next week before playing at Navy and Villanova to close out the season.

UNH routs Northeastern

After playing three close games — two narrow wins against Hofstra and Villanova and a loss to Massachusetts — New Hampshire's offense returned to the dominant play it displayed earlier in the season. The Wildcats accumulated 461 yards — 281 of them coming on the ground — in a 48-21 rout against Northeastern.

The Huskies (1-8, 1-4 CAA) had plenty of chances as they controlled the game clock, 37 minutes to 23, but could not stop the rushing attack of senior Chad Kackert, who ran for 176 yards and scored two touchdowns.

UNH (7-1, 4-1 CAA) broke the game open with a three-touchdown second quarter. One of those scores came on a 64-yard run by Sean Jellison.

The Huskies also saw an impressive performance from their running back, junior John Griffin, who ran for 132 yards and recorded his second touchdown of the season.

The Wildcats have three conference games left including two home matches. Next week, they will face Rhode Island (1-7, 0-5 CAA) at home. A key conference matchup at William & Mary (7-1, 4-1 CAA) will occur the week after.

Meanwhile, the Huskies will travel to Massachusetts this Saturday before hosting Hofstra on Nov. 14.

Carolina on their minds

Junior midfielder Therese Smith tries to break past a defender during a game earlier this season. Coach Angela Napoli and the Minutewomen (6-10-2, 5-6-0 Atlantic 10) will open the A-10 Championships on Thursday against Fordham and will play Dayton on Nov. 6 if they win.

UM set to face Dukes in North Carolina

By Steve Levine
Collegian Staff

On Sunday, it took two UMass shutout victories and a Duquesne upset over La Salle to give the Massachusetts women's soccer team a playoff berth.

Now, with the field set for the Atlantic 10 Tournament, the No. 6 seeded UMass (6-10-2, 5-6-0 A-10) is set to play its most important match of the year on Thursday, when it takes on No. 3 Fordham in the opening round.

Following Sunday's dramatics, UMass coach Angela Napoli regrouped her team and set her sights on the tournament.

"We're the only team in the tournament this year that wasn't in it last year," she said. "So we were prepping them on the conference mentality and what to expect when we get there. I don't want them to get too excited and lose focus."

The Rams (8-11-0, 7-4-0 A-10) were victorious in the one game they played against the Minutewomen this season, when they defeated UMass at home in overtime, 3-2. The match favored the visiting team statistically, but not by a substantial margin.

The Rams took an early 2-0 lead in the first half on goals by midfielder Michelle Ancely only to relinquish the lead to a resilient Minutewomen squad. Just before the half, junior forward Therese Smith cut the lead in half with a creative, unassisted goal just inside the far post.

A half hour into the second half, UMass tied the game with a goal from redshirt junior Sydney Stoll, who netted her shot from a Smith helper. The late goal sent the match into overtime, when Fordham's Leah Loguidice took advantage of a UMass turnover and beat goalie Emily Cota in a one-on-one.

Corner kicks favored the Rams, 5-3, while UMass registered eight shots on goal to the Rams' five.

Offensively for the Minutewomen, the match resembled many others over the course of the season, where Stoll and Smith filled the stat sheet. If UMass hopes to make it far in the tournament, it will need contributions from other players.

"I remember in that game there was a twenty-minute period where we couldn't possess the ball and we were receiving a lot of pressure," Napoli said. "We really have to focus on getting the ball forward and limiting their opportunities; if we do that, we should do very well."

Unlike UMass, Fordham has a variety of players capable of finding the net, most notably senior forward Leah Loguidice and Annie Worden, who accounted for 25 of the team's 83 points in the season. Loguidice's six goals and 13 points lead the team in both categories, while Worden trailed her with five goals and twelve points. However, the Rams have seven other players with at least one goal, as opposed to the Minutewomen, who aside from Stoll and Smith, have four players with at least one goal.

Fordham has more shots on goal (97) than UMass (78) and also the edge in corner kicks, 72-57.

Perhaps the most troubling aspect of the Rams is their success closing out the season. Fordham won five of its last six games prior the tournament, four of them coming via the shut-out. Given UMass' lack of offensive prowess, Fordham's strong play defensively could very well mean a long day for the Minutewomen. UMass will have to convert on its scoring chances, which is something it failed at throughout the season.

Should the Minutewomen come away on top, they will go on to face No. 1 Dayton, which will enter the tournament undefeated in thirty games. Napoli, aware of the possible second round meeting with the Flyers, is satisfied with the draw.

"Although Dayton is undefeated and is a great team, I feel we lucked out drawing them instead of Charlotte," she said.

UMass looks for role players to carry team

By Mike Mastone
Collegian Staff

With the one-two punch of Therese Smith and Sydney Stoll carrying the offense all season, several players have stepped up to help propel the Massachusetts women's soccer team into the playoffs.

Over the regular season's final five games, in which the Minutewomen tallied a 3-2-0 record, senior Cristina Adams with underclassmen Lauren Yelinek, Meredith Fox and Lindsey DiOrio have come through in the clutch. The quartet combined for 10 of the team's final 18 points, with Yelinek making the biggest splash.

Yelinek, a transfer from Texas Tech, tallied four points since going scoreless in her first 13 games. Her biggest contribution came over the weekend when she scored the only goal in the Minutewomen's 1-0 victory over Richmond. With the game knotted at zero in the 76th minute, the sophomore chipped a deflected serve-in.

The midfielder also contributed assists in wins over George Washington and Rhode Island. Against the Rams, she assisted Adams to give the Minutewomen a 2-1 advantage, while she assisted Stoll on the game-winner against the Colonials.

In the match-up against Rhode Island, Adams also stepped up in a big way and played the best game of her career. The Braintree, Mass. native scored twice and gave UMass (6-10-2, 5-6-0 Atlantic 10) the lead. She scored the first goal of the game on a pass from junior Ashley Hamel during the 26th minute and struck again nearly 54 minutes later en route to a 3-2 victory.

The freshman sophomore duo of Fox and DiOrio has also quietly contributed to the team's recent success. They both assisted Yelinek on her game-winning goal against Richmond on Sunday. DiOrio served the ball in following a foul on Richmond, with Fox bringing the ball down and allowing Yelinek to score.

Fox tallied the first points of her collegiate career on a game-winning goal against Saint Joseph's on Sept. 25 to open conference play. DiOrio's assist gave her the first point of her UMass career.

If the Minutewomen are to be successful against Fordham tomorrow night and continue their trip through the conference tournament, quiet players will have to continue to step up. The team has to increase its aggressiveness to create more shots.

Over the course of the 18-game regular season, the Minutewomen were outshot, 336-185. Stoll led the team with 49 attempts (24 on goal), Smith was second with 36 (18 on goal) and Hamel was third with 19 (four on goal). UMass also allowed twice as many goals (30) as they scored themselves.

The team's intensity picked up on the defensive end as of late, most notably in the box. The Minutewomen have been more aggressive and played tighter coverage and have gone after more loose balls. If the offense can mimic this same increase in intensity, UMass will be a handful for any opponent.

The Minutewomen will be in action tomorrow night against Fordham to try and keep their A-10 title hopes alive. The game is set for 5:30 p.m. at Transamerica Field in Charlotte.

CRC discusses effects of drug war

Cannabis club hosts lecture on impact of war on drugs on urban minorities, others

By Nelson Klein
Collegian Staff

On Wednesday night in the Student Union, University of Massachusetts students welcomed Deborah Peterson Small, executive director of Break the Chains, "one of the only national organizations committed to educating and empowering communities of color to reverse the negative effects of punitive drug policies," in her words.

Sponsored by the Cannabis Reform Coalition, the event featured a presentation by Ms. Small discussing the effects of the drug war on minorities across the country. A lifetime native of New York City, Small explained the context that moved her to dedicate more than ten years of her life to the cause of reforming drug policies in the United States.

A witness to the influx of heroin in the 70s and the crisis of crack in the 80s, Small described her exasperation in seeing the drug war still fueling police action against minorities in poverty stricken inner-city environments. Examining both the economic causes of drug dealing in cities and the logic behind contemporary drug policy, Small took issue with the drug war by illustrating the disproportionate effects that drug policies have on minorities and the damage that legislation has brought in response to drug-related crimes.

"Breaking the chains," she explained, does not describe "breaking the chains of addiction." The criminal justice system in the United States, she elaborated, imposes what she called fear-based legislation that causes more harm than good by liberally meting out prison sentences to people charged with possession of small amounts of drugs.

As she detailed in her presentation, not only do harsh prison sentences treat these non-violent criminals more strictly than almost any other country in the world, the vast majority of people arrested for drug crimes are young males of African-American or Latino descent. In a section of her presentation titled "Futures Up In Smoke," Small described some of the effects felt by young minorities who, once arrested with a small quantity of marijuana, lose many opportunities later in life due to post-conviction sanctions—statutes that in part keep convicted criminals from re-entering the work force. Post-conviction sanctions, along with mandatory minimum sentencing and other legislation, she argued, contribute to a form of "American apartheid."

Small's presentation, beginning by citing statistics to illustrate the situation of the underrepresented victims of the so-called War on Drugs, went on to describe the outcry that is being ignored by mainstream political discussion concerning victims who turn to drug use and sales. Small made use of multiple videos in her presenta-

Groups of different faiths discuss genocide

Student Union hosts Tues. panel dialogue

By Bobby Hitt
Collegian Staff

The Student Union hosted an interfaith panel discussion Monday, November 3, titled Genocide, Reconciliation, Forgiveness, and the Search for Meaning in the Face of Evil.

The discussion brought together speakers from different spiritual and religious traditions. The panel was seated in the order the traditions came into existence. The audience consisted of about thirty people, with mixed age groups represented.

The first speaker was Leonard Fourhawks, who, according to the pamphlet distributed at the event, is a Mohawk and Northern Cheyenne Indian. He is a storyteller and lectures on Native American tradition and history.

Fourhawks spoke of an ancient Native American chant that says "only the rocks will survive." Because of this belief, Fourhawks stated, "no matter what atrocities brought down upon us, we will be here."

"People come up to me often and apologize for the pain their ancestors caused the Native American people," said Fourhawks, "but the people who need to apologize are dead," he continued, "the ancestors of the perpetrators should not have to apologize."

According to Fourhawks, genocide is caused by intolerance, "ignorance and lack of understanding," in his words. He went on to say that governments could be blamed, but still, "government is just a bunch of flawed people."

Rabbi David Seidberg, who teaches Jewish theology, spirituality, ecology and Jewish spirituals through his website NeoHasid.com, spoke next, addressing the genocide of Jewish people in the Holocaust.

"The only people who can give forgiveness are the Holocaust survivors themselves, and the ones I have spoken with say that they can never forgive the Nazis," he said.

"Who the Jewish people can forgive are the enablers, for instance the Catholic Church," said Rabbi Seidberg. "[The Catholic Church] was complicit with many of the atrocities of the Holocaust."

The Rabbi pointed out that after the Holocaust, the Catholic Church has made steps to reconcile its relationship with the Jewish Community.

"This is a Jewish value called teshuva, which means repentance," said Rabbi Seidberg.

"The citizens of nations fully share the burden of stopping future genocides," he said. "The question is, what are we willing to do to stop it from happening in the future?" he questioned.

"Many thought, including myself, that it was the advanced technology of the Germans' that enabled them to conduct mass killing on that scale," said Rabbi Seidberg, "but [the genocide in] Rwanda showed us that genocide could be carried in a large scope with just machetes."

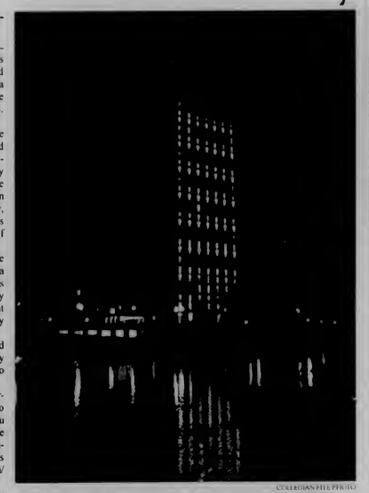
Sexual assault occurs Tuesday evening in the W.E.B Dubois library

By Sam Butterfield
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts Police Department announced in a Wednesday release that a sexual assault had taken place Tuesday evening in the W.E.B. Dubois Library.



The release, titled "Crime Alert - Sexual Assault," issued midday Wednesday and attributed to Chief of Police Johnny Whitehead, stated that the incident had occurred between 10 and 11 p.m. Tuesday, November 3, in the women's bathroom on the 19th floor of the library.

The release describes the suspect in the assault as a white male between his 20s and early 30s, approximately 5 feet 6 inches tall, with what is described as brownish, dirty blonde hair.

The suspect is purported to have been wearing a gray sweatshirt and blue jeans, also according to the release.

Anyone with information pertaining to the incident is asked to call the UMPD Detective Bureau at (413)-545-0893 or the TIPS line at (413)-545-TIPS (8477), or contact the bureau via the anonymous witness form at www.wumass.edu/umpd/anonymouswitness.

UMass student struck by car off Commonwealth Avenue

18-year-old Allison Ingraham of Belchertown was struck Tuesday on Commonwealth Avenue near the Mullins Center while crossing the street headed back to campus from marching band practice

A freshman at the University of Massachusetts was struck by a car crossing Commonwealth Avenue Tuesday evening, receiving what authorities described as non-life-threatening injuries.

Deputy Police Chief Patrick Archbald told reporters Wednesday that Allison L. Ingraham, 18, a freshman music major from Belchertown, Mass., was in the middle of a crosswalk near the end of the Mullins Center closest to Southwest walking across towards the new recreation center when she was hit by a southbound vehicle at 6:22 p.m., according to a UMPD report.

The driver of the vehicle in the incident was identified as Kaitlyn E. Medeiros, an 18-year-old from New Bedford. Medeiros has not been charged or issued any citations, but the investigation is ongoing.

Ingraham was transported by the Amherst Fire Department to Northampton's Cooley-Dickinson Hospital, where she was treated and released.

Medeiros, who was traveling in the left-hand lane and also headed towards Southwest, continued into the crosswalk although, according to reports, other cars had stopped for pedestrians.

Ingraham, who is a member of the UMass Marching Band, appears to have been returning to the academic area of campus from the intramural fields past the recreation center and on the right side of the street.

Commonwealth Avenue and Massachusetts Avenue, both of which are four-lane roads, have appeared problematic for both pedestrians and drivers in recent years. Numerous incidents have occurred in the past along the same strip of road, including an accident in October, 2008, where an Isenberg School of Management graduate student was struck and tossed by a vehicle, and a 1999 accident in which a female student was killed.

Faith groups host panel on genocide

Representatives of local denominations discuss injustice, historical atrocities

MATTHEW HARRISON/COLLEGIAN

commit genocide," he continued, "even if we have never felt that will it is in every one of us and we must address it."

After Rabbi Seidberg, it was Sister Clare Carter, who according to the event pamphlet is ordained in the Nipponzan Myohoji Buddhist Order, and is a member in the Leverett Peace Pagoda. She has participated in many local and regional peace walks.

Sister Carter opened with a Buddhist prayer, using a drum and chanting. She spoke of the teachings of Cambodian Buddhist Maha Ghosananda.

According to sister Carter, Maha Ghosananda's family was killed by the government of Pol Pot, during the genocide in Cambodia in the 1970's.

Sister Carter explained how Maha Ghosanada's teacher saw his pupil crying over the death of his family. "His teacher told him to practice being mindful for the day you can truly be useful to your country," said Sister Carter, "Maha Ghosandanda did this by helping his nation heal with peace walks and the use of spiritual teaching after the war."

After Sister Carter was finished, Reverend Chris Carlisle took the microphone. Reverend Carlisle is the Director of the Diocese of Western Massachusetts and has been the Episcopal chaplain at The University of Massachusetts since 1983. He is also the author of The Complete Idiot's Guide to Understanding Intelligent Design.

"Everyone is capable of violation and forgiveness," said Reverend Carlisle.

Reverend Carlisle was instrumental in bringing Reverend Desmond Tutu to UMass in 1992. He quoted Reverend Tutu during the panel discussion, stating "to forgive is not just to be altruistic, it is the best form of self-interest," he quipped. "It is also a process that does not exclude hatred and anger, these emotions are all part of being human," he continued. "You should never hate yourself for hating others who do terrible things: the depth of your love is shown by the extent of your anger."

The last speaker was Dr. Ali Hazratji. Dr. Hazratji is the president of the Hampshire Mosque in Amherst, and was president of the Islamic Society of Western Massachusetts from 1990 to 2007.

Dr. Hazratji gave an Islamic perspective of how to deal with injustice.

"In Islam, one is taught [when dealing with injustice], to stop it with your hand, if you can't do that, stop it with your tongue, and if you cannot do that hate the injustice in your heart." "This world is not paradise," said Dr. Hazratji, "it is a place of trial and tribulation."

This discussion was sponsored by the Office of Jewish Affairs, STAND: A Student Anti-Genocide Coalition, Western Mass Darfur Coalition, Student Union Art Gallery, UMass Arts Council, Graduate Student Senate, Student Government Association and the Harold Grinspoon Foundation.

Other events concerning genocide will continue to occur during the month of November.

There will be art exhibits in the Student Union Art Gallery, November 2-13. Tuesday, November 10th at 7:00pm a discussion titled "Genocide: From Justice to Prevention" will be held in the Commonwealth Room of the Student Union. "Cambodia Remembered: Angkor Dance Troupe and Monkey Dance Film" will be presented Sunday, November 15 at 3pm in the Bowker Auditorium.

New site lets students speak without filters

By Nina Heikkinen
Collegian Staff

Tired of being told that you need to censor your Facebook profile content for fear of offending a future employer? Looking for a place to post your blog where Mom can't leave comments? OnCampusDrama.com is here to help.

The new social networking website, which launched Sept. 1, is designed to be a forum for college students to express themselves freely, away from the prying eyes of family and coworkers.

Anthony Pisciotto, OnCampusDrama creator, said he came up with the concept of the website as he saw other popular websites expanding beyond their original college student user base.

"With Facebook being taken away and College Humor going more corporate, we came up with the idea of a website more or less for college students," Pisciotto said.

The website currently has 1,002 registered users, according to Pisciotto.

While OnCampusDrama.com is still in the process of developing content, Pisciotto said he hopes the website will become the go-to site for information about campus social life. He plans to expand individual college profiles to include videos and blogs so that users can see what is happening on campuses near them and across the country.

Pisciotto said he also hopes to see more videos uploaded to the site.

"We have a couple of guys that do original videos," he said, "the videos have been featured on MTV's Pranked," he continued. "We're really trying to get out there and get original film," he elaborated, noting that the site has increased efforts to advertise at film schools in New York.

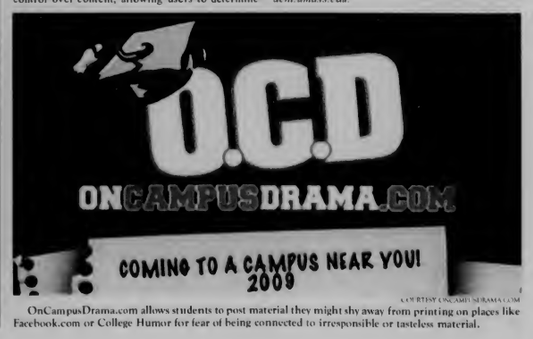
UMass' OnCampusDrama.com representative, Evan Hallal, said the website emphasizes user control over content, allowing users to determine the size and extensiveness of their profiles. Users must register in order to upload material to the site, however, they can use fictitious names on their profiles.

"The difference [from Facebook] is it's no holds barred," said Hallal, "there's less restriction about what people can say or do." "We kind of pride ourselves on letting students be students and try not to censor them too much," he stated.

Pisciotto said that users were held to a certain amount of accountability for what they post on the site.

"You can't comment on the site unless you make a profile, we try to keep it clean," he said.

The differences between OnCampusDrama and social networking sites like Facebook are clear from the website's homepage, which prominently displays staff picked photos of a "hottie of the week."



"Hot girls seem to drive [the site], I guess that's what people want to see," Pisciotto said. "I get a lot of pictures of hot girls," he furthered.

Because the site is only a few months old, many college profiles have little or no information on them, with few active users. UMass' page currently has 12 users, a figure Hallal is trying to change by promoting the website on campus.

Pisciotto said he also hoped to expand his website's visibility and is open to feedback about what users want to see from his website.

"[OnCampusDrama.com] is something to kill time, a place to get a couple of laughs, to see what's going on around the campus and around the country and brings more universities together," Pisciotto said.

CRC talk lights up drug war issues

Cannabis Reform Coalition details how American drug policies hurt afflicted citizens

tion, starting with the testimony of a woman who was "caught in the net," a woman serving multiple decades for what she held were the crimes of her husband.

Small held back nothing when reprimanding a criminal justice system that punishes women as accessories when she claimed they are often the victims, nothing that 75 percent of incarcerated women have a history of abuse, whether physical, sexual or otherwise. Incarceration for involvement, she stressed, is senseless when it amounts to punishing victims, whether of abuse or addiction.

In the audience were many eager listeners, both students and members of the local community.

Dick Evans, a local policy advocate who authored a bill for full legalization and taxation of cannabis, House Bill 2929/Senate Bill 1801, said he saw the coming months as "more optimistic than ever."

With a new generation of voters concerned with pragmatic politics, the dissipation of longstanding fear around the issue of drug policy is signaling "a wind at our backs" for the future of drug policy, Evans said.

A self-proclaimed critical thinker, Deborah Small let the ensuing discussion delve into the philosophy that has justified American drug policy, with heavy prison sentencing derived from what she said is fear from people with no experience with drugs, legislators, and the economics behind the prison-industrial complex.

When asked, "How do we break the chains?" Small's response was far ranging.

Advocacy needs to come from the people being oppressed, she stressed.

However, since the generation of young people emerging into civic power sees past the contradictory rhetoric of prohibition-era policy, Small feels, she concluded by reminding the audience that democratic participation is crucial to ending the war on drugs, letting punishment fit crimes and guaranteeing that, in the future, lawmakers will seek to address the causes of endemic problems instead of locking people behind bars.

UMass to host senate candidate forum Sunday as hunt to fill Kennedy's vacant seat goes on Congressman Michael Capuano will be one of the candidates making the trip to Amherst Sunday for a senate candidate forum at Bowker Auditorium.

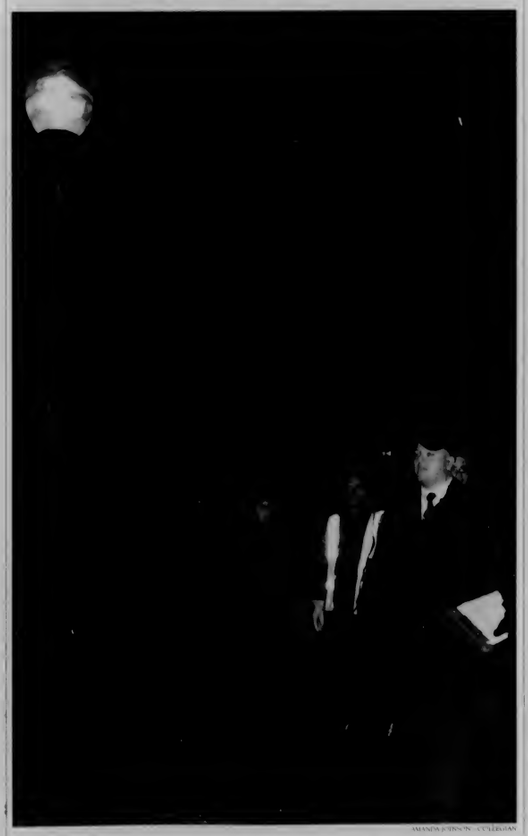
By Nick Bush
Collegian Staff

On Sunday, Nov. 8 at 7:30 p.m. the University of Massachusetts will host a forum in Bowker Auditorium featuring the candidates seeking to fill the vacant U.S. Senate seat of Ted Kennedy. The forum, sponsored by the League of Women Voters, will be free and open to students and the general public.



The forum will feature a number of candidates now competing in the Massachusetts primary election, scheduled for Dec 8 across the Commonwealth. Democratic candidate and current Massachusetts Attorney General Martha Coakley has not yet agreed to participate in the forum, but fellow Democrats such as Celtics co-owner Stephen Pagliuca, U.S. representative Michael Capuano and City Year founder Alan Khazei are expected to attend. Republican candidates Jack F. Robinson and State Senator Scott Brown have also declined to announce whether they will appear at the event.

The forum will be moderated by Bob Paquette, host of WFCR's Morning Edition. The first half of questions put to the candidates will deal with domestic issues, while the second half will focus on international matters. The sponsors of the event stipulated that radio stations WFCR and WNNZ will be broadcasting live from UMass on Sunday morning, and the forum will be recorded and replayed later in the week. The Collegian and its media partners are working to arrange a live Web stream, as well. Voter registration efforts will start at Bowker one hour before the forum begins at 6:30 p.m.

Questions for the forum will be submitted by UMass students and League of Women Voters members from across the state.

Losing the mission

Nick Milano

What is the University of Massachusetts' mission? Ask a variety of people and you might get a variety of responses.

Some might say it is to provide education to students from Massachusetts. Some might say that it is actively pursue research grants and conduct cutting-edge research. Some might say it is an institution whose goal must be changed from a focus on research to one only on teaching.

Is there one right answer? Probably not, but the answer is important. With changes on the horizon for both UMass and scores of other state universities around the country, knowing, understanding and following the mission statement is more important than ever.

When I was either a senior or junior in high school, my school went through the arduous accreditation process. As a result, the school was opened to random people walking through it and seeing how classes were taught, how students carried themselves and the upkeep of the school. For a year before the evaluators came, our headmaster forced us to learn and memorize our mission statement in case we were ever asked by one of the evaluators. To this day I can still recite most of it: "Boston Latin School seeks to ground its students in a contemporary classical education..."

We students knew what BLS was all about, to satisfy that classical part, we were required to study Latin for four years. Greek and Greek Tradition were also offered. The rest of the statement was about preparing students for college. This was also understood.

From the moment you walk into Boston Latin, you are greeted with the threat that first, you will place first in the state in the MCAS (my class was summarily punished when we did not do so in eighth grade) and that you will be put through hell to prepare you for college. BLS, we were promised, would be more difficult than college would ever be. Regardless of what we felt about the mission statement, we knew where we stood. It was sink or swim, it was do well or get left behind. It was fitting that the No Child Left Behind Act was announced at BLS.

> UMass should be about teaching its students, predominantly in-state residents, a profession that will enable them to live a productive life.

The same cannot be said, unfortunately, about UMass. The Mission Statement itself is confusing. It reads, "The University's mission is to provide an affordable and accessible education of high quality and to conduct programs of research and public service that advance knowledge and improve the lives of the people of the Commonwealth, the nation and the world."

This is important because of the recent debate over how UMass should raise more money. Instead of focusing on raising funds from the pitiful Alumni Association or lobbying state government, Chancellor Robert Holub wants to increase class sizes, decrease class choices and make dorms and dining commons even more crowded by making UMass bigger, but only open the doors to out-of-state students. If the mission statement was clearer, perhaps those decrying such a move could more adamantly argue that the mission of UMass is to favor state residents over out-of-state residents.

Just as important, though, is the debate over whether UMass should be more of a research institution or a teaching institution. For years, UMass has been derided as an easy school to get into and on the low side of state schools around the country. With better and better students choosing UMass over private schools, those who would normally get in are being overlooked.

Sunday's New York Times ran an article on how public universities are looking more and more like private ones, taking on better students from richer backgrounds. The article questions whether this is a good thing because state institutions are usually meant to help low and middle income students rise in society. Traditionally, poorer and minority students do worse on the SATs. If they are being scored out of UMass, usually an affordable and reachable choice, then where can they turn?

This is the problem with the UMass mission statement. The University can turn its back on those it is supposed to teach in the name of being able to secure better and richer research grants. The University can turn its back on state residents who have been paying taxes to support their state universities their whole life and choose to open its doors primarily to out-of-state students.

The murkiness of the mission statement is alarming. UMass should be about teaching its students – predominantly in-state residents – a profession that will enable them to live a productive life. In fact, it is troubling that I have to come back to Boston Latin School's statement for clarity and a purpose: "as preparation ... for responsible and engaged citizenship, and a rewarding life."

Keeping it real professional

People know that college is a time of change. It is a period of transition between the carefree days of adolescence and the daunting task of adulthood. It is also a time in which people can change everything about themselves from style of clothing to philosophy on life.

One thing that people might not often consider is the shift in the kinds of relationships they have. Sure, it is obvious when it comes to romantic relationships that college can be less serious. College is a good time for the kinds of exploration and dating around that, in the future, one just would not be capable of. Less obvious are the kinds of friends one hangs around with and the professional ties one builds.

Any relationship – romantic, platonic or professional – is something that needs to be worked at. Sometimes, we forget that we won't be where we are 10 years from now, and certain things must adjust to suit our morphing situations. The drinking buddies one has now in college may or may not follow into the working world. Sometimes, they really shouldn't.

> Not to say that people and their "bffls" won't remain such forever, but in my experience time and circumstances can often drive people apart.

Not to say that people and their "bffls" won't remain such forever, but in my experience time and circumstances can often drive people apart.

Whether it's a one-on-one relationship or the dynamic of a group of people, relationships of any caliber can at times be a tricky specimen. Let's begin with what I think of as the simplest kind of relationship: the professional relationship.

As college students, almost all of us have had some experience with being in professional settings. Although the jobs we hold as teenagers build a strong stepping stone for what is to come, they can be extremely different atmospherically than the jobs we hold as adults.

First of all, most of the earlier jobs we hold have nothing to do with our eventual chosen career paths. While someone can feel perfectly comfortable to party with their coworkers from the restaurant he or she serves at in college, it is not always wise to apply the same concepts of coworker relationships if that same individual becomes a corporate ladder climber.

Not to advocate paranoia, but in a competitive business world, the previously friendly colleague in the cubicle next door may care more about advancing in the company if a potential promotion is on the table. That being said, it is not impossible to befriend or even date coworkers. It is advisable, however, to avoid calling out sick only to inform certain coworkers that the real reason work is not on the menu today is because someone was up until the wee hours of the morning getting "crunk." It is better to gain enough knowledge of the positive social points of coworkers in case situations that call for teamwork should arise.

Okay, I know I just said it is not impossible to date coworkers. Let me stress, though, that it is highly not recommended. Professionalism goes right out the window if people are hooking up with their coworkers left and right. It adds entirely new complexities to an otherwise more simple relationship.

It is best to uphold the element of respect when it comes to one's superiors in the workplace. Nobody wants to be seen as the stiff, unsociable loser of the office, which can in fact work against the employee who wants to be memorable when that promotion rolls around. But, it is probably not a good call to be overly familiar with your superiors. Be personable, but don't cross any lines by, say, bear-hugging your boss. For holidays, if it is something commonly celebrated like Christmas, feel free to get your employer a present if other people typically do.

Of course first make sure that he or she actually celebrates Christmas to avoid the risk of offending them. Again, use professionalism as a guideline for gift-buying. Nothing overly personal should be given. It can be viewed as brown nosing by the employer and other employees alike. More often than not, keeping things as simplistic as giving a card should express the appropriate thoughts just fine.

Although employers run things in the workplace, they do not completely own their employees as people. Read the employee handbook pertaining to employee rights. If an employer is abusing his or her power and not being called out for the behavior, they may be tempted to walk all over their employees. Be respectful, but be firm about employee rights. If necessary, take it up with their higher ups.

Next up in my series of interpersonal advice, I discuss how to deal with family relationships just in time for the beginning of the holiday season.

Got a problem? Let H.C. know at collegiancadvice@gmail.com.

This holiday, give thanks by giving back to the community

Subhan Tariq

Thanksgiving is only a few weeks away. Soon, we'll be sitting at the dinner table surrounded by turkey and mashed potatoes and gravy. The smell of pumpkin pie will be engulfing our homes. But, do we really think about that which we have? Are we really thankful? Or do we take things for granted?

Most of us have our health. We have two eyes and ears that function properly, two hands and legs that function properly and a mouth that produces the sounds we want. We have the ability to come to a prestigious university with some of the brightest minds in the country. We have our own minds that have the ability to change the world as we see it. Yet, are we appreciative?

There are others who would kill to be in the places that we are in now. There are people in Third World countries and even people within our own country that are not as fortunate as we are.

The ability to go to the Dining Commons and eat as much as we want, the chance to live in dorms that have heat or wear name brand clothes, others – even others we know – don't have that ability.

There are people in the world who are dying for our electronics, others who are busy picking the fruit that we find at our local grocery store, others still mining for coal or drilling for oil so that we can have the energy we need to continue our lives of waste. We have all the newest cars and the latest cell phones. But how often do we think of the people who make the things we use or wear?

The name brand clothes we wear are often made in sweatshops in Third World countries and brought to the United States to sell because that's where the profit is. In fact, most of the people who make the clothing and electronics we use will never be able to afford that iPhone or $250 jacket.

> There are people in Third World countries – and even people within our country – that are not as fortunate as we are.

Ever considering those in need, but didn't know where, especially in Amherst? There are a number of places in Amherst where one can go to help those in need. There is a soup kitchen in Amherst at which one or a group can volunteer. Not Bread Alone Soup Kitchen is always in need of volunteers and is a great place for a group of friends or even one person to go to give back to the community. It helps put things in perspective about how people are really living in the community around us.

The Amherst Survival Center is another place one can go to help out. With services like a community kitchen, food pantry and a free store, the Amherst Survival Center helps countless people in the Amherst local community. There are other things needed if one doesn't have much time. The ASC is also in need of web developers, maintenance people and people to help out with general administration.

The United States is a country where we help those in need. After 9/11 and Hurricane Katrina, the American people stepped up and raised millions of dollars to help those in need. During Hurricane Ike and natural disasters in other countries, Americans have stepped up to help those who needed aid. This is no different. There are people in our own country, in our own community, that need help. It is time that we step up and help those in need.

Helping others isn't a religious issue or a political issue, it is a human issue. We as humans must be willing to help those who are less fortunate than ourselves. Those who don't have a meal on their table or a roof over their head, we must be willing to help them. For if we don't, who will?

If we all sacrificed a meal for those who don't have them, we would be able to feed thousands of people across the country. If we took the value of one meal swipe and were able to donate that to people suffering in other countries, we would able to feed, house and provide medical equipment for millions of people.

We as college students always have this mindset that we are the future of this world. This simply can't be the case anymore. We must be the change we want to see in this world. All because things are the way they are, doesn't mean they should be.

FIXING UP THE BACKYARD

RE: "Not in my backyard;" Alex Perry, November 1

Dear Editor,

I would like to start by thanking the powers that be for distributing The Collegian to North Apartments again. I awoke on Monday morning to a text from my roommate saying, "You did it. Yahh. Newspapers in north." If he and I are putting too much stock in my letter's impact on The Collegian, I can't say; although, I would like to think I touched the hearts of readers with my odyssey-esque adventure that was formerly required to find a copy of the paper. In any case, the paper is back in North and since I'm not one to question Providence, we'll leave it at that.

I'm glad The Collegian is back in North. Otherwise, I would have certainly missed Alex Perry's column entitled, "Not in my backyard." Mr. Perry, as always, delivers a spot-on analysis of the situation, but there were a couple points I would like to elaborate on.

In his column, he states that, "any chance above zero is a chance I'm not willing to take." A noble concept, but everyone must realize that, not only is this impossible to achieve, but attempting such a feat would mean a virtual elimination of civil liberties.

He also denounces Amherst for debating and approving "resolutions such as urging the United States to use diplomacy and avoid military action against Iran, opposing genocide in the Darfur region of the Sudan." I've always said that opposing genocide is a gateway to allowing terrorist attacks...

In any case, I was not aware that being proactive in one's government was a flaw. I shall be sure to keep that in mind. Furthermore, unless my understanding of the English language has failed me, I was under the impression that a "select board" was "selected" by the people, who share similar ideals to those they "selected." Of course, Mr. Perry believes that people "take their ideals too far." Again, not something I realized was a flaw.

Finally, Mr. Perry argues that just because there are some innocent prisoners in Guantanamo, "that doesn't justify releasing all of them." I couldn't agree more. Luckily, they aren't all being released. Most of them will be transferred to high-security prisons.

I hope these minor suggestions have helped strengthen Mr. Perry's point, and thank you for allowing me the pleasure to read such well thought out columns on a daily basis.

IT'S WORTH THE EFFORT

RE: "On grammar," Brian Benson, October 29

Dear Editor,

In Brian Benson's article "On Grammar," he claims that "it is easy to imagine why ... using the masculine pronoun for a human antecedent whose gender is not otherwise specified upsets a lot of people."

He then goes on to prove he is not one of these said understanding people, making the ridiculous claim that women should be flattered and contented by the use of feminine pronouns to personify liberty, nature, truth and knowledge. As flattered as I am to be personally aligned with such lofty ideas – emphasis on ideas – it is sometimes nice to be associated with my own species. You know, "mankind."

Benson eventually admits that he "[does] not quite understand why" women may have the wild desire to be included in references to humankind, and conversely I challenge him (futile, I know) to imagine growing up and living in a world where men are lumped into "womankind," where he is alienated and excluded from all of the "classics" he mentions, down to the very Constitution of his country, the one that denied him the right to vote until 1920.

Benson should understand that the argument about gender pronouns extends beyond what he terms "linguistic diplomacy" precisely because there is a history of sexism in this country and in the world, which is why we have ubiquitous terms like "mankind" in the first place; therefore, these arguments have to be discussed in this context.

Conveniently, the task of specifying "s/he" of "her/him" seems to be an arduous and pointless one for Benson. It even contributes to "the trend of increasingly clunky language," a troubling trend which surely warrants precedence over equal gender representation.

NO BACKBONE ON GITMO ISSUE

RE: "Amherst has no room on its plate for Guantanamo inmates," October 28 2009

Dear Editor,

Both courage and conviction are conspicuously missing from The Collegian editorial board's Oct. 28 statement on Amherst Town Meeting.

Town Meeting is considering a warrant article that would call upon the U.S. government to allow wrongfully imprisoned detainees at the Guantanamo Bay prison to resettle in this country, and would declare Amherst's openness to two of the detainees making their homes here. The editorial barely touches the principle at play, and makes two faulty arguments against the warrant article.

The background: The detainees were held for up to seven years without charge before the government concluded that they were wrongfully arrested in the first place. They cannot return to their home countries for fear of racial or political persecution there, and are currently banned from living in the U.S. once released. America has always promised freedom from persecution for millions. Amherst will lead the nation in renewing this promise if it passes the article.

The arguments: First, municipal government should focus on local issues. Of course. But to spend a small portion of one meeting passing a non-binding article would do nothing to detract from the town government's duties and in fact is rooted in a tradition of local statements of solidarity with struggling people – local governments have been passing nonbinding resolutions on global and national issues since the days of slavery.

Second, Amherst will be ridiculed by conservative commentators as living up to its "lefty" reputation if it passes the article. Shallow shouting from pundits and blogposters is almost inevitable in an issue as touchy as this one, but to argue against doing the right thing simply because some will mock or criticize is to walk a dangerous path that leads to moral paralysis.

The editorial echoes language from blog posts describing the warrant article as "un-American." The Collegian's editors should know better than to bow to the use of this cheap word, infamously used to quash the most American value of political freedom during the unthinking mass fear of the McCarthy era.

The editorial is a symptom of a national problem: The loudest voices in today's media are those that flatten multifaceted issues into cardboard cutouts. These voices abuse rational fears and warp human stories to win ratings for irrational and inhumane coverage. They reinforce the notion, fatal to democracy, that dissent is treasonous. The Collegian, as a laboratory of ethical journalism, can do better.

On new DVD, viewers re-live Cohen classics

By Mark Schiffer
Collegian Staff

As August waned in 1970, the anti-Woodstock took place at the Isle of Wight music festival. The potential of the 60s was beginning to segue into the stagnation of the 70s, and the people were restless. What was meant to only have a 100,000 person turnout ended up being gate crashed by a crowd of over 600,000 very angry music lovers. The performers did their part to try to keep the crowd calm, but to little avail. During Jimi Hendrix's set, the stage was somehow set aflame. Performances were frequently interrupted by political diatribes from radical patrons. All was frustration and chaos.

Finally, the time came for Leonard Cohen to perform. Unfortunately, the piano and organ he needed were unable to be produced. Not discouraged, he told the event organizers that he was going to take a nap, and that he should be woken up when they were found. When they finally were, it was 4 o'clock in the morning. Leonard Cohen was woken up, changed from his pajamas into a safari jacket and jeans, and hit the stage.

It is this performance that is captured on the fantastic "Leonard Cohen: Live at the Isle of Wight 1970" CD/DVD package. The crowd has already booed off Kris Kristofferson, and tensions are high. What is achieved in this performance is nothing less than complete connection with a crowd disenfranchised with the reality that has been presented to them. Leonard Cohen's beautiful folk-based poetry perfectly reflects the tensions of the time.

As the show begins, Cohen relates an anecdote about his father taking him to the circus as a child, and seeing a man there tell everybody in the audience to light matches, so that they might find each other. At this point, he tells the Isle of Wight to do the same. As the camera cuts to the crowd, we can see a few scattered flames. As the performance continues, though, their numbers increase. The true connection between audience and performer is achieved. This connection exists out of time, and somehow manages to carry over into the DVD recording.

For the most part, the camera stays on Cohen's face. While there are several shots of the crowd, and scattered "Talking Heads" (which do provide some context, but disrupt the flow of the performance to an extent), the real attraction here is the raw live footage, little of which has been previously released. The sound quality is shockingly fantastic, and every word of poetry - and yes, every word he says in this is poetry-comes through clearly.

The music itself beautifully maintains the sound of his records at the time. The few changes actually serve to improve the original material sometimes, as in "Tonight Will Be Fine." What once was a pleasant afterthought of a closer to "Songs From a Room" becomes a cathartic barnstormer of a song, with a Charlie Daniels violin solo that takes the song to emotional peaks previously unknown for Leonard Cohen.

With his recent comeback in the past year, this set is an essential purchase for new fans and seasoned veterans alike. It exists out of time more than most other recorded performances from the so-called "Woodstock Generation" and consequently and has the capacity to ensnare this singer-songwriter a new generation of followers. He's earned it.

Play 'Hockey': Portland based band releases fresh debut

Hockey, currently touring with Portugal. The Man delivers energetic dance beats on their debut album, "Mind Chaos." The album features diverse tunes including, "Too Fake" and "Wanna Be Black."

By Angela Stasiowski
Collegian Staff

Never before has a band named after a Canadian-created sport had as much soul as Portland's Hockey.

There is no need to explain the band's musical back-story. Their debut album "Mind Chaos" speaks for itself.

"What kind of accomplishment is throwback? I was the first one to prefer that," rhymes lead singer Ben Grubin on the track "Wanna Be Black." "Everyone's making dance music, true, but we started in 2002."

Grubin is correct in his assertion. With the beat-laden dance craze that is currently sweeping the hipster community, it is becoming increasingly difficult to stand out as an original dance band.

Collectives like Crystal Castles, MGMT and Justice have fought their way to the front of the stacks. However, it is the underrepresented underground dance world that is starting to surface on top.

Hockey is on the verge of something huge with their debut "Mind Chaos" has all the elements of hipster greatness: humor, drum machines and the freshness to back it all up.

Currently touring with the notorious "Portugal. The Man," the band has developed its own following over the past three years. Their performances are high energy to say the least, with Grubin running back and forth to provide additional drum beats between verses.

"Too Fake," the first single, begins with the 80's aesthetic of cheesy drum machine beats and evolves quickly into a retro meets nouveau dance tune.

In his gruff whine, Grubin proclaims, "I look out/ I've got too much soul for the world." If "Too Fake" is any indication of what the band has up their sleeve, the statement is certainly a true one.

Despite their primarily electronic sound, there is a significant amount of diversity on the album.

"Learn to Loose" and "Work" come across as cracked-out soul songs that are easy to tap a toe to.

If one were to wonder what it would sound like if MGMT were to cover a Bob Dylan song, one must look no further than "Four Holy Photos." The tune combines Dylan-esque whining and harmonica breaks over persistent bass beats and acoustic guitar.

"Song Away," the second single, is oddly reminiscent of orphan Annie's famous ode to tomorrow, with Grubin proclaiming that, "Tomorrow's just a song away."

While such an outlook has the potential to be overly sentimental, the vocals possess the sort of quirky optimism that makes it OK.

The sugar-sweet frosting on this sweet tooth's song is made up of sunny guitar and synth accompaniments, which produce the most infectiously innocent pop song since Britney Spears was a Mouseketeer.

One of the album's catchiest moments on "Mind Chaos" comes in the form of "Wanna Be Black," a glimpse into Grubin's upbringing.

The notably pale singer occasionally lapses into bouts of rap, delving into his desire to fit into the African American musical movements of his childhood. He cries, "When I was young, I only wanted to be black."

There is hardly a filler track on "Mind Chaos." The band has struck a delicate balance between humor and talent with their music that keeps fans coming back for more.

The album is not for people who take their music too seriously, but what can one expect from a band named after Canada's pastime. Even for the bitterest of music critics, there is enough happiness here to go around.

DIY UMass Halloween event a real treat for UMass students

By Ellie Rulon-Miller
Collegian Staff

The DIY UMass club had its Halloween show at Earthfoods this Sunday, November 1, complete with plenty of punk rock and a little magic.

Before the show started, magician Jonas Toutant (real name: Jonas Cain) practiced a few tricks on unsuspecting showgoers and band members in the hallway of the Student Union. As showtime drew near, people waiting in the hall went into the cafe and helped move all the tables and chairs aside. A group of small children wrestled as the three bands brought in their things.

Although the PA system being used had been damaged a few days prior the show, it was used anyway, without terrible results.

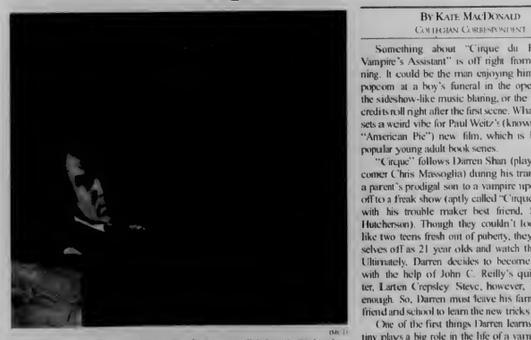
Tashtego played first, referring to themselves as the Chicago Bulls. They opened with a passable cover of "Hybrid Moments" by the Misfits, complete with almost-perfectly placed vibrato in the vocal part. The only thing that detracted from their performance was that they seemed to be playing to each other; only singer Michael was facing the crowd, while the rest of the band spent most of the set facing away from the crowd. It made their set a lot less intimate, but nonetheless congenial and enjoyable. They played for a little less than a half hour. The entire time they played, two punks in the front of the crowd freaked out dancing to every song.

Second to play was Alottle. The band's set was comprised entirely of Monkees covers in a much harder fashion than the original songs – it was like the Monkees if they played in the 1970s punk scene. They did all covers because "we heard Phish did it," bassist Jamie Miller said. The music was all very raw (due in part to the damaged PA); the sound almost like that of a garage band. The energy that Tashtego started kept up through their set, with a couple more people joining the two lone punks in their circle-pit style dancing. Earthfoods shook.

The last band to play was The Frills, a female-fronted punk band with a unique sound and, clearly, a bit of a following. The people in the cafe for their performance mouthed the words and sang along with the band. After more uninhibited dancing and the subsequent, putrid body odor, the crowd grew in size as curious passers-by in the Student Union stopped by for a listen. All the while, the Frills continued to completely kill it.

The Frills recently recorded an EP, which is worth many, many listens and can be heard on their Myspace page.

The show did not stop when the bands were finished. Jonas Toutant, seated in the back of Earthfoods during the Frills' performance, got up just as they finished and set down his black briefcase on a chair in front of the audience as they sat down, as if for story time, and the bands disassembled their things. While his attempts at humor as he started seemed feeble and, quite frankly, kind of lame, things quickly improved as he adjusted to his crowd and did a full routine of tricks, including "The World Famous Ketchup Trick," where he made a bottle of ketchup disappear and promised to make it reappear at the very end of his show. He also did "The World's Most Dangerous Card Trick" using a mouse trap.



In "The Houdini Card Trick of Death," he had a member of the audience pick a card and write her name on it in Sharpie. Meanwhile, another audience member tied his hands to his legs. After escaping from the rope, hands covered with his blazer so we couldn't see how he did it, he took off his shoe and removed the card with the female crowd member's name on it, followed by the bottle of ketchup from his other shoe.

Toutant finished with one last trick before taking a few moments to tell the audience about "The Journeyride Project," his plan to bicycle from Massachusetts to California in order to "connect with people across the country, [and bring] society closer together as a community," and to raise awareness in hopes to end homelessness and hunger.

The next time you have a chance to see a show put on by any of these bands, DIY UMass, or Toutant, it would be in your best interest to attend. You do not want to miss another one.

Cast of 'Cirque du Freak' made-up of anything but freaks

In "Cirque du Freak: The Vampire's Assistant," John C. Riely plays the quirky and immortal vampire Larten Crepsley.

By Kate MacDonald
Collegian Correspondent

Something about "Cirque du Freak: The Vampire's Assistant" is off right from the beginning. It could be the man enjoying himself, eating popcorn at a boy's funeral in the opening scene, the sideshow-like music blaring, or the fact that the credits roll right after the first scene. Whatever it is, it sets a weird vibe for Paul Weitz's (known for 1999's "American Pie") new film, which is based off a popular young adult book series.

"Cirque" follows Darren Shan (played by newcomer Chris Massoglia) during his transition from a parent's prodigal son to a vampire upon sneaking off to a freak show (aptly called "Cirque du Freak") with his trouble maker best friend, Steve (Josh Hutcherson). Though they couldn't look anymore like two teens fresh out of puberty, they pass themselves off as 21 year olds and watch the sideshow. Ultimately, Darren decides to become a vampire, with the help of John C. Reilly's quirky character, Larten Crepsley. Steve, however, is not good enough. So, Darren must leave his family, his best friend and school to learn the new tricks of the trade.

One of the first things Darren learns is that destiny plays a big role in the life of a vampire. Darren is wanted by a warring vampire clan called "The Vampirese" who hate the "freaks" that Darren comes to live with. When Darren's family and friends, both old and new, become involved, Darren must decide who he really is.

In a time when vampire movies are all the hype, "Cirque du Freak," the first of three rumored installments, will never garner all the glitz and glam of "Twilight." It's a movie whimsical enough to entice younger kids not yet mature enough for "Twilight's" heavier plotlines, but it has deep enough meaning to entertain adults. "Cirque" is definitely a pleasant surprise.

Teens and parents may be appreciative of the moral storylines of "Cirque" that make it much more than a campy vampire flick. There is a sense of urgency to show that so-called "freaks" shouldn't be judged by how they look. People who are different can be just as loving, loyal and caring as anyone else. It's a different take on the old adage that you can't judge a book by its cover. Darren and his lady friend, Rebecca, who is part monkey, echo this sentiment, stressing that, "Being human is not about what you are, it's about who you are."

Though it is the main character who delivers the most important lines of the movie, the supporting characters steal the show. Hutcherson, a more experienced child actor from "Firehouse Dog," is simply a better actor than Massoglia. He seems to be more in tune with his character's emotions, whereas the character of Darren seems to be a walking cliché, the ultimate do-gooder. With the support of an all star cast (including Salma Hayek, Ken Watanabe and William Defoe), Weitz probably could have chosen a better lead, because Massoglia sticks out like a sore thumb. Reilly's role as mentor is also important to the plot. "Cirque du Freak" is predictable, but Crepsley keeps his audience's attention and prevents them from writing this movie off as just another teen fantasy flick.

Hopefully, the sequels will fill in some of the gaping holes left in the plot of this first installment. However, it should keep some of the better aspects of the film- the whimsical, constant soundtrack, the use of "Nightmare Before Christmas"-like animation when transitioning between scenes, and the reliable camera-work. Partly because of the simple cinematography, the use of shadows to portray danger or mystery, and the ominous tones of voice used, the average viewer won't have to pay close attention to "Cirque du Freak: The Vampire's Assistant." This film, which could be called a "Twilight" for the younger set, save for the use of expletives, shows a few of the trials and tribulations a teenager must face, only in a setting where vampires and freaks are the norm. The film tells its young audience members to always follow their hearts, even if, in the case of Darren and Crepsley, it's no longer beating.

Minutemen still hoping for A-10 birth

By Adam Miller
Collegian Staff

Last weekend, two Massachusetts teams (field hockey and women's soccer) looked nearly out of their sport's Atlantic 10 Tournament with two must-win games and a few chips to fall in their favor.

Men's soccer coach Sam Koch and his team are hoping to duplicate the success of UMass' counterparts this weekend, as it is scheduled to play Richmond and George Washington on the road.

"Anything can happen, and we know anything can happen," Koch said of his team's hopes of getting into the A-10 Tournament.

The Minutemen (6-6-3, 3-4-0 A-10) aren't in as much of a difficult scenario as either Minutewomen team was, since both had to win both games just for the possibility of making the tournament. Koch and Co., on the other hand, are three points out, and looking at a much tighter scenario, where they could finish anywhere between third and 12th depending on this weekend.

As much as the rest of the A-10 will affect the post-season chances of UMass, Koch can only worry about his team.

"We just got to take care of our own business and see how the other teams do," Koch said. "That's the only thing we can worry about, because we have to let other people do other things."

The first game this weekend is on Friday against the Spiders (5-9-2, 2-3-3 A-10).

The Minutemen have been inconsistent during the A-10 schedule, as they have yet to put together a winning or losing streak. The only constant in the conference schedule is UMass' tendency to play close games.

Five of the six matches during the A-10 schedule were decided by a goal. If the Minutemen are going to win on Friday, it will have to be with the same defense that kept opponents' scoring to a minimum.

Richmond has struggled throughout the season, although it recently pulled off wins over Dayton and Xavier at home.

Last weekend, the Spiders lost to the Colonials, 1-0, on Oct. 31. Although their record hasn't been stellar, Koch says they have played a lot better recently, and still should be considered a serious threat.

"They've got a new, coach and kind of a bit of a different style," Koch said. "They're going to be low pressure, but very similar to Fordham."

Richmond is eighth in the A-10 for scoring with 19 goals; however it has a tendency to give up a lot of goals, which hinders its ability to win.

The Spiders (30 goals) allowed three times as many goals as the Minutemen (10) this season, and are near the bottom of the conference in defense.

Richmond has a dynamic scorer in freshman Houston Oldham who, despite his inexperience, has four goals on the season.

On Sunday, the Minutemen take on GW (9-7-0, 3-4-0 A-10), who Koch describes as a physical team. The Colonials are also one of the top scoring offenses in the conference, led by senior Andy Stadler (nine goals), who is second in the A-10 for scoring.

As a team, GW has a total of 30 goals for the season, twice as many as UMass.

The Colonials are currently tied for ninth place with the Minutemen with nine points. GW will play Rhode Island on Friday, and could potentially create a scenario where the winner goes to the tournament if both teams win on Friday.

However, before that scenario can happen, Koch knows UMass needs a win on Friday before his team can think about Sunday.

Adam Miller can be reached at amiller@dailycollegian.com.

Junior midfielder Ben Arikian juggles the ball in a 2–1 victory over Duquesne last week. The Minutemen take on Richmond and George Washington in hopes of returning to the Atlantic 10 tournament.

Brandso becoming familiar with offensive, defensive play

By David Brinch
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's soccer team has nine freshmen on its 2009 roster, including freshman Morgan Brandso, a walk-on midfielder and defender. Brandso earned his first collegiate start on defense along with fellow freshman Dominic Skrajewski on Nov. 1 in a 1-0 loss against St. Bonaventure, after playing in five games so far this season.

"I was really nervous and shaking, but once you get out there, I felt a little better," Brandso said.

He has recorded two shots, including one shot on goal in five games so far this season.

UMass (6-6-3, 3-4-0 Atlantic 10) coach Sam Koch has been impressed with Brandso's play thus far, and will look for him to contribute against Richmond and George Washington this weekend. The Minutemen hope to get back to the conference tournament with back-to-back wins against the Spiders and Colonials.

"He's been great, [and] his attitude has been tremendous from day one," Koch said. "He's been a great addition to the team, and when we had to play him as a right back, he did very well."

Brandso, a Dartmouth, Mass. native, was a standout at Dartmouth High School, and was named Most Valuable Player in both his junior and senior years while recording 17 goals and three assists in 2008. After coming to UMass and impressing UMass coach Sam Koch this summer, he was given a roster spot, but was not promised anything.

"I walked on and barely made the team, and I was probably going to redshirt this year, and then coach gave me a chance," Brandso said. "I've been working hard in practice, listening to the upperclassmen because they know better than me, and they know what to do, so I just listen to them. I've gotten some playing time here and there, and I'm just happy to be here."

While seeing most of his time at midfield this season, Brandso dropped back and helped a strong Minutemen defense allow just one goal against an impressive Bonnies team. Skrajewski as well as Mark Dangleis, Andrew Henshaw and David Key were strong in containing the scoring attack, but UMass could not capitalize on some scoring chances by midfielder Ben Arikian and Chris Roswess on Sunday.

"Every week, we work really hard in practice, and it's just the small stuff we need to work on, like taking shots and putting in the effort," Brandso said. "It was a tough game, and I thought they outhustled us, and they're a very good team."

Along with Skrajewski and Brandso, freshmen midfielders Brodie Steigerwald and Tyler Brown have seen their minutes increase, especially with senior forward Mark DeSantis's absence during the first few weeks of A-10 play. DeSantis returned to the pitch this weekend off the bench, and contributed to many offensive opportunities for the Minutemen. As for the freshmen, Koch feels that they have gotten up to speed and know what is expected of them, especially Brandso.

"They've worked hard in training, and they deserve some playing time. We're not scoring a lot of goals, and we're trying to get some guys in there, and I think Morgan has a good opportunity," Koch said last week.

David Brinch can be reached at dbrinch@student.umass.edu.

Koch and Co. take on Spiders, Colonials over weekend slate

Friday's showdown, only one will get to play on.

The Minutewomen hope they are the ones on the field on Saturday, especially with the support of their home crowd spurring them on.

"We've been waiting for this all year, hosting a tournament," Sowry said. "We were nervous there for a little while, not even sure if we were going to make the tournament, but now we're here. We're full-steam ahead."

UMass was 6-4 at home this year, but when the Minutewomen needed a win the most this past weekend, they delighted the home crowd.

"We're excited to play at home in front of our home crowd," Sowry said. "I think home-field advantage is perhaps going to give us an extra little inch to get over the line."

UMass unranked, wants to bounce back

averaging 35.3 points per game on offense while allowing 12.8 on defense. On the road, though, it has been a different story. This season, UMass has averaged 15.5 points per contest while giving up 29.3.

While the Minutemen have looked bad on paper on the road, UMass coach Kevin Morris said the team's recent struggles have had more to do with turnover issues (13 turnovers in the last two games) than being on the road.

"It's got nothing to do with being on the road," Morris said. "If our team had held on to the ball for both of those games, I think they're winnable, but we didn't do that. We didn't hold onto the ball, and we lost those games. Whether it's on the road or we do those things at home, we're going to lose that game too."

Havens to start

Despite being pulled from the game during the past two games, junior quarterback Kyle Havens will start Saturday against Northeastern, according to Morris.

Havens, who was replaced by senior Scott Woodward, with whom Havens competed for the starting job at the beginning of the season, has struggled in his past two starts, going 17-of-37 for 177 yards and five interceptions between the two games. Woodward, meanwhile, went 25-of-50 for 271 yards, a touchdown and five interceptions.

During last week's game against Maine, Havens aggravated an ankle injury, and was taken out of the game. He would return, but was eventually pulled in favor of Woodward. Morris said that the injury was something that Havens has been dealing with for the entire season, and that the junior will be ready for Saturday's game.

Ranked no more

After starting the season unranked and climbing as high as No. 12 after opening their season at 3-1, the Minutemen are once again out of the national rankings following their loss to Maine.

UMass impressed in the polls early on, when it rattled off three straight wins after losing a tight contest to Football Bowl Subdivision opponent Kansas State. A road loss at Delaware dropped the Minutemen down to No. 18. But UMass bounced back the following week by moving up to No. 14 with an upset win against then-No. 4 UNH.

Senior Cher King looks to move the ball upfield earlier this season. The Minutewomen will host and compete in their third-straight Atlantic 10 tournament this weekend.

UM hosts A-10 tourney, take on No. 1 Spiders Fri.

By Jay Asser
Collegian Staff

In its last meeting, Richmond had the Massachusetts field hockey team's number.

The Spiders (11-8, 5-1 A-10), with the 1-0 win, handed the No. 19 Minutewomen their fourth straight loss and third shutout in that span.

The contest marked the end of the worst stretch of the season for UMass, in which it dropped from No. 10 in the Kookaburra/ NFHCA Division I National Coaches Poll to No. 20 in a three week period.

Now, Richmond will get a crack at a Minutewomen squad that isn't struggling, but thriving and looking like the 2007 team that won the A-10 Tournament for the second straight year.

UMass, who hosts the A-10 tournament this year, will face the Spiders on Friday at Garber Field at 12:30 p.m.

To reach the conference tournament this season, UMass had to win out in its last two A-10 games against La Salle and West Chester. Not only did the Minutewomen step up and claim both victories, but they outscored their opponents by a total of 12-3. The two wins brought their overall season record to 12-8 and conference record to 3-3.

The offense, which was lacking only a few weeks ago, came back to life, and saw multi-scoring games by Cher King, Katie Kelly and Kim Young.

UMass coach Justine Sowry feels the offensive momentum will be extremely beneficial heading into the tournament.

"I believe it's going to help a whole lot. I think we were in dire need of scoring goals, and just getting the confidence going again," she said. "I think the last weekend, we gained that confidence, and we're certainly gaining the momentum needed to put together a great tournament."

Unlike the other the three teams in the tournament, the Minutewomen have already had the experience of being in must-win situations, something that Sowry feels will help. The Spiders, on the other hand, dropped their last game of the season to A-10 foe Temple.

Despite being the favorite to win the conference this year, UMass will be the No. 4 seed and the Spiders will be the No. 1 seed.

Sowry believes the seeding to be insignificant, but does not mind seeing her team as the underdogs.

"We probably play better when we are under pressure. When we are the hunted team, we perhaps don't perform as well," she said. "Being the hunters, it's probably a better position for us."

In the last matchup with the Spiders, the Minutewomen allowed six penalty corners while only earning two. UMass was also unable to attack the Richmond zone, amassing only one shot on goal for the contest.

For different results this time around, Sowry knows that she will have to change things up.

"How we press against them and our intercepting skills are going to be crucial for the final outcome of the game. We will try to come up with a few more balls for counter-attacks. We probably will change our lineup a little bit to give them a different look."

On the defensive side of the ball, the Minutewomen will have a challenge in trying to contain the Spiders' best two players, Katelin Peterson and Sarah Blythe-Wood. Blythe-Wood and Peterson are one and two in most of Richmond's offensive categories, including goals and points.

"[Peterson] has size and good reach which can give you trouble. [Blythe-Wood] is very talented and very skillful, so we'll have to keep an eye out for her," Sowry said.

With all of the struggles UMass has faced this season, the Minutewomen somehow found a way to get back in the A-10 Tournament. Being on the brink of having their season come to an end, Sowry feels as if her team is playing with house money.

"We have nothing to lose at this point," she said.

Minutewomen look for third-straight conference victory

By Pete Vasquez
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts field hockey team may enter this weekend's conference tournament as the fourth seed, the lowest seed in the tournament. However if season statistics denote anything, it's that the Richmond-UMass matchup on Friday is more evenly matched than your typical No. 1 seed vs. No. 4 seed.

UMass and the Spiders are the top two teams in the Atlantic 10 conference in most major statistical categories including scoring margin, scoring average, shutouts, goals against average, shots, goals scored and assists.

The two teams met less than two weeks ago in Amherst, when Richmond came out on top from a defense-dominated game, 1-0. That was also the last time the Minutewomen surrendered a conference loss.

The two teams are also the only teams in the conference to claim an overall winning record. The Minutewomen are 12-8 overall while the Spiders are 11-8. The Minutewomen could have held a higher seed in the tournament if they hadn't dropped both contests against Saint Joseph's and Temple in Philadelphia.

"We certainly let our guard down in Philadelphia, losing those two. I don't think that we're the No. 4 seed," UMass coach Justine Sowry said.

Those two losses put the Minutewomen behind both teams in the conference standing, and the Minutewomen were in danger of not even participating in the conference tournament. An inspired final regular season home stand saved UMass from watching from the sidelines this weekend.

The Minutewomen and Spiders counterattacking styles will be featured in the first game of the conference tournament on Friday.

At the forefront of that game will be two seniors, both raised outside of the U.S., who have been major impacts in their respective team's recent success.

Sarah Blythe-Wood, of Harare, Zimbabwe, is the leading goal scorer in the A-10 with 19 of Richmond's goals. In her last two games, she has compiled three goals and two assists to her name. Blythe-Wood also had the game-winning score in overtime in last year's conference semifinals against Temple to send the Spider to the championship game. UMass's strategy against her is simple.

"Deny her the ball. Cut off her supply. And if she does get it, then we'll try and double-team her when we can," Sowry said. "I think we have a talented center-middie and talented backfield that we can take care of her with good communication and awareness."

The Minutewomen have done an excellent job in past meetings with Richmond of denying Blythe-Wood a score. In UMass's 1-0 loss to the Spiders two weeks ago, Blythe-Wood finished with two shots, none on goal, with zero goals or assists. In last year's championship game, UMass held Blythe-Wood to two shots on goal.

UMass midfielder Cher King, of Christ Church, Barbados, is playing through an injury, and has six goals and one assist in her last three games played. She single-handedly carried UMass over La Salle, 6-3, this past Friday by outscoring the entire Explorers team, 4-3.

King and Blythe-Wood are no strangers to each other's game.

"They've played against each other for four years," Sowry said. "They both have great stick work. I'm sure they have a mutual respect for each other."

Both players would rather keep their collegiate careers alive for the championship game, but after

Despite hosting the Atlantic 10 Tournament, the Massachusetts field hockey team almost missed out on the action that begins this Friday at Garber Field.

But with two wins and some help this past weekend, the Minutewomen, who were ranked as high as No. 9 in the country at one point this season, squeaked into the tournament, and will now face the No. 1 seed Richmond at 12:30 p.m. on Friday.

The Spiders (11-8, 5-1 A-10) came away with a 1-0 win over UMass (12-8, 3-3 A-10) earlier this season in Amherst, but were facing a Minutewomen team that does not look like the one that will take the field in the tournament. In the later game on Friday, second-seeded Saint Joseph's will take on No. 3 Temple at 3:00 p.m. The winner of the tournament will play in a play-in game against the winner of the Mid-American Conference for a place in the NCAA Tournament.

The field of four may be ranked one to four with their seeds, but with only six conference games to determine who would make the tournament and how they would be seeded, the seeds mean nothing more than who will face who. The field is a group who is experienced and has been in this position before, with all four teams making the tournament for three straight years.

UMass enters the tournament winning its last three conference games, a must to get into the tournament, but had lost its first three conference matches against the Spiders, SJU (7-10, 4-2 A-10) and Temple (8-11, 4-2 A-10). The losses came at a time when the Minutewomen were hampered by injuries, and with UMass being picked as the favorite to win the conference in the preseason, having stars such as forward Cher King back helps refute UMass' No. 4-seeding and its under-dog mentality. The Minutewomen also come in with the past two A-10 Championships to their name, both which have come over Richmond.

The Spiders come in winning seven of its last nine games, and is looking for its sixth championship in eight years after taking the A-10 regular season crown this season. Neither the Hawks (1995) nor the Owls (1994) have won a conference title in over a decade, but will be competing for one with UMass and Richmond, who have combined to win the last seven conference championships.

St. Joe's edged Temple out for the second seed in the tournament with its 4-0 win over the Owls back on Oct. 9. The Hawks used a balanced offensive attack in the victory, getting goals from four different players. St. Joe's had five players who scored six goals or more on the season, as it ranked third in the conference with 2.43 goals per game. The Hawks give up more goals per game (2.83) than they score for the third best scoring margin (-.40) in the conference, but that is an issue that the Owls face as well. They have a 1.66 goals per game average and a 2.39 goals against average for a .73 scoring margin.

The winners of Friday's games will meet in the conference championship at 3 p.m. on Saturday.

Reciever Jeremy Horne hauls in a catch in a 44-17 win over Stony Brook at home this season. UMass will need Horne to have a big day against Northeastern Saturday in order to to snap their two-game losing streak.

Morris and Co. take on Huskies Saturday

By Jeffrey R. Larnard
Collegian Staff

It's been a struggle on the road the past two weeks for the Massachusetts football team.

But when it returns home to McGuirk Stadium to face Northeastern on Saturday, UMass hopes to still remain perfect at home.

The Minutemen (4-4, 2-3 Colonial Athletic Association) will also look to get its offense back on track against the Huskies (1-7, 1-4 CAA), after scoring a combined 21 points in its past two games, road losses to Richmond and Maine. In comparison, UMass has averaged over 35 points per game in Amherst.

"We just want to stay positive [and] keep the quarterbacks' heads cool because we know they are getting kind of crazy right now," senior wide out Victor Cruz said. "Just keep everything positive, keep going to meetings, keep doing what we're doing, keep everything cool, and just have [the quarterbacks] do what they have been doing."

A major reason for the lack of scoring in the last two games has been the quarterback play, where Kyle Havens and Scott Woodward have combined to throw 10 interceptions with Havens losing two fumbles. Without the turnovers, UMass coach Kevin Morris, who once coached at Northeastern, feels the last two outcomes could have been different, whether or not on the road.

"If we hold onto the ball in those two games, I think we're in both of them, if not winning them," Morris said before Tuesday's practice. "If we [turn the ball over] here we're going to lose this game as well."

Cruz also noted the teams struggle to run the ball, which has added pressure on the quarterbacks.

"We can't get the running game going," Cruz said. "We try upfront, it's been tough, but as a receiving corps, we just want to keep blocking and doing the things we're doing just to get the running game going, because that will help the quarterbacks."

With interceptions being the turnovers that have doomed the Minutemen the most, UMass has to be careful against the Huskies, who have picked off 10 passes this season, with seven different players grabbing at least one.

Not only does Northeastern pose a threat to force turnovers on defense, but the Huskies are a threat on offense, with its numerous weapons as well.

"Their running back is probably their first weapon offensively. He is fast and is having a really good year, [and] just rushed for 130 yards last weekend against New Hampshire," Morris said. "That is probably the number one way they will go."

John Griffin is the star back out of the backfield for Northeastern, averaging 82.1 yards per game. Rushing is not the only threat Griffin poses, as he has caught the second most passes on the team as well.

The Huskies play two different quarterbacks, Matt Carroll and Alex Dulski. Both have similar numbers, but it doesn't matter who is throwing the ball at times with a receiver as talented as freshman Jordan Batts.

"[He's] a very exciting player who leads their team in catches and is up for rookie of the year in the conference," Morris said of Batts.

Batts' leads Northeastern with 41 catches for 508 yards per game (ninth in the CAA) and five touchdowns (tied for first in the CAA).

Cruz and the rest of the offense hope to get on the board early, just as Northeastern did against UMass last year, to get the offense going and to control the tempo of the game.

"We know they are going to come out strong," Cruz said. "Last year they came out strong on the first drive and actually put some points on the board, and we know this year, they're not going to give up. We just have to come out strong, as we know they will and just try to get into the end zone on our first drive and take it from there."

Havens to start vs. Northeastern

By Nick O'Malley
Collegian Staff

Coming off of a two-game skid against Richmond and Maine, the Massachusetts football team hits a much needed home stretch in its two upcoming games against Northeastern and James Madison.

This upcoming homestretch couldn't come fast enough for the Minutemen (4-4, 2-3 Colonial Athletic Association). UMass is undefeated at home (4-0), but winless on the road (0-4) so far this season.

The stretch also marks a significant shift in UMass' position in the rankings. Coming off of their upset win against New Hampshire three weeks ago, the Minutemen were flying high and sitting at the top spot in the CAA North. Entering this weekend, though, UMass is currently tied for third in the conference with Hofstra, and is two games behind the first place Wildcats (7-1, 4-1 CAA).

With three conference games left on the schedule for the Minutemen, there is still a chance for the playoffs entering Saturday's game against the Huskies (1-7, 1-4 CAA). But to do so, UMass will have bust out of its recent slump, and there's been no better place for the team to do that than on its home turf.

"It feels good, obviously, after that rough two game skid we hit," senior wide receiver Victor Cruz said about playing at home this weekend. "But to be home, [and to] have our new jumbotron, it's kind of a new energy out here. Hopefully we'll come out strong against Northeastern on Saturday."

At home, the Minutemen have been dominant,

UMass professor leaves mark

Williams unveils "Trail of Time" at Grand Canyon

By Jessica Sacco
Collegian Staff

Those visiting the Grand Canyon, with its million-year-old rock formations, colorful layers and breath-taking views, may come back with a little extra knowledge thanks to local efforts. Michael Williams, a Geosciences professor at the University of Massachusetts, has developed a new "Trail of Time" walking exhibit that will allow visitors to get a real sense of the enormity of the geological time period over which the Canyon has been created by the Colorado River in Arizona.

The idea originally arose from Williams and Karl Karlstrom of the University of New Mexico in 1995. While presenting research at the Canyon, they realized there were no displays for guests to view about the origins of the landmark.

"There was no way for the public to understand why the Canyon is there," said Williams.

Despite five-to-six million people visiting the canyon each year, less than one percent actually enter its deep core. Williams says the goal of the new walking trail is to give people a sense of the age of the Earth and the Grand Canyon without having to walk into the abyss itself.

It is located on the most visited South Rim of the Canyon and is 4.6 kilometers (almost three miles) long. It represents the Earth's entire 4.6-billion-year history.

"The idea is for people to get a feel for time," said Williams.

Brass markers will be placed every meter on the previously existing paved trail to indicate significant moments in time. Forty five touchable rock samples from the canyon along with signs and maps will give tourists better knowledge about the historical landmark.

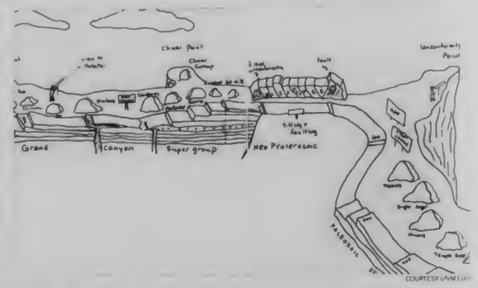
The trail begins at the Canyon's museum, which displays geological processes, provides pictures of cutting processes, and offers general information to the public about the area. It is located at the main entrance of the park, convenient for visitors.

Guests will first embark on the "miracle meter," which represents present time back to one million years ago. Within one step, all of human history is symbolized.

Covered in bronze, the meter will have various timelines carved in it to show different periods of time, such as human history, which is only several millimeters long. Other occurrences like climate change and glacial ages will also be present. Because these events happen so quickly in geological terms, they are only a fraction of the miracle meter.

Another trail, called the "million-year trail" was designed to illustrate how large the measure of a million actually is. It will have meter distances, each one approximately 50 meters long. Represented by one year, followed by 10 years, then 100, 10,000, 100,000, and ending with one million, every segment will have displays about Earth processes that happened on that time scale.

Other features of the trail will include new telescopes that allow visitors to few the same type of rock they are touching at certain points. At 250 meters, people will reach the Kaibab Limestone, which is approximately 250 million years old. Upon reaching the location, there will be a large sample to feel and examine as well as a viewing tube to see the rock in its location in the canyon. It won't be the exact place the sample was collected from, but it will show the formation of the enormous hole over time.



As the Earth time progresses on the trail, the telescopes will show deeper rock units that were deposited during those times, giving people a better understanding of the Grand Canyon's formation.

Williams hopes that the trail will not only give people a sense of appreciation for the length of time, but also get people more interested in science.

"Science is very approachable," he said. "Everyone likes picking up rocks and looking at them. There's real scientific data of the creation of the Earth [here]."

The Trail of Time is funded by an approximately $2 million grant from the National Science Foundation's Informal Science Education Program, and is scheduled to officially open to the public in August 2010.

Disabled campaigner speaks at Mt. Holyoke

By Christa Romano
Collegian Staff

Norman Kunc wants you to know that he is just like everyone else, only he happens to have cerebral palsy.

The humor-laden speech that Kunc delivered Wednesday night at Mount Holyoke College titled, "A Life Beyond Compare: Disability, Normalcy and Transformation," had a receptive and enthusiastic audience of about 100 people in Gamble Auditorium. Kunc, who displayed a big smile and the salt and pepper ponytail during his speech, focused on the need for respect and understanding for disabled people who, he says, are simply an element of human diversity.

Kunc lived up to his expectation as a funny, modern storyteller, starting off his speech by telling the audience, "I want to tell you a series of stories about my favorite topic: Me."

Beginning with memoirs about his life before his realization that he has a right to be disabled, Kunc said that for the majority of his youth he lived with the idea that he should minimize his disability to be as valued in society as possible.

"[About 25 years ago] I was in a pub with all of my friends and one of them told a story that had me in it. I was having fun but when he came to the part where he was quoting something I said he imitated the way I speak," Kunc said. "I was upset about that so I pulled him aside later and asked him why he had done that. He replied 'Norman, why are you trying to be non-handicapped?'

"No one had ever asked me that before," Kunc said. "So I thought about it, drank a few beers and realized: I have a right to be disabled."

Kunc emphasized his thoughts that society needs to accept disabled people just as it accepts different ethnicities and cultures. "Disabled people have always been around since the beginning of time," he said.

"In biblical times, the Ming dynasty, the Mayans, the Ancient Greeks and Romans, all of these cultures had people with disabilities. I mean, they were all killed, but they were there. And disabled people will always be around. It's just a part of normal human diversity."

The slideshow presentation behind Kunc displayed several optical illusions to help demonstrate his point that once one understands that disability is a normal part of human diversity, whole changes in perception occur; once you see the image within the image, you will never be able to not see it again.

Seeing disability as diversity is the first step for integration into society, Kunc explained.

He used many personal experiences as examples of why segregated schools and communities are not beneficial to disabled people; they only hide the problem from the rest of the world.

"Segregated programs don't work," Kunc said. "You learn best in your community. I don't care how great of a swim instructor you are, you just can't teach someone to swim in the parking lot of a pool."

Kunc attended a segregated school himself until the age of 13, and noted that "the biggest lesson I learned from being at a regular school was that I was more similar to the other students than I was different from them. It was such a revelation that I wasn't the only one that was nervous to go to a new high school my freshman year."

In addition to his message about acceptance and integration, Kunc also spoke about seeing disabled people as equals.

He explained why benevolence is the biggest challenge after posing the question, "When does our impulse to help others get in the way of seeing each other as equals?"

"Non-disabled people are always trying to be so nice," Kunc said. "They would never come up to me and say that I am inferior, they say that 'I just have certain needs.'"

But Kunc does not believe that disabled people need as much help as society believes.

Using a story about his experience at an airport, Kunc explained why he believes benevolence is the biggest problem. "These people just come out of the woodwork," he said about an overly-helpful staff member. "She asked me if I had a flight to catch. So I said to her, 'you mean I'm not at the bus stop?'" Kunc used sarcasm in multiple instances as a way to stand up for his disability. "Because people are so nice to people with disabilities, we can't get over that hump to gain real respect," he said.

Videos of people in wheelchairs racing, ballroom dancing and even landing backflips helped drive home his message that disabled people can function just fine in society, but first they need to be included. "Inclusion is not about being polite or politically correct. It's about innovation and creativity," Kunc said.

Wrapping up the evening with an Arabic music video about the need for disabled people to be accepted by society, Kunc received a lengthy round of applause from the audience.

"His speech was amazing; so inspiring," said Ohemaa Polu, a student at MHC. "It just goes to show that there is no point in segregating that particular group of people from society."

"That was the most enlightening and inspiring thing," Natalia Alvarez, another MHC student said. "He offered so many tools to accept diversity and to embrace it. He proved that we can really learn from people with disabilities."

New UM Annual Fund campaign seeks faculty and staff donations

By Cameron Ford
Collegian Staff

After a mere three weeks of fundraising, the UMass Amherst Annual Fund's Faculty and Staff Campaign has collected over 800 donations, amounting to a surprising $471,313.

The Faculty and Staff Campaign was recently introduced as a means of encouraging faculty and staff to help out the cash-strapped campus, according to Annual Fund director Tom Navin.

"We really want to encourage faculty and staff to [fund] what they feel is important on campus," Navin said.

Faculty and staff have always donated to the Annual Fund, but this time, the Faculty and Staff Campaign was introduced as an extra incentive to bring in more donations. It achieves this through a system of "matching" donations, meaning that the university will match any gift up to $10,000 in the form of another donation to "qualified campus accounts".

"For example, if you're a faculty member and you contribute $1,000, then we'll match that $1,000," said Navin. "If you were to donate more than $10,000, only the first $10,000 will be matched."

"It's a great incentive to encourage people to give back to the university," continued Navin. "Personally, I'm giving back to the Fine Arts Center, the library, the School of Education and the Isenberg School of Management, since I graduated from there."

UMass set aside $500,000 to be used for the matching process, and as of now, 814 donations (amounting to $323,040) are eligible to be matched by that fund.

"Our ultimate goal is $550,000, and we are quickly approaching that goal," Navin added.

Current faculty and staff members have the options of donating directly with a credit or debit card, or making a pledge in the form of a payroll deduction.

Retired employees may not opt for the payroll reduction. According to a post on the Faculty and Staff Campaign web site, "to receive matching funds from the campus, pledges must be received by December 31, 2009 and must be paid in full by June 30, 2010, with payments being matched on a first come, first serve basis."

In addition to Mr. Navin, this fundraising effort is also being spearheaded by Joseph Bartolomeo, professor and chair of the English Department; Lee Edwards, professor emeritus and retired dean of Humanities and Fine Arts; Leslie Schaler, design illustrator with the University Libraries; Cynthia Suopis, senior lecturer in University Without Walls; and Johnny Whitehead, chief of the UMass Amherst Police Department.

'Breaking the chains' of thought: An interview with Deborah Small

Deborah Small, Executive Director of the non-profit organization Break the Chains, spoke to UMass students Wednesday night.

By Jessica Bonheur
Collegian Staff

On Wednesday night the University of Massachusetts Cannabis Reform Coalition hosted a discussion with Deborah Small, Executive Director of Break the Chains, a non-profit organization based out of New York. Small spoke at length about both the causes and effects of the war on drugs, incorporating her years of experience working with those whom the nation's policies have left disenfranchised.

One often-cited example by Small is the "Stop and Frisk" campaign in New York (in which the police stopped 500,000 people on the street because they looked suspicious), where roughly 60 percent of those stopped were black or Latino, and out of all the people stopped less than 21,000 were actually involved with any illegal activity. In this one-on-one interview with the Daily Collegian, Small addressed her views on the drug war, and her expectations going into the future for Break the Chains.

Daily Collegian: How did you first get involved with this anti-drug war campaign?

Deborah Small: I first got involved with this campaign by visiting jails and prisons while working as a lobbyist for the American Civil Liberties Union in New York. I was shocked to see how many people were in there for minor drug convictions. When I worked as a lawyer on Wall Street, there were tons of drugs being shipped into the offices for the lawyers. Everyone knew about it, the police, everyone. But as long as the work was getting done, no one cared. There is no war on drugs if you are making top dollar. You just get a slap on the wrist.

DC: How long have you been working on this?

Small: In 1998 I started working on drug policy reform, so almost 11 years now.

DC: How has the drug war affected you personally?

Small: I have seen family members and friends who have sold and been addicted to drugs. I had an uncle who was a doctor. He became addicted to cocaine, but see, when you are wealthy that three-strikes rule doesn't apply to you. You can go in and out of rehab as many times as you want. My uncle lost his license due to his drug abuse, but eventually he got sober and was able to get his life back on track, and regain his license. What most people don't understand is that a lot of people turn to selling or consuming drugs to deal with economic adversity. When you are wealthy and on drugs you get a slap on the wrist and a trip to rehab. When you are poor and on drugs all you get is a PhD: A Prison House Diploma.

DC: Who do you want to impact through your outreach?

Small: I want to impact the black and brown youth of color and youth in general. It takes talent to be on the street. It takes talent to hustle. We need to reaffirm that and get our educated youth out of jail cells. Punishment is not a solution.

DC: What can we expect next from Breaking Chains?

Small: I plan on creating a web-based television show talking about drugs. I also want to develop an educational video for youth to know how to successfully negotiate encounters with the police so when they are stopped on the streets they know what to do and what not to do.

DC: What impact do you think today's youth will have on the drug war?

Small: The youth, your generation, I am counting on [them] to end the drug war. What would 'winning' the war on drugs look like anyhow?

Working to give at least a sliver of hope

Mike Fox

The town lays 13 miles from a bus stop or anything seemingly remotely significant. I rode in the back of a pickup truck while getting pulverized by the dry dusty air swept up as we flew down the dirt roads that wove through the farms that stretched on and on.

I was heading to Montefiore, a small farming hub of 100 people, 20 homes, one street and a school, to volunteer with a group of Argentines at the town's school. The goal of this trip was to establish a level of familiarity with the children through games and other relaxing activities, so that the Argentines I was traveling with could return to the town to teach the children other lessons about hygiene and health, mentally and physically.

I had experience both with volunteer work and working with children; but nothing similar to the work I was going to do in this town.

Argentina has a large divide between the lives of those in the cities and those of the campos, the rural regions of the country. While the cities are often world class hubs, whose suburbs resemble any number of wealthy countries around the world, travelling to the campos is often the literal trip back in time. A parasitic disease called Mal de Chagas is the leading cause of death in the entire country with an infection rate of around 60 percent of those in the campos. Streetlights were just put into the town a few weeks ago. Cattle graze on the soccer field. People travel by horse or jalopy.

Teenage pregnancy is immensely common in the town, with a large percentage of children dropping out of school to take care of families around age 13. According to the children themselves, most people start drinking beer regularly around eight years old. The beacon of light and the source of life and importance in the town is the four-room school that I was volunteering at for the weekend.

I had experience both with volunteer work and working with children. But nothing similar to the work I was going to do in this town.

The school provides an alternative for children to work under the table on the many surrounding farmlands. Children are brought from farms as far as 50 miles away as their parents try to give them some gateway to better their lives beyond basic survival. The school provides food, books and a sense of awareness about a world outside of the campo life.

Over the three days that we were there, we played games with the children, sat and listened to stories about their lives and shared tales of places that seem uncomprehendingly exotic to the children. Eventually, the children hung around the school with us even when we didn't have activities planned. If only to just sit with us and smile.

The second night of our stay, we had a bonfire and a large number of the parents showed up to share in the festivities. We sang campfire songs and played games as the children had a carefree day of play which would otherwise be spent working on the fields.

Additionally, we read notes that we had the children write. One which struck a chord to me was a reference to a line I ad-libbed in a skit we performed. The line, telling someone to have confidence (spoken with my horrible Spanish accent) became a running joke through the skits we put on that weekend. Several children's notes said that they were going to have confidence.

As we left the town, parents cried and thanked us profusely for taking the time to notice their little corner of the world, to care about their future. The children hugged us and thanked us. A group of older boys wrote love poems (albeit with poor spelling) to the girls on my trip, showing an incredible thing to me. A desire to use writing to get ahead and what they desire in the world.

As we headed back to the bus, one of the Argentines I came with was crying. She just couldn't stand the thought that no matter how much good we did on our trip, it would amount to little more than nothing in so many of these children's lives. That the odds stacked up against them were so steep, so overwhelming: a government that chooses to keep them in ignorance with little funding, an economy that takes advantage of them, horrible living conditions and a host of bad societal influences all around them.

I told her even if our contribution, our showing these children of another way of life, of believing in them, amounted to little more than nothing, it was still more than nothing. More than what they had before. That any sliver of hope, any percentage that their life would better was something worth fighting for, worth any amount of effort.

As our bus pulled out of the nearby town, for the trip back to Buenos Aires, I looked at a clock tower in the town's center. It said under the clock face: "Ésta es la hora de hacer el bien."

This is the hour to do the good.

Fearing the end of the 'good ol' days'

Ben Moriarty

It's almost the end of the first semester of my (and 4,000 other people's I don't know or care about) senior year, and I've begun trying to figure out what I'm going to do next year. Well, thinking about what place will possibly take or hire me. And it's got me thinking, but hardly of the future.

Lately, I've been thinking of times past – particularly when I was a kid – and I get that gushy nostalgic feeling in the pit of my stomach. It's the same kind of feeling that you might get from a girl or the feeling you get when you're about to throw up from drinking too much. The two are hard to distinguish when they pass by so quickly.

Or maybe it just really is that feeling that arises when you think about the good ol' days of middle and high school. When you didn't have a care in the world besides finding the perfect balance of slacking. Where you did well enough to not get yelled at by your parents but not enough to actually try, with tendencies of not caring about either after a while.

I remember some things from those days. Not much though, because I totaled my car in high school by driving it into a telephone pole and resultantly got a concussion. I still blame my poor memory on that, even though I'm not sure if the two are actually related. It makes me feel better knowing I am dumb because of my own doing.

But mostly, from my past, I remember the times when my friends and I would stay up all night playing videogames together. When we would go out with BB guns, pretending to try to shoot at birds because I didn't – and I'm sure my friends didn't either – want to actually kill anything. And we never did. But we were been able to anyways.

I remember when we would smoke Djarum Blacks while driving to all-you-can-eat Chinese food buffets because it was cool. Then we would buy a Box o' Joe from Dunkin' Donuts to stay up all night doing absolutely nothing but talking idly about whether the Loch Ness Monster actually existed and whether Natalie Portman or Jennifer Love Hewitt was more attractive.

I am quite looking forward to having a job. I hate school and academics as a whole. But I am absolutely dreading growing up.

It was the time when everything you did was fun, no matter how inane or dull it seems now. No matter if you formed a band named Mammoth Kill and only learned one song before disbanding because of musical differences which have since been mended. Or if you lost all five bucks you had playing poker. Or if you threw things at the people in front of you in the movie theatre because your hormonally and mentally imbalanced mind thought it was hysterical.

But now, all these things seem so trivial and forgotten. Ask my friends if they want to get a Box o' Joe from Dunkin' Donuts and stay up all night playing videogames? Well, maybe, but you'd probably have to switch the Box o' Joe for a bundle of booze. Or, if you are one of those botanist types, with some decriminalized Mary Jane.

Life is just so much more complicated, and it has nothing to do with the fact that we are all going to need to find jobs and move on to the "real world." I am quite looking forward to having a job. I hate school and academics as a whole. But I am absolutely dreading growing up, but only in the completely emotional sense of fearing to lose the childhood bonds and feelings that one might still have by entering the real world – if they even still exist in me now.

Is it possible to escape the cycle which seems so prevalent, of going from the innocence and simplicity of childhood to the ubiquitous smearing of adulthood, which is all too evident in our college experiences today? How hard is it to, like the Arcade Fire says, when you get older, stop your heart from getting colder? Or like Jesus says, changing and becoming like little children? To be as a child, I'm longing for itself, in the words of Khalil Gibran?

I spent this last summer in Guatemala, and it was the happiest I have ever been, which isn't saying very much. Perhaps ignoring what I was doing there, I don't think it really has much to do with anything besides it being the simple innocence of not having any outside ties or influences over what I did. Being, in all respects, and – contrary to what people may think they are like now – free like a child, not ashamed of doing good or being myself – having the same amount of shame as a child.

So I end up sitting here wondering if drinking on the weekends and being something I hardly want is what the future holds for me, or whether I can, like I desire, to revert my entire self back to what I was when I was a child. To possibly, despite it being the future, live like the past.

As childish as that sounds.

Practice safe Internet

Rachel Dougherty

There is a special place in hell for people who create computer viruses. That was all I could think about as I sat staring at the now-frozen screen of my computer. That and whether my literature professor would believe that my paper had just been eaten by the technological version of the swine flu.

Computers are undoubtedly an asset – even a necessity – to college life. But as most students will tell you, there is a downside to our wonderful dependence on technology: It leaves us vulnerable to the threat of computer viruses. One check on an infected link or web page, and the entire system could collapse, taking your files, your photos and your grade-point average with it.

Professors assume that college students have 24-hour access to a personal computer and check their e-mail and spark accounts every half hour. We receive homework online, submit papers online, register for classes online. I once had a professor who would send out an email half an hour before an 8 a.m. class to tell us that the location of the class had changed. He never could understand why no one showed up.

When it comes to computers, abstinence is not an option. The best thing students can do is be aware of the risks and how to protect themselves from malicious software programs.

One thing is clear: When it comes to computers, abstinence is not an option. The best thing students can do is be aware of the risks and how to protect themselves from malicious software programs. While anti-virus protection may not be hanging in a manila envelope on your Resident Assistant's door, it is available at your local Best Buy and University of Massachusetts Office of Information Technology services.

"Most schools provide virus protection automatically when you hook up to their network," says Best Buy geek squad agent Kris Arnhold. "If you go to UMass, its McAfee anti-virus software. McAfee runs seven to nine programs in the background, firewall, spyware anti-virus."

UMass' OIT does provide free McAfee anti-virus software, which may be downloaded and installed off its website. OIT also offers a $3 anti-virus CD that includes additional malware removal software.

Free anti-virus protection for everyone? Sounds great, right? But there's a problem.

"About half the time, McAfee doesn't seem to work," says Kris Arnhold. "It's the most commonly used anti-virus protection, not just by universities but by Comcast, Charter, etc. Most viruses these days are designed to bypass McAfee, just because it's so available."

About 80 percent of the time, when someone comes in with an infected computer it uses McAfee anti-virus," he added.

According to Christopher Misra, a network analyst at UMass' OIT, McAfee was selected as part of a competitive bid process several years ago. According to Misra, "We review the product annually to ensure that it meets our needs before renewing the contract."

The free anti-virus protection offered by OIT has the potential to be a terrific resource for UMass students. But why choose anti-virus software that is, according to the Best Buy geek squad, only effective 50 percent of the time? That would be like the RA's passing out condoms that have a 50 percent chance of breaking. Would you take that risk?

"Students are free to use the anti-virus software of their choice," Misra says. "We provide the McAfee products to faculty and students at no charge to give them another option."

There are alternatives to the McAfee Anti-virus offered by UMass' OIT. They just aren't free.

"Kaspersky Anti-virus is by far one of the best programs out there," Geek Squad Supervisor Jamey Smith says. "Trend Micro is very good too. Norton is decent."

Kaspersky Anti-virus is available at Best Buy in Hadley. It costs $60 a year to cover three computers, and $30 without firewall. Even with the best anti-virus protection, your computer is still at some risk of infection by malware or spyware.

Programs to look out for are Winantivirus 2009 or 2010, Personal Antivirus 2009 and Cyber Security. These are viruses that disguise themselves as anti-virus security. They pop up telling you that your computer is infected and that you must download their anti-virus software in order to prevent a system crash or identity theft. In reality, the computer isn't infected at all – until you download the false anti-virus software. If you ignore the pop-up, your computer should be fine.

"Winantivirus is the most common. Its everywhere – you can get it from facebook, porn sites, really any site off the internet," Arnhold says. "Facebook and Myspace – the actual sites are fine, but some of the ads on the side can have viruses bundled in."

Once it's infected, however, that's bad news. Repairing your computer and installing anti-virus software can cost nearly as much as a new laptop. "It can be up to $200 to repair it [at Best Buy]. More for installing anti-virus protection," Smith says.

The U.S. Federal Trade Commission (FTC) recommends installing at minimum an anti-virus program, an anti-spyware program and a firewall to provide a baseline protection for your computer. More information about spyware risks and prevention can be found on the FTC webpage, ftc.gov/bcp/edu/microsites/spyware/consumer.htm.

Take it from someone who didn't know the risks and got screwed: Use protection. Lots and lots of protection.

After a year, Obama presidency falls flat

Alana Goodman

Like most Americans, I have little tolerance for films that drag on too long. Imagine Casablanca if it followed Captain Renault and Rick's "beautiful friendship" for another three hours. Or Psycho, if audiences were forced to sit through 120 minutes of medical minutia about Norman Bates' recovery process. The best movies are the ones that know when its time to start scrolling the closing credits.

Which is why, if "The Barack Obama Story" was a Hollywood film, it would have ended a year ago. The thrilling climax of Obama's meteoric rise concluded with the election last November – but unfortunately his presidency didn't. It's as if the movie is still rolling, but half the audience is struggling just to stay awake.

No amount of successful legislation can turn Obama into the president he promised to be last November. That man does not exist.

How quickly things change. It was only last November, in the afterglow of the presidential election, when the cause célèbre in this country was the breathless debate over which iconic figure Obama most resembled. Time magazine led the way, comparing Obama to Franklin Delano Roosevelt in its Nov. 28, 2008 edition. Newsweek argued that he was more like Lincoln. Other publications claimed Obama was the new Ronald Reagan, John F. Kennedy or Martin Luther King Jr. This, before he even stepped foot across the White House threshold.

Even some of Obama's detractors compared him to larger-than-life figures. Conservative blogs likened Obama to influential Communists like Mao Zedong, Joseph Stalin and Karl Marx.

It was clear many Americans agreed on this: Our new President was destined for big things.

But this perception wasn't rooted in reality. Like Paris Hilton is only famous for being famous, Obama is simply historic for being historic. There wasn't a shred of evidence from his community-organizing career or brief stint as a U.S. Senator that Obama was ever a "unifier," a "reformer," or a notable statesman. The narrative of Obama as a political wave-maker who would shake up the old partisanship in Washington was nothing but pure fantasy manufactured in the mind of his campaign strategist David Axelrod and in the over-eager pages of Time magazine.

Obama's election and inauguration soon came to an end – and once the wind carried off all the streamers and balloons, America was left staring at its next president: a single-term senator with an unremarkable legislative history.

An ambitious presidential agenda soon followed, and then, slowly, the political speed bumps came. The economy continued to decline. Problems in Afghanistan grew worse. Obama's support of universal health care reform, as well as his inability to get it through Congress, eroded his popularity across all parts of the political spectrum. He suffered the largest approval ratings drop between the second and third quarters of his term of any president since 1953, according to an October poll by Gallup. And any hope of a post-partisan era dawning in Washington quickly withered away.

The liberal media has sunk from comparing Obama to great leaders like Lincoln and MLK to comparing him to more mortal figures, like Bill Clinton – a president whose approval ratings also plummeted during his first year, but who still went on to win a second term. Clearly, Democrats have stopped holding their breath for an FDR-incarnate and are now just hoping Obama will keep his grip on to the White House three years down the line, as Clinton did.

As for Republicans, they no longer seem to find Obama worthy of Demagogue-status. They've gone from comparing him to history's most powerful Communists to comparing him to an even less flattering "C" word – Jimmy Carter.

And while many Obama supporters advise Americans to "give him more time" to get his initiatives passed, it isn't legislative failures that have marred his presidency. No amount of successful legislation can turn Obama into the president he promised to be last November. That man does not exist.

Obama the Candidate claimed his personal magnetism could unite the country, but over the past year we've seen him struggle just to unite his own party – especially on major issues like cap-and-trade, closing Guantanamo Bay and health care reform.

As a candidate, Obama promised to be a different kind of politician, one who would put an end to corruption in Washington. But, according to an Oct. 30 Associated Press article, lobbyist spending has hit a record high of $849 million. Meanwhile, Obama continues the sleazy practice of rewarding top Democratic donors with special White House access and other perks.

Also reeking of politics-as-usual is the administration's constant partisan attacks. The White House has a grab-bag stuffed with sitting ducks – President George W. Bush, Fox News, tea partiers – that it seems to pull out whenever problems arise. Many of Obama's troubles (including ones that stem from his own decisions on Afghanistan and the financial bailout) have been conveniently blamed on his predecessor.

Obama may be a nice man, or a smart man – but a Great Man? He just doesn't have it in him. For all of the ambitious comparisons to Lincoln, FDR, and MLK, the real Obama is shaping up to be more like the Willy Loman of politics. The brilliant abilities he continues to attribute to himself have never actually materialized – and he'll need to learn to live within his own limitations if he wants to keep the American audience in its seats until 2012.

YOUR WEEKEND GUIDE TO ART, MUSIC, FILM & CULTURE

The bad luck 'Box'

The Lewis couple's lives take an unknown turn in "The Box." If they push the button on the box, they will receive $1 million and someone they don't know will die. What will happen when the box is then given to someone they don't know?

By Steven Baum
Collegian Correspondent

In a time when the unknown can become known in seconds thanks to modern technology, "The Box" puts the fear back into that which is not known.

The year is 1976. Norma and Arthur Lewis are a happily married couple. They live in the suburbs with their young son and are an average couple by all accounts. Norma [Cameron Diaz] works as a teacher at a private high school, while Arthur [James Marsden] is employed as an engineer of sorts by NASA.

Their lives are normal and undeterred by problems, until a mysterious visitor with a disfigured face [Frank Langella] appears on their doorstep one day with a life-changing offer: the box.

Given 24 hours to make their decision, Norma and Arthur are faced with a moral dilemma: do they push the button on the box and receive a $1 million reward, knowing that doing so will result in the death of someone they do not know? As the deadline draws nearer, Norma and Arthur struggle with the decision before them, unaware that horrifying consequences have already been set in motion, regardless of their decision. They quickly become aware that the consequences of their decision are out of their control and extend well beyond their fate and fortune.

"The Box" is based on the short story "Button, Button," written by Richard Matheson, an American author of short stories, novels and screenplays, primarily of the science fiction, horror, and fantasy genres. His work includes "I Am Legend" in 1954, off which three films have been based, the most recent bearing the same title as the novel and starring Will Smith.

"Button, Button" was first published in 1970 in the June issue of "Playboy." A television adaptation of the short story was written for the "Twilight Zone" which aired on March 7, 1986. The teleplay version of the tale differed from the original. First, the sum of money offered in the television version was $200,000, four-times the original sum of $50,000. Second, the endings differ greatly, much to the dismay of Matheson who wrote the script for the teleplay under his pseudonym Logan Swanson.

In the original story, Norma receives the money in the form of insurance money collected after the death of Arthur, who dies after an incident where he is pushed onto train tracks. The "Twilight Zone" version ends with the ominous stranger returning to the Lewis family home the day after the button is pushed and takes the box back. The couple asks the stranger what will happen next, to which he replies that the box will be reprogrammed and offered to someone else with the same conditions. Before leaving, the stranger, focusing on Norma, says, "I can assure you it will be offered to someone whom you don't know." The feature film version of "The Box" is sure to offer a different take on the ending, adding more thrills, suspense, and action as the previous versions of the story.

The writer and director of "The Box," Richard Kelly ["Donnie Darko," "Southland Tales"] recalls first reading the short story "Button, Button" when he was a child. It was a story that had a "huge impression" on him. When writing the screenplay for the film, Kelly opted to keep the setting of the film in the 1970s, despite its then-futuristic feel because, "the concept of someone you don't know, which is inherent to the premise, doesn't really exist anymore," given the abundance of social networking sites and internet search engines.

He knew that if he had chosen to set the story in modern times, he would have had to add a scene where Norma searches for Arlington Steward [the mysterious stranger] online, and Kelly felt as if that would take away from the unknowingness of the film. He hopes that the film, "resonates with the audience of today despite the fact that it's set in 1976," given that Norma and Arthur Lewis live a lifestyle they cannot really afford and experience financial strain, a trend seen today given the economic crisis.

For Cameron Diaz and James Marsden, "The Box" was a new sort of challenge. Neither of them had read Matheson's short story before filming began, "not out of laziness," they explained in the interview, but because they wanted to focus on the script and how Richard Kelly had envisioned the story, not wanting to contaminate Kelly's vision.

For Diaz, who has primarily starred in comedies ["The Mask," "There's Something About Mary"] and dramas ["Any Given Sunday" and "Gangs of New York"] she embraced the change in role. She explains that she, "love[s] the liberties that sci-fi can take."

Marsden, who catapulted to stardom after portraying Cyclops in the first X-Men movie, enjoys doing different sorts of movies, saying that, "creatively, as an artist, it's nice to just change things up and do things differently."

"The Box" was written and directed by Richard Kelly, and stars Cameron Diaz, James Marsden, as well as Tony and Academy Award winning actor Frank Langella. It opens nationwide on Friday, Nov. 6.

Amherst teen prodigies to play NoHo

By Dave Mansfield
Collegian Correspondent

No one in the band is old enough to drive. Not even close. Yet the members of Who Shot Hollywood, all 14 and 15 years old, have produced their own records, played all over the country, and have already begun to endear themselves to larger acts such as The Fray and Man Man. Hailing from the heart of Amherst, Who Shot Hollywood will take their youthful and exuberant act to the stage at the Pearl Street Nightclub on Saturday night, along with other acts including Client #9, Mountain Interval and Bad Vibes.

The band formerly known as Bull's Eye formed in 2005 when they were mere elementary students. Although they have gone through numerous lineup changes since then, the band has always consisted of brothers Lucas and Dana Kendall. "I guess we got our start in music jamming out during karaoke at a birthday party," said bassist and lead singer Lucas. "I had never really taken bass lessons, Dana took some lessons on drums." The rest of the group includes Eamon Wick on keyboards and Lucas Graham on guitar, who is the cousin of one the band's close friends.

"I guess I would describe our style as garage rock," said Lucas. The guitar driven, noise-pop group has evoked comparisons to bands such as the Tokyo Police Club and more recently, the Pixies, who got their start at UMass. While flattered by these comparisons,

None of the Amherst teens who make up Who Shot Hollywood can drive, but by the age of 15 have accomplished much touring nationally with The Fray and Man Man.

Lucas and the rest of the band have a difficult time drawing comparisons or classifying themselves because they've experimented with so many different sounds and styles. "It's weird because we've changed so many times," said Lucas. Drawing from a myriad of influences, Lucas cited Daniel Johnston and the aforementioned Tokyo Police Club as two of his favorites.

Just in time for its show, Who Shot Hollywood will release its new album "Cat Ears" on Saturday. The album includes tracks "Renee" and "Who Shot Hollywood." Filled with some dissonant, distorted guitar riffs, cheery keyboard licks and some catchy melodies, "Cat Ears" represents a change from the band's previous work. "I actually don't really like any of our old stuff," said Lucas. "Our new album is really big, punk rocky, with a lot of synth noise." Lucas displays a little punk rock angst on "Who Shot Hollywood," with the lyrics "I hate your son, I hate the girls who make fun."

As far as the future goes, the band is living in the moment for the time being and taking things as they come. "We kind of started out just going to shows, handing out our demos to people," said Lucas. "Now we've got people wanting to play with us, and label attention, it's pretty cool." Back when they were Bull's Eye, they even opened up for radio friendly band, The Fray. The band was so impressed with their demo that they actually called them from their car after a show and asked them to open a show. Since then, Who Shot Hollywood has traveled pretty extensively, playing shows in New York, D.C., Omaha and New Orleans, just to name a few. They also made an appearance at the South by Southwest festival in Austin, Texas. They've played with Man Man on a couple of occasions, and also opened up for Ted Leo and their idols, Tokyo Police Club.

The band represents just part of the music that is being created by the Valley's youth these days. Opening act Client #9, an experimental, instrumental rock ensemble that has drawn comparisons to Mogwai and Explosions in the Sky, recently walked away with first place at the Amherst Regional Battle of the Bands.

Saturday's show begins at 7 p.m. and tickets cost $10 at the door. For more information, visit www.iheg.com.

1964 The Tribute aims to re-create the early touring years of the Beatles following their arrival in the U.S.

By Rachel Dougherty
Collegian Staff

Woodstock may be a page in a history book, but the sixties will live on this Saturday night when 1964 The Tribute recreates the sounds and styles of the Beatles at Calvin Theater in Northampton.

Named the "best Beatles tribute band in the world" by Rolling Stone Magazine, the Ohio-based 1964 The Tribute has been performing covers of the Beatles for more than 35 years. Their performance celebrates and commemorates the impact of the Beatles on rock and pop music.

What distinguishes 1964 The Tribute from other Beatles tribute bands is its concentration on the Beatles' early work. The majority of its songs are from albums predating the Beatles 1964 World Tour. So don't expect "Sgt. Pepper" or "Abbey Road." Rather, its set lists cover a large selection of lesser known songs such as "Please Please Me," "With the Beatles," "A Hard Day's Night" and "Beatles for Sale."

By concentrating on music from the Beatles' early years, 1964 The Tribute seeks to recreate the touring atmosphere from the Beatles' first arrival in the U.S. in 1964.

The ages of the band members, all seasoned musicians in their middle life, contributes to the quality of their imitation without detracting from the illusion of their performance. The American-born performers have mastered the vocal and physical inflections of the Beatles, recreating the Fab Four in every respect from their mop-top hairstyles to their Liverpool accents and body language.

In their performance they seek to create an authentic experience of the early Beatles but differ from the original band in terms of sound quality and set length.

Using larger speakers than those available to the Beatles in 1964, the band is able to amplify the sound and make it more accessible to the audience. The Tribute also plays longer set lengths than the original band; while the Beatles were known for playing two 30 minute sets and no encores in its early shows, 1964 the Tribute plays 45 minute sets and sometimes encores.

1964 the Tribute was formed in the early 1980s by Mark Benson, a guitarist who portrays John Lennon in the current band. Benson had performed in another Beatles tribute band known as The Revolver. When The Revolver broke up in 1981, Benson recruited musicians Gary Grimes and Tom Work, who portray Paul McCartney and George Harrison respectively. The band began performing in 1982 when Greg George was recruited as Ringo Starr. Greg George was later replaced by Terry Manfredi, who is the current Ringo for the group.

The band has since gone on to perform in concert halls, and at colleges and conventions across the U.S. and Canada. The Tribute has also been featured on Entertainment Tonight, PM Magazine, CNN, The U.S.A. Network, and the Nashville Network and was voted "Contemporary Music Artists of the Year" by the National Association for Campus Activities and "Campus Entertainers of the Year" by the Canadian Association for Campus Activities. The Tribute also appeared in a PBS special of the same name. Their discography includes the "PBS Soundtrack CD", "All You Need is Live" and "Nine Hours in November." Gary Grimes also has a CD of original work titled "Starhand Visions."

1964 the Tribute will play at 8 p.m. on Saturday night at the Calvin Theater in Northampton. Tickets run from $25 to $35 and are available online at the Calvin Theater web site.

Raekwon on stage and in the studio

Wu-tang veteran, Raekwon will perform at the Pearl Street Nightclub Saturday in promotion of his latest album, "Only Built 4 Cuban Linx...Part II." This is the second album from "the Chef," featuring verses from industry heavyweights. Audiences can expect a profound and diverse set from the legendary rapper.

Rap legend makes stop in NoHo

By Yoel Drachman
Collegian Correspondent

This Saturday night, Nov. 7th, at 9 p.m., Raekwon "the Chef," Sean Price and Hendersin will be playing at the Pearl Street Night Club in Northampton.

Hendersin, began his rapping career at age 10, using school events to showcase his lyrical and performance abilities. By the age of 17 he had begun recording songs and eventually released the street album, "Only the Strong Survive." Although still relatively unknown, Herdersin has been working diligently since this release to further his career, opening for Mr. Lif and Immortal Technique as well as attempting more solo projects.

Sean Price, a member of the hip-hop collective Boot Camp Clik, is a major name for this venue. He first rose to the forefront of the rap community as one half of the group Heltah Skeltah. Their first album, "Nocturnal," in 1996, is considered, by many, an underground classic and an essential hardcore hip-hop album. The album was able to sell around 250,000 copies and earned the duo a nomination for Best New Group by The Source magazine. The following year, the Boot Camp Clik [all 8 members, including Price] released their first collective album, "For the People." Although met with lesser reviews than "Nocturnal," the album sold slightly better and led to hyped anticipation of Heltah Skeltah's second album "Magnum Force." Sadly, the album was reviewed harshly, and fans bombarded the group with accusations of giving in to popular demands in order to garner higher sales. After the release of the album, the group broke up, allowing Price to pursue his solo career. So far, Price has released two albums as a solo artist, "Monkey Barz" in 2005 and "Jesus Price Superstar" in 2007, gaining him more critical acclaim as well as solid album sales.

The headlining act of the night, Raekwon "the Chef," is not only part of a legendary group, but he is a legend himself. Rae burst onto the scene as a prominent member of the Wu-Tang Clan, and with their debut "Enter the Wu-Tang (36 Chambers)," in 1993, announced himself as one of their top performers. Featured on nine of the 13 tracks on the album, and performing masterfully on all, Raekwon netted himself a contract with Loud Records in 1994. The following year, he released his first solo album, "Only Built 4 Cuban Linx..."

This album was highly lauded upon its release and its legendary status grows daily due to its complex soundscapes. One of the most influential and highly original rap albums of all time, "Cuban Linx," is known as a pioneer of the Mafioso Rap genre, with an emphasis on elaborate lyricism with Italian Mafia references. Since 1995, Raekwon has released three albums, including his latest, "Only Built 4 Cuban Linx...Part II," an attempted return at the gritty, street oriented style of his debut. The album has received positive reviews, and one can expect that Rae will be picking material off of this, his most recent release, at the upcoming show.

Rap artists come and go, but legends live on through their music and performance. This show will be an opportunity to watch two greats, as well as an up-and-comer do what they do best. The show will take place on Saturday, Nov. 7 at 9 p.m. at the Pearl Street Night Club in Northampton. For more information visit www.iheg.com

"The Chef's" latest street beats

By Noah Steinberg-Di Stefano
Collegian Staff

Wu-tang fans unite! Raekwon "The Chef" has led the group back to the hip-hop forefront with his latest solo album, "Only Built 4 Cuban Linx...Part II." The album, released on Sept. 8, features guest performances from all seven living members of the original Wu-Tang Clan and has been hailed by many industry insiders as the return of the gritty, raw style of hip-hop that launched the group into popularity in the 1990s.

Raekwon's Northampton show will promote his first solo album since 1995. During the nearly 15 year solo hiatus, "The Chef" has put out three albums with the Wu and spent the last few years cooking up his latest masterpeice. It remains to be seen if this installation of "Only Built 4 Cuban Linx" will match the critical acclaim of his first project. But his evolution as an MC has got a lot of critics talking.

The album features 22 tracks, all of which showcase an elevated style of lyricism while staying true to the raw street rap that Raekwon is known for. Now in his late 30s, Raekwon said in an interview with MTV News that he's in a much "different frame of mind" than he was when he made his first album.

When it comes to album production, Raekwon went with nothing but the best. The majority of beats on "Only Built 4 Cuban Linx... Part II" are produced by RZA, Dr. Dre, and the late great J Dilla. No autotune or phony synthesizers here. This is nothing but raw, base-thumping hip-hop with a roster of artists that looks like a rapper all-star team.

The album features verses from over 10 prominent artists, including Jadakiss, Styles P, Busta Rhymes, Slick Rick, Beanie Sigel and of course, the entire Wu-Tang Clan. Their performances add to the album's surprising diversity and help Raekwon assert himself as one of the most talented MC's in the game.

One of the most popular songs on the album, "New Wu," featuring Method Man and Ghostface Killah, serves as an emblematic example of Wu's evolution over the years. In a murderous third verse, Method Man outlines the clash of the gangsta' life-style versus family and responsibilities. "This what the block missing: the two-seater with the top missing' and two divas with the tops missing; now that's living to me, I'm what these kids is killing to be but I don't want my children to be."

A new side of Raekwon is on display on the track "Ason Jones," a tribute to Wu member and hip-hop icon ODB (Ol' Dirty Bastard), who died of a drug overdose in 1994. The melodic, tear-jerking ode to ODB sharply contrasts the cutthroat force of the other tracks on the album.

In a music genre that is still somewhat adolescent, Raekwon and his fellow Wu-Tang members can boast a staying power that other rappers can only dream of. The amazing thing is, after all the success and praise, they continue to improve and adapt to their audience. "Only Built 4 Cuban Linx ...Part II" is a prime example of that adaptation.

In the song "Kiss the Ring," Raekwon sends a subtle message to young rappers and lyrically speaks on his status as a veteran in the game. "So salute and toast to the best who done it/ murder rap I spit for the vets who love it." Tip your New-Era caps to "The Chef" and put your lighters in the air. Raekwon is back on the scene with a raw compilation that will remind you what real hip-hop is.

UM season ends at hands of Rams

By Mike Mastone
Collegian Staff

After sneaking into the Atlantic 10 tournament on the last day of the regular season, the Massachusetts women's soccer team could not carry any momentum into the postseason.

The Minutewomen (6-11-2, 5-6-0 A-10) dropped a 3-0 decision to Fordham in their first tournament appearance since 2004, and could not match the Rams intensity on offense. The team's recently improved defensive play also took a backseat, as the Rams came out firing and did not stop until the game's final 10 minutes. The Rams finished with a 27-7 shot advantage over UMass.

"The [team] battled hard, but I think the excitement got the best of us," UMass coach Angela Napoli said.

"We never got in a rhythm, and Fordham did a good job of keeping us under pressure and staying on top of us."

The Rams (9-11-1, 7-4-0 A-10) dominated the entire first half on both ends of the ball, coming out looking for an early lead and attempting five shots within the first four minutes, and nine within the first 11 minutes. Five different Rams attempted shots over that span. Senior Leah Loguidice led the way with five shots in the half, while junior Danielle Ingram and freshman Annie Worden each had three attempts.

UMass got off to a slow start and never recovered, recording just two shot attempts in the first 45 minutes, both belonging to junior Ashley Hamel. Both of Hamel's attempts fell in between the 18th and 24th minutes, while the rest of the Minutewomen could not shake an imposing Rams defense.

Worden supplied the first and only goal of the half for Fordham at the 30 minute, 24 second mark. Several players fought for control of the ball in the box until Worden deflected it in from 30 feet out for her sixth goal of the season on an assist by junior Lauren Nowakowski.

The only bright spot of the first half for UMass was the play of goalie Lauren Luckey. Aside from Worden's goal, the senior tallied six saves, and had another strong outing in her final game in a UMass uniform. Kittie Ruggles, Cristina Adams and Jacquelyn Desjardins also played in their final game for UMass.

The Rams picked up right where they left off in the second half, with Loguidice firing a shot within the first 36 seconds. Freshman goalie Emily Cota made three saves before allowing a goal by junior Michelle Ancelj at the 56:04 mark. Ancelj made a deep shot from 56 feet out on the far left side of the field, scoring her fourth goal of the season.

Over the next 15 minutes, the teams combined for four shots, with three belonging to UMass. The Rams struck again, extending their lead to 3-0 during the 71st minute, when freshman Megan Coolson took a deep pass from sophomore Mariella Romano and sent it soaring past Cota into the left side of the net.

Both teams were quiet for the rest of regulation. Redshirt junior Sydney Stoll had one last attempt at ending the shutout for the Minutewomen, but sent her shot to the right of the net.

"[The Fordham defense] was high pressure, and they just took us out of our groove," Napoli said. "They gave us no time to pick our heads up and find the open pass."

Stoll tied Hamel for the team lead with two shots, while junior Therese Smith, freshman Meredith Fox and sophomore Lindsey DiOrio combined for the team's other three attempts. Hamel and DiOrio accounted for UMass' three shots on-goal with Cota finishing with seven saves.

"It was definitely a success, but definitely tough as well," Napoli said of her first season at the helm. "We were trying to make changes, and it was just up and down. The fact that we finished six spots higher than the A-10 coaches predicted shows that we made huge improvements."

Mike Mastone can be reached at mmastone@student.umass.edu.

Christina Adams, Lauren Yelinek and Sydney Stoll look to stop a free kick. UMass fell to Fordham in the opening round of the Atlantic 10 Tournament Thursday night.

Clark and Rappe return to UMass

Daniel Herberholz
Collegian Staff

When young college students get sick, they tend to visit home.

With the Massachusetts men's and women's swimming and diving teams are fighting various illnesses, they face a different sort of homecoming.

Facing a SUNY-Binghamton team coached by two former Minutemen, both the Minutemen and Minutewomen hope to make it back-to-back home victories Saturday after sweeping Stony Brook last week.

The Bearcats' swim coach Sean Clark, a 1993 UMass graduate, was a freestyle and backstroke sprinter and co-captain his senior year.

"He's like my little brother," UMass men's coach Russ Yarworth, who coached Clark as an undergrad, said. "This is a big week for us to have him back here."

Also returning to Amherst is Binghamton diving coach Reuben "R.J." Rappe, who was the captain of the '07-'08 Minutemen diving squad.

The water, however, is emptier than usual, with a sweep of illnesses reaching both sides of the pool, as well as the diving team.

"I haven't been as concerned about a week with all the sickness," women's coach Bob Newcomb said. "We're just going to play it by ear."

According to Newcomb, Clark mentioned having similar illness problems this week.

"Between now and Saturday morning, things could change," Newcomb said.

"We're just going to wait and see who's healthy," Yarworth said.

If healthy, senior Juan Moliere, junior Jennifer Corriveau and freshman Amina Meho look to defeat close competition.

Moliere has twice finished at 21 minutes, 32 seconds in the 50-yard freestyle, less than a second faster than Binghamton's Joseph Perez-Rogers.

"[Corriveau] should have a great race," Newcomb said of her 100-yard backstroke race. Corriveau's most recent time (1:01.14 at Army) is just ahead of the number Bearcat Melissa Lindahl's put up against Boston University last week (1:01.41).

Bearcat junior Amanda Ciccone's 24.11 in the 50-yard freestyle is just 0.23 ahead of Meho's best time this past week against Stony Brook.

"Forcing her to race will be good," Newcomb said of Meho's race against Ciccone.

Both Bearcat swimming and diving teams lost last Saturday to Boston University, who the Minutemen defeated earlier this season.

"They just weren't at full strength," Yarworth said of Binghamton's loss to BU.

Despite bouts of team ailment, this weekend will be a return home for both Clark and Rappe.

Clark was part of three record-breaking relays as a member of the the Minutemen and was an assistant coach through 1996. He returned to Amherst in 2000 as an assistant coach, helping the team win four straight Atlantic-10 Championships.

"When he got here, he was a raw swimmer," Yarworth said of Clark. "I certainly learned a lot from coaching him, developmentally. He's worked well to apply the things he learned here as well as elsewhere in becoming the coach he is."

In 2004, Clark became Binghamton's head swim coach, followed by Rappe four years later.

Rappe was A-10's Most Outstanding Diver in 2008, and held the one- and three-meter school records for UMass. Current sophomore Jason Cook's three-meter score of 359.63 at BU last year beat Rappe's best of 323.08, and this year Cook overtook Rappe's record in the one-meter.

"R.J. is coming back too, and a few other guys from the last few years," Newcomb said. "It's an alumni event, it's a fun weekend."

Daniel Herberholz can be reached at danielherberholz@gmail.com.

The UMass swim team hopes to spoil the return of former Minutemen Sean Clark and R.J. Rappe, who currently coach at SUNY-Binghamton.

Minutewomen head to Dartmouth Regatta

By Neil Carroll
Collegian Staff

As the temperature gets colder and the season starts to change, the Massachusetts crew team rows on in its fall season.

However, this week the UMass lineup will be sporting a different look.

The Minutewomen will be competing in the Dartmouth Head Regatta in Hanover, N.H. on Saturday, but the race is only for novice rowers. The varsity rowers will have another week off, as they continue to train and condition for their more competitive schedule in the spring semester.

The Dartmouth Head race will feature all freshman rowers, but the boats in the races have to be made up of balanced experience levels.

"You have to make even boats," UMass coach Jim Dietz said during the team's week off. "If you have experienced people, they have to be mixed with people that just started rowing this year."

The UMass roster lists that six out of the seven novice rowers are freshman. The novice program however consists of another 30 girls who have been working out with the team since September.

The mix of talent levels in each boat presents a good opportunity for novice rowers to gain experience in their first race atmosphere.

"[The novice rowers] will be rowing with some of the experienced people, and [the Dartmouth Head] is still kind of an introduction to the sport for novices, without them getting really clobbered over their heads," Dietz said.

The freshmen rowers who are listed on the roster include Sarah Brown, Tory Gordan, Kaitlyn MacKenzie, Noreen McDonnell, Caitlyn O'Leary, Michaela Strentfield, and Ariadne Zamelis. These rowers mainly concentrate on strength training and developing their skills for the next year because they don't officially compete in races, besides the all-novice races.

The UMass novice team is coached mainly by assistant coach Alex Binkowski, who is in his third year here at UMass as an assistant.

The rowers in the 2013 class that Binkowski deals with make up one of the largest recruiting classes in recent years.

The Minutewomen train in a philosophy that is rare throughout the team-oriented rowing world, but has helped the team achieve success so far this fall season.

"Our main focus has been to be in small boats to get better skills, so that when we do get in the big boats, we can get them going faster."

This unusual training method has aided the Minutewomen individually and in the team boats. Sophomore Julia Richter leads the singles rowers for the team after she finished first at the Head of the Fish two weekends ago with a time of 14 minutes, 23.73 seconds. The team as a whole took five first-place finishes in its last competition.

This week's race will be on a section of the Connecticut River that bisects Vermont and New Hampshire.

After this week's regatta, the Minutewomen only have one more competition. On Nov. 14 they will again send mostly novice rowers to race in the Foot of the Charles Regatta in Boston.

Power–play producing for surging Minutemen

Marcou grabs monthly award

By Jay Asser
Collegian Staff

If Niagara doesn't limit the Massachusetts hockey team's power-play opportunities this weekend, it could be in for a long day, unlike the many closely contested games the team has played in this season.

The Minutemen (4-1-0, 3-1-0 Hockey East) and Purple Eagles (0-5-1, 0-0-0 College Hockey America) will square off in a home-and-home series beginning Friday at the Mullins Center and concluding Sunday at Dwyer Arena, after previously meeting on only four other occasions.

Though Niagara has yet to come up with a victory this season, it has had a tough schedule, playing each opponent down to the wire, resulting in five of its contests being decided by one score or less.

If the Purple Eagles hope to keep the games close this weekend, they will have to stay out of the penalty box against a high-powered UMass offense.

Heading into the weekend, the Minutemen rank sixth in the nation and first in the Hockey East in scoring offense, averaging 3.8 goals per game. On the other side of the puck, UMass is second in the conference in scoring defense, allowing 2.4 goals per game. In three of their five games, the Minutemen have scored five goals, and are 4-0 in contests where they score at least three times.

The specialty of the offensive attack, however, is the power play, which has accounted for most of UMass' goals this season (11-of-19). Their man-advantage unit ranks third best in the country and tops in the Hockey East, going 11-for-36, a 30.6 percent success rate.

The top line for the Minutemen, which consists of James Marcou, T.J. Syner, and Casey Wellman, has been able to create a lot of offense. The line itself has been responsible for 22 of the team's 55 total points this year.

UMass coach Don Cahoon has been pleased with the unit's play on the man-advantage, but wants them to perform better when opponents are at full strength.

"It's a great weapon on the power play because that's where they get all [of] their goals," Cahoon said. "Five-on-five, it's got to become more of a weapon."

Though the Minutemen have had strong performances from their top line, the scoring has been very much spread around. UMass boasts 10 different players who have scored at least once, 15 who have recorded at least one point, and four different players who have scored game-winning goals.

"It's hard for teams to defend you when they know the offense could come from a lot of different sources," Cahoon said. "Having a defensive core that is capable of producing some offense makes our team a little bit more difficult to zone in on in terms of defending."

Injuries setting in

As well as the Minutemen have played this season, it hasn't been without a few bumps and bruises.

Chase Langeraap has had difficulties returning to the ice after getting hurt in the beginning of the season. According to Cahoon, Langeraap has experienced two or three different problems that have held him back.

Syner will be sitting out on Friday, which will affect UMass' top line and give it a new look.

Fortunately for the Minutemen, the roster has been bolstered in the offseason, allowing UMass to not miss a beat when a player goes down.

"Injuries are a part of the equation," Cahoon said. "One of the things we've been able to do of late is recruit a team that offers some depth, so someone's misfortune becomes someone's opportunity."

Marcou honored by Hockey East

After finishing October with 11 points on two goals and nine assists, 2008-09 All-American James Marcou was named the Hockey East Player of the Month for the second time in his career.

The junior forward ranks third nationally in points and sixth in assists, as well as leading the Hockey East in points, power-play points and assists this season.

"He's everything you could hope for in an offensive dynamic player at the college level," Cahoon said. "It's a well deserved award, but as James knows, that's ancient history right now, so we're just moving forward."

UM faces winless Purple Eagles Fri.

By Nick O'Malley
Collegian Staff

The No. 19 Massachusetts hockey team takes a break from Hockey East play this weekend with a home-and-home series against Niagara. The Minutemen host the Purple Eagles on Friday, and travel to Niagara Sunday for an afternoon game.

UMass (4-1-0, 3-1-0 Hockey East) is off to one of its best starts in recent history, with its first loss coming in last weekend's split against Providence. On paper, the Minutemen seem to have a big advantage against the winless Purple Eagles (0-5-1, 0-0-0 College Hockey America). UMass coach Don Cahoon, though, says that Niagara is a much more dangerous team than its record indicates.

"Niagara hasn't won a game yet," Cahoon said. "However, they've gone to Michigan, a one-goal game, [and] they've lost a game in overtime to Cornell. Those are two of the most difficult rinks in college hockey to play in, [and] they lost an empty-net goal game to Colgate."

"They've played everybody they've played, tooth and nail, and they haven't had a home game. I look at this and I say, 'This team is going to compete, and it's going to be a hell of a game,'" Cahoon said.

The Minutemen are 4-0 all time against the Purple Eagles, winning their most recent contest 6-2 on Dec. 1, 2006. Such success, though, is the exact thing that Cahoon says the Minutemen cannot afford to get lost in.

"Coming off the loss to Providence, we can't get bogged down with who we're playing and what they've accomplished," Cahoon said. "There's not a team on our schedule that can't beat us. So, we simply have to get ourselves prepared to compete and play."

However, the Minutemen do have all of the odds in their favor. UMass Hockey East-leading 3.8 goals per game dwarfs Niagara's 2.7. On defense, the Minutemen have allowed 2.4 goals per game compared to the Purple Eagles' 3.7 average.

Where UMass has the greatest advantage, though, is on the power play. Playing with the man advantage has been the key to offensive success so far this year for the Minutemen, who are currently ranked third in the nation with a 31 percent conversion rate of the power play. Niagara, meanwhile, has only one power-play goal on 25 chances, good for a four percent conversion rate.

In goal, UMass goalkeeper Paul Dainton's performance this season currently outshines the collective effort of the three players Niagara has played in goal. With junior Adam Avramenko seeing the bulk of the time between the pipes, the Purple Eagle's goalies have combined for a 3.54 goals against average and a 0.891 save percentage. Dainton, meanwhile has a 2.41 goals against average and a 0.928 save percentage, playing every minute in goal this season for UMass.

What the teams have in common, though, is that they've both been outshot by their opponents on the season. The Purple Eagles have been outshot 202-174 on the season. Meanwhile, though a narrow margin, opponents have outshot the Minutemen 166-165. In fact, the only game in which UMass outshot the opponent was in the loss to the Friars.

Such numbers though won't matter this weekend for Cahoon, who isn't looking at his team as having an advantage.

"We can't even be concerned about what they've done or what they haven't done," he said. "We've got to be concerned about getting ourselves moving in the right direction, and taking care of Friday night and worrying about anything after that after."

For Cahoon, Niagara's winless record is more of a concern than a relief, saying that any team that has come as close as they have will be both desperate and dangerous.

"Every game offers a set of difficulties, and there's a difficulty going into this game dealing with a wounded team. Like fighting a wounded animal, they're going to be scrapping for everything they can get, and then Sunday we'll deal with that on Sunday."

Kellogg and Co. host Golden Eagles at MC

By Adam Miller

It's just an exhibition game. Regardless of what happens, Saturday's match-up isn't going to make a difference and the statistics aren't going to count.

But after nearly losing to Dowling in 2008, Massachusetts men's basketball coach Derek Kellogg's first game as a head coach, he wants to make sure that doesn't happen again.

Last year, the Minutemen pulled off a 91-87 victory over the Golden Lions, as guard David Seagers put up 32 points while keeping his team in the game.

"They played us really tough last year," Kellogg said, and isn't sure if the match-up the second time around will be any easier.

UMass was supposed to play a closed-door scrimmage against Boston University last Saturday, but several Terriers came down with influenza, and Kellogg didn't want to risk his players getting sick.

However, Kellogg wanted his team to play someone other than themselves before playing in front of the Mullins Center crowd, and arranged a scrimmage with what he described as a "make-shift group of guys" on Thursday night.

According to NCAA rules, the scrimmage cannot be seen by the public or media, and no official scores or statistics can be kept, except for private use. But Kellogg sees the scrimmage as an opportunity to evaluate his players heading into the exhibition game.

"I think our guys are tired of going against each other every night," Kellogg said.

One of the things Kellogg still wants out of his team is for it to improve it half-court defense. He also knows that just like last year, Dowling will play a zone defense, which is something the Minutemen aren't used to playing.

Although Kellogg would like a better win than last year, he is also looking mostly at what his players can do, and how they react to different situations. He would like to play the entire bench, and try out different combinations to see which mix of players will make UMass more competitive by the regular season.

Kellogg will also look at the conditioning of his team, specifically the big men, in order to see how much he will need to shuffle his four frontcourt players [Hashim Bailey, Sean Carter, Raphael Putney and Trey Lang] during games throughout the season.

That's why, despite his feeling that his team isn't ready, he expects Dowling to be a good challenge, especially with last year's result.

Prior to last year's game against the Golden Lions, Kellogg felt more comfortable with his team because of their experience. But with five freshmen, two transfer students and players who for one reason or another aren't used to the Minutemen's system, he doesn't see this year's team as ready for the regular season.

"I think we'll be ready to play a game, but we won't have half of our stuff in," Kellogg said. "It will be kind of a work in progress. We won't have our full-court man-to-man in, and we won't have plays and sets in."

The amount of preparation that UMass needed last year wasn't quite as crucial because its first game was against Arkansas-Monticello, who the Minutemen beat 90-71.

This year, Kellogg and Co. face similar fortune in facing an inexperienced team, but a squad that is much more talented than UAM. He feels that his team's first game against Central Florida – who has six freshmen and two redshirt freshmen – is similar in style and readiness with his own team, and will be a good first opponent.

UMass ranked first, hosts weekend slate

Amherst hosts the four best Division II club rugby teams next Saturday, as the Northeast Regional Tournament begins this weekend and concludes next weekend.

The No. 25 Massachusetts club rugby team hopes to be participating in those matches, as opposed to watching them, as it plays a quarterfinal match on Saturday, boasting the top seed in the tournament.

Following an upset of the No. 1 team in the country last weekend and a New England Club Rugby Union Championship, the Minutemen are poised to claim their next title and a bid to the National Championships.

"The boys are really focused, and they're looking forward to continuing their run," UMass coach Al Baker said.

Last Saturday, No. 25 UMass (8-1) handled Middlebury, 34-3, in a one-sided match that saw the Minutemen hold the highest scoring team in the division (42 points per game) to its lowest point total of the season.

UMass avenged its most lopsided defeat in recent memory, a 110-0 loss to the Panthers last season, when the Minutemen recorded their most uneven victory in five games.

Regardless of UMass' victory over the Panthers, Middlebury will have an opportunity to vie for the Northeast Title as the second seed.

The tournament pits teams from three conferences against one another for the chance to move on to the National Championship Tournament. The eight qualifiers earned their spots by virtue of their success in their respective conference tournaments and the credentials of each conference.

The Minutemen earned their bid to the Northeast Regional Tournament on Oct. 24, during the NEC quarterfinal matchup against Bentley. UMass won, 17-12, scoring twice in the final 20 minutes of the game to top the pesky Falcons and advance to the semifinals.

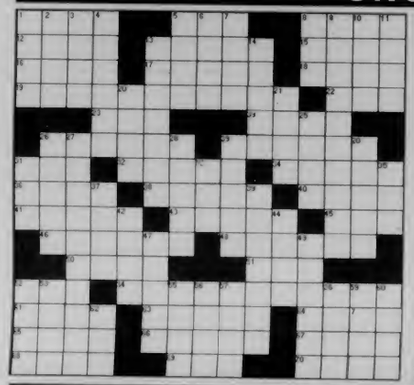
Two victories last weekend including a 22-12 win over Boston University ensured UMass a No. 1 seed in the tournament.

The Minutemen will await the arrival of Southern Connecticut (7-1), which hasn't lost in its last four matches. The Owls play a fast-paced game, and enter the tournament having beaten Iona on Sunday. The team comes in scoring 31.5 points a game, while giving up 13.12.

The Owls finished second in the Metropolitan New York Rugby Conference only to Stony Brook, who finished atop the conference. The Seawolves took out the Owls, 27-19, in a match played on Oct. 4. Stony Brook is the third seed in this weekend's tournament, and will take on the Terriers.

The New York State Rugby Conference brings two squads to Amherst in fourth-seeded Buffalo State and seventh-seeded Hamilton College. Each team won their respective brackets (Empire East and West), and came out with close victories in the NYS Tournament to earn their spots.

Buffalo State edged out Rochester, 12-10, while Hamilton topped Hobart, 15-7. With identical records, the Bengals beat out the Continentals in seeding by way of a higher season point total (169-163).



Buffalo State will stay in New York to host Vermont while Hamilton will travel to Middlebury.

Senate candidates debate at UMass

By Sam Butterfield
Collegian Staff

On a night filled with spirited dialogue, one voice was noticeably absent from the League of Women Voters senate candidate forum held Sunday in Bowker Auditorium on the campus of the University of Massachusetts.

Massachusetts Attorney General Martha Coakley, often called the frontrunner in the special election race to fill the senate seat left vacant by the late Sen. Ted Kennedy, was the only candidate who did not appear at last night's forum, and the rest of the candidates appeared to take note.

City Year founder and Democratic candidate Alan Khazei several times took aim at Coakley, calling for weekly televised debates leading up to the Democratic primary Dec. 8 and suggesting her refusal to debate could be because of her connections to lobbying interests.

Khazei was not the only one who called for more discourse. Recent entry to the race and Republican dark horse candidate Jack E. Robinson called for a Republican-only forum, criticizing opponent Scott Brown for refusing to debate him individually.

The forum, hosted by the Massachusetts League of Women Voters and in cooperation with Amherst National Public Radio affiliate WFCR, was marked by a civil tone, as the candidates took no serious personal jabs at each other beyond policy challenges.

The event was moderated by Bob Paquette, host of WFCR's Morning Edition program. Before the dialogue began, UMass Chancellor Robert Holub and President of the Massachusetts League of Women Voters Zoraro Bennett gave opening remarks.

The candidates were given two minutes each to answer questions, followed by two rounds of one-minute rebuttals before shifting subjects. Before turning the floor over to the candidates, Paquette stressed that there were to be no personal attacks and that the audience should hold its applause until the end.

From there, Paquette moved to what everyone had been waiting for, the substance of the forum, beginning by asking the candidates their thoughts on the federal government's role in the economy.

Pagliuca was the first to give his take, stating that "first, we need strong regulations." He said that Massachusetts' current number of unemployed citizens, 320,000, "resulted from a lack of regulation," citing his experience in the business world as evidencing his knowledge that people will cut corners when they are left unregulated.

Pagliuca furthered that regulation "needs to be principles-based," adding that allowing non-banking institutions to give loans, part of what contributed to America's subprime mortgage crisis, allowed businesses to offer poor deals to uninformed consumers without being stopped. He said he would create a consumer financial protection agency, and that "this

Students and locals react to candidates Sunday

By Nick Bush
Collegian Staff

With a varied field of candidates currently hoping to fill the Commonwealth's vacant U.S. Senate seat in the Dec. 8 primary, hundreds of students and locals turned out for Sunday night's panel discussion at the University of Massachusetts Bowker Auditorium to get a better understanding of those in the race.

Five of the six candidates now campaigning for the late Ted Kennedy's seat in the U.S. Senate took part in the forum sponsored by the League of Women Voters, including Democrats U.S. representative Michael Capuano, Celtics co-owner Stephen Pagliuca and City Year founder Alan Khazei, as well as Republicans Jack E. Robinson and State Senator Scott Brown.

The absence of the apparent front-runner of the race, Massachusetts Attorney General Martha Coakley, seemed to upset many in the forum's audience.

"I think the election is still up in the air, and [Coakley] should not feel so comfortable," said Amanda Dickenson, a political science major and former Coakley supporter. "Not attending the forum out here seems really arrogant on her part, especially since she's from North Adams. She shouldn't just automatically assume that people in Western Massachusetts will vote for her."

"If Coakley thinks western Massachusetts is important, then why isn't she here?" said Nick Barton, a political science major at UMass. "The same could be said about Capuano getting up and leaving halfway through."

Capuano did in fact exit the panel early, departing after the third debate topic. His campaign cited fatigue from travelling to Washington to vote for health care legislation this weekend, which passed the House by a vote of 220-215 late Saturday night.

"I walked in supporting Brown," said UMass freshman Garrett Gowen. "But until Capuano left, I was really starting to like him and what he was saying."

"Ted Kennedy was my senator here in Massachusetts for all of my life thus far," said Richard Purtle, a Capuano supporter and former UMass student who now lives in Buckland, Mass. "While it's impossible to fill his shoes, [Capuano] comes the closest, and has the integrity and vision that we need right now. He was one of only 15 U.S. Congressmen to oppose the Patriot Act back when it passed."

"I'd describe myself as a [Blue Dog] Democrat," said Tony Prentakis, an undecided Watertown, Mass. resident who drove out to Amherst to see the panel.

UMass fails to reach Atlantic 10 Tourney

By David Brisett
Collegian Staff

For the first time since 2006, the Massachusetts men's soccer team will not be participating in the Atlantic 10 Tournament.

After beating Richmond, 2-1, on Friday afternoon the Minutemen (7-7-3, 4-5-0 A-10) fell to George Washington, 3-0, Sunday afternoon, but had all ready been eliminated from making the tournament with Rhode Island and Charlotte both winning on Friday.

The Colonials, who were knocked out of any chance of playing in the A-10 tournament with a 4-1 loss to URI Friday, used a hat trick by senior forward Andy Stadler to get past the Minutemen in their final game of the season.

In the 20th minute, Stadler put GW up when he scored his 11th goal of the year on assists from Nikolay Aleksandrov and Mike Rollings. Stadler had a career high in assists with two against the Minutemen back in 2006, with that game ending in a 3-0 victory for the Colonials.

The Minutemen held a 7-6 shot advantage at halftime and seemed to have opportunities to score from forward Mark DeSantis, defender Andrew Henshaw and midfielder Matthew Hess.

However, a red card was issued to sophomore forward Chris Roswess, and UMass was forced to play a man down for the remainder of the game. With Roswess out for the rest of the contest, GW was able to capitalize, as Stadler added his second goal on the afternoon in the right side of the net. Rollings passed to sophomore Yoni Berhanu who then found Stadler at the top of the Student struck by car Saturday

By Angela MacGray
Collegian Correspondent

While he was out collecting donations for the homeless on Halloween night in participation with a MassPirg charity program, a student from the University of Massachusetts was struck by a car on Triangle St. in Amherst at around 7:30 p.m.

James Greene, a UMass senior, was out "trick or canning" for canned food donations on Oct. 31 as part of the "Campaign against Hunger and Homelessness" with his fellow members of the UMass student chapter of MassPirg, a non-profit organization that deals with issues facing Massachusetts residents. Greene had just left the DB Mart and began to cross the street near Bertucci's restaurant when he was struck by a white sedan. According to Greene, the sedan did not have its headlights on. He added that he also recalled hearing shouts right before he was hit but he did not have enough time to react.

According to authorities, a young woman who was driving in the white sedan was turning north onto Triangle St. when Greene ran out in front of the car. Authorities added that the woman could not stop in time and yelled to get Greene's attention. Greene hit the hood of the sedan and broke through the windshield. He remained conscious after being hit while bystanders immediately called for help. Greene was rushed to Bay State Hospital in Springfield and was later released around 10 p.m. with injuries to his forehead. Lieutenant Robert Young of the Amherst Police Department said that that driver has not received any citations as there was no crosswalk where Greene was trying to get across the street.

According to Greene, he said he was lucky to have escaped with a near clean bill of health.

Though he added, "It was hard to walk on Sunday, and there's gravel or something embedded in my left foot, which is swollen."

When asked about the cuts on his forehead, Greene said they "made one hell of a Halloween costume."

CAMPUS PERSPECTIVES

What do you have to say about this UMass issue?

Should UMass have cancelled Ray Luc Lavasseur's speech scheduled for Thursday thanks to protests over his past history as a radical?

Doug Sousa, senior
Natural resource major

"I think the event should not have been cancelled. Our country was founded on the principle of freedom of speech. War is profitable for the government. Levasseur's point of view seems more peaceful."

Emily Vartabedian,
Kenesiology major

"I definitely feel like he should have been able to speak. I understand why the police department would be concerned. People need to take precautions, but should not infringe on a person's freedom of speech."

English major

"I think the University was right to cancel the lecture. He posed a serious threat in the past. Having [Levasseur] at UMass is potentially dangerous."

Somdatta Gangopadhyay
Education major

"It would have been better if he was given a chance to speak. I would have liked to go to this lecture; it's nice to see someone turn their life around."

whole situation should have already been fixed."

From there, Republican candidate Scott Brown took the floor.

Brown said that, with America's bailout package, its citizens are now its business partners, and thus have a stake in America's dealings.

"U.S. citizens now have a say in how they are going to compensate executives," he said, continuing to say that he believes, given America's current trade deficit and national debt, it should be cutting spending rather than expanding it."

"We just passed the stimulus," he said. "We should reduce taxes, that will stimulate economic activity."

"We need lower taxes so people have more money in their pockets," he continued.

Longtime Republican candidate Jack E. Robinson was next to weigh in. He blamed America's financial problems on the Federal Reserve making too many funds available without keeping track of where they ended up.

"The problem has been the Federal Reserve," he said, "the Fed opened the floodgates, we had a credit bubble and the granddaddy of them all, the housing bubble. We need to audit the Fed and find out where did this money go," he continued. Robinson suggested creating an oversight committee to track the Federal Reserve's spending.

From there, the floor passed to Congressman Michael Capuano, possibly the candidate at the forum with the most public support.

Capuano also blamed America's economic woes on lack of regulation.

"The problem," he said, "is lack of regulation that has been going on for 20, 30 years." Capuano blamed a lack of transparency for America's ails, and said that he is "committed to regulating industry." He said he would work to protect the unemployed and to create and save jobs, citing saving jobs as equally important to creating them. Lastly, Capuano said that, in terms of job creation, "I don't think the stimulus was big enough."

Civic organizer and charity founder Alan Khazei then had his turn, stating that his career in public service has shown him how and where citizens are negatively impacted by the current set of issues facing America.

Pagliuca also called for increasing Pell grants to help students fund college, and argued that "if we can't reform finance and healthcare, we won't create jobs," continuing to suggest that "we need to invest in bio and clean technology to keep people in the state."

Brown, for his part, held that Massachusetts' administration was not using its stimulus money well, repeating that the Commonwealth is number 49 in using its stimulus money.

The topic then shifted to the environment, with the candidates asked their thoughts on an international treaty on climate change and the US's role in helping developing nations build their economies while helping the environment.

Capuano was first, stating that "the federal government should be recreating the economy along green energy lines," calling green energy "the leading technology of the day."

Capuano said that Massachusetts "understands entrepreneurial research," and that, because of that, it will be a leader in developing the green energy industry.

He called for a treaty "along the lines of Kyoto," and renewed a push to develop the long dormant Cape Wind project to build a wind farm off Cape Cod.

Khazei said that he would vote for a climate change treaty immediately, and that he believes the energy lobby is curbing the fight to stop climate change.

"The reason this bill is stopped in the Senate is because of the energy lobby," he said, "and I'm not taking that money."

Khazei advocated for a combination package of solar, wind and biofuel technologies and said he would like to see a collaboration between research institutions like universities, private energy companies and politicians to develop green energy strategies. He likened the situation to the one that created the National Institute of Health, and said he would move to start "a clean energy NIH."

Pagliuca called the green energy push "a win-win situation," targeting a 15-year timetable for reducing carbon emissions. He said he believes Massachusetts can reduce carbon by 50 percent by 2025, and that he supports the Copenhagen climate treaty. He said he supports a cap and trade system, noting that it has worked to curb emissions and increase green energy production in Europe.

Should Amherst invite former detainees?

Doing the right thing

Brian Benson

This past week, the town of Amherst passed a resolution to extend an invitation to two Guantanamo detainees. First, let us briefly discuss who these people are.

The two men are Ahmed Bel Bacha and Ravil Mingazov, who hail from Algeria and Russia, respectively. In 2007, military officers determined Bel Bacha to not be a threat to the safety and security of the United States. According to Amherst Town Meeting member Ruth F. Hooke, Bel Bacha was put into captivity by the United States in Pakistan in 2001. He had left the United Kingdom, where he was seeking political asylum from death threats he received in 1999. Mingazov converted to Islam and moved to Afghanistan and then Pakistan.

Having a high standard of evidence and objectivity in the courts is absolutely essential to a truly just legal system.

There, he was seized and taken to Guantanamo Bay under suspicion of being connected to known Al Qaeda operatives.

While the United States Congress seems to now be skeptical of whether or not these men are guilty, it is quite understandable to take what Congress has to say with a grain of salt. After all, Congress both allowed these detentions to take place and is now attempting in many cases to retract them. Somewhere along the line, Congress made a big mistake either in the former or latter case, and has lost more of its credibility. It cannot be clear whether Congress is doing this due to legitimate legal and moral reasons, or simply because it is under enough public pressure to do so.

Either way, the local resolution to extend the invitation to these two men has already been passed. Be this as it may, there is no guarantee the Amherst area will see either of these people in the first place. And while there is reason to be weary of Congress, we need to be objective about how we proceed. There are a lot more obstacles that will keep these two men from posing any kind of serious threat to the community.

First, according to the Amherst resolution, the municipality will not be using any tax dollars to support these people. This means that they will come with no financial or housing support, which would be enough to deter most people from going anywhere in a foreign country – if they even decide to accept the invitation at all.

Second, if these men settle here, anyone can bet bottom dollar that they will live under surveillance from government agencies or private citizens, whether legally or not. If either of them conspire to commit an act of terrorism, he will likely be caught – this time for legitimate and verifiable reasons even if it that were previously not the case.

Third, none of this will come to fruition if Congress decides not to lift the ban on allowing detainees to settle in the United States. It is very possible this will never happen, as few Congressmen want to be responsible for any domestic attack that may happen as a result of their unleashing captives. This is especially true since the ban seems to be generally popular nationally, and Congressmen do not want to harm their chances for re-election.

Of course, this all assumes these people are enemies of the United States at all.

Also, remember that the whole world is watching how we are treating the issue of the Guantanamo detainees. Numerous human rights groups and foreign nations have duly taken note of past abuses and recent actions toward policy change. With the image of the United States seriously tarnished and in need of a boost, releasing some of them will certainly not hurt our international relations.

But this is not really the principled aspect of the issue. Perhaps more importantly is how our judicial system has become an unacceptable approximation of the philosophically sound ideal mandated by the federal Constitution. Having a high standard of evidence and objectivity in the courts is absolutely essential to a truly just legal system.

Detaining anyone for any reason without due reason and evidence is an assault these principles. Perhaps we may not care so much when foreign captives are denied habeas corpus because it does not concern us directly. But, as with all erosions of principles, this one is likewise gradual. And we are going to have to start caring if our government uses such a policy on us.

If nothing else, these recent developments may send a message to our government regarding something greater than how we decide to treat a couple of people: There is a limit to what is an acceptable divergence from these ideals, and that limit is being approached rapidly.

Meet the Detainees

Shera Demchak

At Amherst Town Meeting last Wednesday, residents approved the Amherst Select Board's invitation to Guantanamo Bay inmates Ahmed Bin Saleh Bel Bacha and Magil Mingazov. But I doubt these detainees will truly be welcomed into the Amherst community.

Who exactly are these men and what evidence defines them as suspected terrorists? If a person is accused of a crime as serious as terrorism, I would at least like to meet him face-to-face before inviting them to be my neighbor. From The Guantánamo Docket, a New York Times database of Pentagon files on Guantanamo inmates, I have put together a summary:

If we will invite them, we will shake their hands. We will look them in the eye. But we will not trust them.

Ahmed Bin Saleh Bel Bacha is a citizen of Algeria and has been detained for seven years. In 2001, he obtained a false French passport, costing $1,200, which he used to travel to England. There, he attended sermons by Abu Hamza al-Masri. The notorious Abu Hamza preaches that it is a Muslim's duty to kill non-believers. Guardian.co.uk published this excerpt from one of his speeches: "The size of the knife – you cannot slaughter him with this. You have to stab him here and there until he bleeds to death. Then you can cut up the meat as you like to, or leave it to the maggots. This is the first stage of Jihad." Bel Bacha has had the opportunity to meet three Al Qaida leaders. In November 2001, at the approach of the U.S. Army, he fled into the mountains from an arms training camp in Jalalabad, Afghanistan. He was later captured on the Pakistan-Afghanistan border. He states that he does not want anything to do with the Armed Islamic Group because they are "terrorists and very bad people." For this, he is being released.

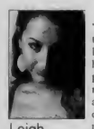
Magil Mingazov is a citizen of Russia and has been detained in Guantanamo Bay for over seven years. He converted to Islam while serving in the Russian army and he immigrated to Afghanistan in March 2000. When he heard about recruitment at a terrorist training camp, he visited, on a whim, to find out how the Arabs there trained. He attended the camp for one month. Mingazov then attended bomb-making lessons in the Kara Karga region because "it was boring in Bagram, Afghanistan, and there wasn't anything to do." For two weeks, he learned how to make explosives from fertilizer and ammonia and how to synthesize various poisons. Mingazov has never met Osama bin Laden. But, he admits he has been "forced" to attend his speeches. He was captured in Pakistan with a number of Al Qaida suspects. Mingazov says he does not want to live in Russia, but "in a nice country among Muslims." He is willing to share criminal information for U.S. or European citizenship.

These men intentionally affiliated themselves with anti-American terrorist organizations. How can we believe them when they tell us are not interested in being terrorists? They did not stumble across these training camps and terrorist rallies. They were men on a mission.

But whatever plans they had, we ruined them when we locked them up for seven years. If they disliked our country seven years ago, wouldn't they dislike it even more now? They have concrete reasons to hate America. They aren't just bitter taxpayers.

I am, to say the least, uncomfortable to have people with violent histories live nearby. I grew up in a neighborhood with a convicted sex offender. Even though the man had served his sentence, no parent would let their children play outside unsupervised. He was always watched and avoided.

If we will invite them, we will shake their hands. We will look them in the eye. But we will not trust them.



I believe deep down and no matter how liberal, each Amherst resident has their reservations. Even though some Amherst citizens are completely prepared to accept a detainee, they should still respect the insecurity of their neighbors. Sure, we stand for freedom and social justice, but our own people come first. Ahmed Bin Saleh Bel Bacha and Magil Mingazov might have changed their radical views after seven years of incarceration, but only they know for sure.

The members of the Amherst Select Board think that by inviting these men to live in our community, we are demonstrating trust in their innocence. This invitation is foolish and ignorant of the insecurity of others. Would it be fair if these men live across the street from a resident who voted "No?" Those who support this invitation feel they are setting an example of kindness to the world, but they are only adding to Amherst's reputation for eccentric liberalism.

But let's imagine Barack Obama does take them seriously. The FBI will probably buy the shack across the street. Restrictions? No pilot licenses, no fertilizer and no ammonia. Hopefully, Mingazov and Bel Bacha will get "bored" with all the college parties.

America and Africa

Leigh Greaney

The word "xenophobia" gets thrown around a lot. It drips out of history books and politically correct conversations about foreign countries. It tries to label the act of "othering" – this process of hating what you don't know and slamming a red stamp of disapproval on anything different.

I was in the back of a friend's car with my friend Nadia from Zimbabwe when I felt the weight of this stamp for the first time.

Stuck in traffic, we were waiting for movement and doing some mindless people watching. Nadia started laughing. "You know how I can pick out an American in Africa? They're covered in more relics than we are," she said, pointing out a girl on the sidewalk.

I looked at myself in the rear view mirror. I wondered if I was obviously American. I looked for features that would give me away. Even if I wasn't clad in Nyaminyami talismans or a dress made by my housecleaner like all the other international students, could I still be picked out of the crowd as an American?

I thought. I would ask the most honest people I've met thus far – my students at Sophumelela Secondary School. Nestled into Philippi, one of the larger townships in the Cape Flats, students from Sophumelela know the taste of poverty just as well as they know how sweet wealth can be.

I asked Siyavuya Gqumehlo, a 17-year-old third-year student, what she thought about America and at first, she just smiled. "Do you really want me to answer that?" she said. "I think Americans are ignorant. They think that Africa is just wild animals, cages and buildings. They think we live in the bush. They forget we're a developing country. They have so much. The money makes me angry. It's wasted through soccer players' bribes to play on certain teams for fortunes, and through these useless extra cars, mansions and clothes. Some have so little and Americans don't even touch all they have."

I was shocked to find out that this evil place of gluttony that she had just described was somewhere she wanted to live. She wanted to go to Los Angeles. She wanted to see how they live. She wanted to see the root of obsessions – especially over body image. She wanted to see this world Oprah Winfrey was trying to fix.

I asked her what three words describe America. She told me "Botox, Desperate Housewives and Obama." Obama was the only positive one.

I asked her what three words describe America. She told me "Botox, Desperate Housewives and Obama." Obama was the only positive one. She attached his name to "change" and to Nelson Mandela. "He stands for youth. We need that. We can never take that for granted. Here, gangsters run our lives. We have more killing here than you'll ever know – and it's in front of everyone. They make our hell and we just want to be safe. Maybe Obama can reach them."

Athenkosi Mahlwana, a 16-year-old second-year, interjected with the word "hope." He said, "Now, America is a great country. Now that it has hope. The world is going to be all right."

Ironically, Mahlwana doesn't want to live in this country that's up on a pedestal. "I'd like to see it, but I know I'll never get there from here. I'd like to study there, but I'm afraid of the crime. I've heard its bad there."

Crime? In America? Of course, I thought. But too much to visit? No way. Just to get into my house here in Cape Town, I have three keys to get into my front door. There's barbed wire around the tall cement walls that surround my house and backyard. At home, I have one key and no barbed wire. I'm still here.

Then, Mahlwana said something that really threw me off. "To be American is to be loved."

Gcobisa Sizani, an 18-year-old fourth-year student, thought that was just as wrong as I did. She gave him a glare that needed an exit wound.

She told me about how she thought Americans were ignorant. "The people are interesting, but they're not nice. They're arrogant, self-centered and have too much pride. They think they have it and all and that they don't have to worry. They're condescending and they think they're better than everyone else."

She told me when she thinks of America, she thinks of what she sees in movies and on Oprah or Tyra Banks' show. She thinks America is spoiled and wouldn't even consider visiting. She wouldn't want to look at wasted privilege that she would never see.

"I want to deserve what I work for – and to have earned it. That's real price," Gcobisa said. I think she was right. That's the image that comes off. Even though I know many people who work for what they have – and deserve it, I know many people who don't.

Gqumehlo said she did, too. She pointed out that the important xenophobia that South Africa deals with has nothing to do with Americans, but rather with the Zimbabweans. Most of their negative attitude towards America stems from the fact that South Africans feel misrepresented in America. It seems that from Bollywood's poisonous images of low self-esteem and compensation – America is misrepresented, as well.

One last moment of triumph

Alex Perry

This past week should have been a good one for all Americans, particularly conservatives, after the gubernatorial races in New Jersey and Virginia resulted in Republican victories. Everything was seemingly going in the right direction.

The country made a loud and clear statement to the Democrats in Congress that they are fed up with their out-of-control spending. Democrats should have had no choice but to look at theirselves in the mirror and realize that their far-left agendas were going to wind up costing them their positions in Washington. That's what should have happened, but how did Democrats really respond? They decided that now that their graves have been dug they may as well get the tombstones made up too.

This past weekend, the House of Representatives passed Nancy Pelosi's version of a bi-partisan health care bill. The bill was recently labeled "the worst bill ever" by a Wall Street Journal editorial.

To summarize the consequences of the bill's passage: disaster. As I have said in the past, the bill is going to cause massive increases in the costs of health care and is likely going to lead to rationing as a means for controlling costs. That is, in addition to the fact that the bill is going to cost an estimated $1.2 trillion at a time when the country already faces a record deficit. But for me, this isn't even the worst of the problems.

Unlike many of our government's blunders in the past, the damage that is now going to be done to our health care system cannot simply be reversed. It is one thing to raise taxes or tariffs, but it's another to completely overhaul the health care system. Raised taxes can be lowered, but the new health care system can never be fixed and everyone in the government knows it.

Unlike many of our government's blunders in the past, the damage that is now going to be done to our health care system is cannot simply be reversed.

This health care bill is going to mandate care to the approximately 30 million people who don't currently have it. It would be political suicide for any candidates in future elections to run for office with repealing it as part of their platform, regardless of how big of a flop the new system proves to be. If a candidate is telling 30 million people he is taking their health care coverage away, those 30 million people are highly unlikely to vote for that candidate. We're stuck with Obamacare.

That is why Democrats voted for this bill, even though they know it will mark the end of their majorities in Congress. Representatives should have been well aware of their putrid approval ratings and the growing disapproval with the direction of the country. However if they weren't aware, they definitely were notified when Jon Corzine lost re-election as governor of New Jersey despite outspending his opponent by a 3-to-1 margin and receiving the endorsement of President Barack Obama.

They also may have noticed Republican Bob McDonnell winning Virginia, a state Obama won in 2008, by an 18 percent margin. But this is all irrelevant to Democrats right now. Republicans are inevitably going to retake control of Congress, but they will never be able to repeal Obamacare. Democrats needed to seize the opportunity to push this bill through while they still held the political power to do so and they did it.

Honestly, I can't say this stuns me or makes me angry. I already knew this was going to happen when anti-Bush fever swept Republicans out of office last year. Not to say Republicans didn't deserve to be punished for their out of control spending, they did, and they were rightfully voted out, but now we must pay the price for putting Pelosi in power.

In the next 10 years we can all look forward to health care costs skyrocketing, probably doubling and tripling before the costs become too high for anyone to afford. At that point, there will be a public outcry for a change to the system and that will be to the only thing that can control health care costs: government run health care.

That will leave Obama and all his friends with what they have wanted all along. That's what liberals are striving for, that's the goal of this bill. Liberal politicians are playing political games with the future of our country and there is nothing anyone can do about it. Passing "the worst bill ever" and sacrificing the upcoming elections is a small price to pay for liberals who have been waiting their whole careers to make America as "progressive" as the European Union.

So much for the good week.

Dan Deacon to highlight Northampton Club

By Michael Walsh
Collegian Correspondent

When Dan Deacon invades the Pearl Street Night Club in Northampton tonight, the stage will be empty.

Audience members will find the 28-year-old Deacon out amongst his people, clutching his synthesizer setup, white knuckled, as he whips the crowd to a near psychotic frenzy.

Despite having two critically acclaimed albums under his belt, it is the live setting where Deacon thrives. With his gear set up on the floor, Deacon is free to move throughout the audience, never shy to bark out orders, instructing strangers to hold hands, craft impromptu dance circles and chant along with lyrics. If one didn't know any better, he or she might think they've wandered in on an over-caffeinated group of second graders participating in gym class.

Marked by hectic beeps and boops accompanied by pitched up vocals, instruction may not be necessary to get you grooving along to Deacon's music. There is an upbeat charm to his productions that can garner a feel-good tag, a label not commonly associated with electronic music.

Deacon is currently entering the home stretch of a 35-date fall tour that has gone from the east to west coast and back again, and is delighted with how it has gone thus far.

"We have a really good crew of folks out with us," says Deacon, specifically referencing opening act Nuclear Power Pants, who has completed Deacon's entire tour, including tonight's Pearl Street show. "We have been playing smaller venues this tour and it has allowed me to try out some new material."

Although it is solely Deacon's name adorning the cover of his albums, he is never one to shy away from collaborations. Last December in Brooklyn N.Y., Deacon unveiled a 16-piece ensemble featuring nine percussionists, two guitarists and a number of keyboardists from peer acts. The group toured throughout the spring in support of "Bromst," his most recent album.

This past summer, Deacon hit the road for a brief stint with Deerhunter and No Age, appropriately dubbed the No Deachunter tour. While at first glance the two lo-fi, guitar-driven acts might seem out of place sharing a bill with Deacon, they were able to link up through a common booking agent.

"The round robin tour was exciting because of the collaborations," says Deacon of their approach to these shows where all three acts took the stage at the same time, interlocking sets and assisting one another on many staples.

Deacon calls Baltimore, Md. home and speaks endearingly of the city, despite being well aware of the general perception the city earns from outsiders.

"It is an under-populated city, marked by urban decay and greed at the same time. It's often skipped over by touring acts that pass from Washington to New York and Philadelphia," says Deacon. "The isolation brings groups of people together and creates a bond."

Deacon's work "Wham City" is made up of a collection of artists based in the city, and has played a large part in crafting Deacon's current image. Fellow Wham City affiliate and filmmaker Jimmy Joe Roche and Deacon met at Purchase College where they were roommates and have since collaborated on numerous occasions. Roche is partly responsible for Deacon's introduction to his non-Baltimore fan base as he directed the video for Deacon's song "Crystal Cat," which quickly ballooned to a million views on YouTube upon its release in 2007. The video can be likened to a mash-up of Deacon's over-the-top live performance and a heavy acid trip. The closing track on Deacon's breakthrough album, "Spiderman of the Rings," bears Roche's namesake.

Tickets for tonight's Pearl Street performance will be available for $12 at the door. The show begins at 8:30 p.m. and opening acts include the aforementioned Nuclear Power Plants and local electronic musician Eric Hnatow.

Michael Walsh can be reached at mcwalsh@student.umass.edu.

Rob Thomas, of Matchbox 20 fame, will be showcasing his latest musical endeavor, titled "Cradlesong," which is said to be influenced by South American and African beats, rather than rock.

Rob Thomas set to rock in Boston on heels of new release

By Kate MacDonald
Collegian Staff

Tonight, Rob Thomas will take the stage at the City Performing Arts Center in Boston to sing songs from his new album "Cradlesong." Audience members can expect to hear hits from his multi-platinum debut "...Something to Be," as well as Matchbox 20 hits, the band from which Thomas got his fame. Thomas is set to perform after this summer's breakout band One Republic opens the show at 7:30 p.m.

"Cradlesong" is something new for Thomas and Matchbox 20 fans, who may be used to hearing powerful rock anthems. In an interview, Thomas admitted that artists "go through different phases when you're writing, it took a different turn, and I just followed it, too," giving reference to the album's use of rhythms and beats from South America and Africa. On his official website, he goes so far as to refer to "Cradlesong" as a "musical hybrid." This new take, however, was not seen in the first two singles from the album, "Her Diamonds" and "Someday," both of which have been well received.

"Her Diamonds," which hit airwaves last summer, has been attributed to Rob Thomas' experience dealing with his wife Marisol's longtime battle against lupus. Thomas, a known family man, co-wrote every song on the album. He told Entertainment Weekly that many of the songs on "Cradlesong" are about being in troubled relationships, which seems to be a staple in his solo advances as well as megahits from Matchbox 20.

Many of Matchbox 20's singles were written by Thomas. The band, which is still intact today despite Thomas's budding solo career, found its origins in Orlando 15 years ago. Following a band hiatus after rhythmic guitarist Adam Gaynor's departure from the group in the winter of 2005, Thomas spotted his chance to become a true singer-songwriter. On his website Thomas says, "Over the years, the other guys have evolved as writers. Now that I have a solo outlet, we can be more creative together; we can be a band and really explore what Matchbox can become... the best of what it can be – without my ego as a songwriter getting in the way."

"Cradlesong," which was released June 30, 2009, debuted after a 2007 Matchbox 20 reunion album "Exile on Mainstream," which garnered good reviews. This new album, originally slated for a May release, was recorded and mixed in a Los Angles studio. The delay can be attributed to a direction reversal, as the album was supposed to be a reworking of Paul Simon's "The Rhythm of the Saints."

The tour, which has no official name, began in Hollywood, Fla., giving homage to Thomas's roots, on Sept. 23 and ends Friday in New York City before it picks up again for a few smaller venues in the beginning of December. Boston fans will be rejoicing, since Rob Thomas's "Something to Be Tour" did not hit this city last time around.

Music, and all that encompasses it, is something that seems to come naturally to Thomas. To everyone in the crowd in Boston this evening, it will make sense as well.

The Blind Boys provide musical delights on newest collaboration

By Garth Brody
Collegian Correspondent

The Blind Boys of Alabama formed their singing group 70 years ago, and have been performing and recording gospel music ever since. As the legends of the industry they've become during that timespan, its not suprising that they have collaborated with a number of notable musicians. "Duets," their newest release, anthologizes the past 15 years of these collaborations in 14 tracks, three of which were recorded solely for this album.

The 14 names gathered for this collection mostly cover the blues and country spectrum (Randy Travis, Solomon Burke, Asleep at the Wheel), with a few surprising and eclectic exceptions like Lou Reed and Jars of Clay. What each artist chose for this compilation seems to share with listeners a sort of gospel influence, even if only some would never be classified under that genre. The Blind Boys merely coax out that sanctified Southern sound, playing a supporting role on every song, and accomodating its presence with a spirituality ranging from vaguely to powerfully Christian. But fear not, secular listeners – the religious overtones are easily palatable, sounding more like a pop trope than anything else.

2009 Grammy Award winners, the Blind Boys of Alabama have been playing together for over 70 years.

The first track, Ben Harper's "Take My Hand," is a lively New Orleans blues groove that sets the framework for the rest of the album. Harper takes the lead and the Blind Boys hit the big refrains, tossing in occasional soulful interjections. As such, the boys are not really the centerpiece of the album, but rather a thread connecting songs ranging in style from Charlie Musselwhite's rockabilly to Toots Hibbert's reggae. Instead of changing the well-realized tone of the other artist's tunes, the Blind Boys' unmistakable voices highlight the gospel core already present in the pop form.

This formula works brilliantly on almost every song on the album, with the exceptions of the tedious Toots Hibbert track "Perfect Peace," and the overwrought "Secular Praise" with Timothy B. Schmit. Unless you've never heard The Velvet Underground's "Jesus," the rendition here with Lou Reed will probably not impress. Still, the Blind Boys remain the redeeming features on the album's weak points, selling otherwise uninteresting music with big, deep harmonies.

The highlights are the danceable, uptempo tunes. The Blind Boys drop a smooth lament behind Charlie Musselwhite's rowdy "I Had Trouble" and give a vocal weight to Asleep at the Wheel's cover of the western swing number, which is practically a commercial jingle by Fred Rose, titled "The Devil Ain't Lazy." The infectious Southern flavor on these tracks might have been a step too close to Dukes of Hazzard if not for the Blind Boys' grounding. The concoction is undeniably fun.

The Blind Boys of Alabama close the album with John Hammond on a beautifully doleful blues dirge. Blind Lemon Jefferson's "See That My Grave Is Kept Clean," rearranged by the Blind Boys and retitled "One Kind Favor." Hammond's acoustic slide guitar sounds appropriately in its death throes, and his low, dusky voice resonates with an eerie fragility over the calmly humming harmonies of the Blind Boys.

What makes "Duets" so engaging is that it does not feel like The Blind Boys of Alabama have invited 14 artists to the studio to try gospel with some legends. The boys are instead guests on their own album, providing a stirring backdrop for a group of musicians with a surprisingly heterogeneous set of musical styles. Additionally, each individual track's lead musician invariably sounds like the hero of the song, with the Blind Boys singing a subtle but ever-present spiritual conscience. There is something so unpretentious and universally pleasing to the ear about the style of the Blind Boys that it would be hard not to at least appreciate their contributions here. Heck, they even make the Jars of Clay sound satisfying.

The Blind Boys of Alabama perform at the Preservation Hall in New Orleans. The gospel group recently released an album titled "Duets," which features artists such as Ben Harper and Bonnie Raitt.

No momentum for UMass

Minutewomen, Spiders play physical game in A-10 Tourney

By Jay Asser
Collegian Staff

Any momentum the Massachusetts field hockey team carried into the weekend for the opening round of the Atlantic 10 Conference Tournament was quickly halted by Richmond as the Minutewomen fell from tournament after their first game.

The top-seeded Spiders (12-8, 6-1 A-10), who were 7-3 on the road compared to 5-5 at home in the regular season, weren't rattled by the home field advantage the Minutewomen had in hosting the tournament at Garber Field and won 2-1 in overtime on Friday.

The win advanced Richmond to the finals, where it defeated Temple for the conference title. The loss ends the season for the Minutewomen, who close out the year at 12-9 overall and 3-4 in conference play.

Richmond allowed only 1.7 goals per game this year, and its strong defense blanked UMass after giving up the first score of the game on a penalty corner to Cher King.

"When pressure is put on us, we go a little bit one-on-one and don't see open passes," UMass coach Justine Sowry said. "You have to stay composed and the vision has to be there all the way through the game so we'll take some lessons from that and improve on it for next year."

The game soon turned into a physical, back-and-forth contest which had emotions running high. Playing with a Minutewomen squad that has accumulated 41 penalty cards this season, the Spiders were able to draw out the frustration of UMass.

In total, the Minutewomen combined for four penalty cards as Jamie Bourazerris drew both a green and a yellow card, while Nikki Pancrocco and King added two green cards themselves.

Though Sowry didn't plan for such a physical game heading into the weekend, she wasn't surprised by what she saw.

"I actually thought it would be a little bit more open today, but both teams are trying to get to the finals so it was rough and tough out there," Sowry said. "It went both ways, and that's just the way it is."

Going into the game, UMass was concerned with Richmond's Sarah Blythe-Wood, and for good reason. The senior was the Spiders' best player and the A-10 leading goal scorer in the regular season.

On Friday, the Minutewomen had trouble containing her as she was involved in both of Richmond's goals. On a penalty corner, Blythe-Wood powered a shot on goal and recorded an assist when it was deflected and scored by Dani Pycroft.

In overtime, Blythe-Wood scored her most significant goal of the season when she took a long pass and evaded the defense to zip a shot past UMass' Alesha Widdall in goal. The score was Blythe-Wood's fourth game-winning goal of the season, putting her one behind teammate Katelin Peterson for the conference lead.

"She's a great player and you have to take care of her and play good defense," Sowry said. "She's someone that even late in the game when everyone is tired, she keeps the composure on the ball."

Though the loss marked the first time in the last two seasons that the Minutewomen didn't win the conference title, it came on the heels of a tough season. Sowry was confident that UMass will come back next year and have the success it's been accustomed to since she arrived.

Rookie Farrell shines in first game at UM

By Adam Miller
Collegian Staff

It's not often that a player fouls out after 10 minutes of playing time. It's even more unusual when that player receives praise despite fouling out so quickly.

But when that player impresses the coach with his work ethic and has a productive game in those 10 minutes, the five fouls aren't too big of a deal.

Forward Javorn Farrell received a bulk of the credit from his teammates and Massachusetts men's basketball coach Derek Kellogg for helping it pull off the 80-78 win over Dowling on Saturday night.

The freshman finished with eight points, five rebounds and two steals in the 10 minutes he got off the bench. It's a kind of stat line that draws praise from any aspect of the game.

"I don't often see people come in for 10 minutes and get five fouls," guard Ricky Harris said of Farrell's effort. "He made the best of his opportunity and we applaud him for that and we know that when the season starts, he's going to be out there on the court dunng thick and thin."

Redshirt sophomore Sean Carter sees Farrell as someone who can help the team on the rebounding effort. Carter finished the game with a game-high of 12 rebounds and was the only one along with Farrell to average a rebound every two minutes they played.

"He figured out how you get on the court. He started rebounding," Carter said.

Kellogg sees the 6-foot-5 Farrell's skill set as so diverse that it's hard to pin him to any specific position. He believes that he has more of an all-around game but there isn't anything he naturally does really well and his size makes it difficult to play him at any one position.

But what Farrell lacks in natural ability, he makes up with in work ethic. Kellogg wasn't surprised by the effort on Saturday night because of how hard he works in practice.

"He's played like that in practice," Kellogg said. "If you go back to any of the things I've said all along, he's the one guy that's driven practice every day by how hard he goes."

Overall, Kellogg was impressed by Farrell's maturity throughout the game and went as far as saying that he played like an upperclassman.

Part of it could be Farrell's approach to the game.

"I wasn't nervous, surprisingly," he said. "Everyone says a freshman should be nervous but it felt like a normal high school game."

Harris put Farrell's comfort during the game in perspective when he compared his debut with the freshman's.

"[During] my freshman year, in the first exhibition game, I was nervous as hell," Harris said.

As relaxed as Farrell was on Saturday night, Kellogg still believes he still has a long way to go. It's not just that he fouled out of the game so quickly, he also committed two quick turnovers early in the game.

But mistakes like that are normal for freshmen and as someone who has coached some of the top freshmen in the nation during his tenure at Memphis, Kellogg knows that he will have be patient with the progress of his five freshmen.

All the UMass coach cares about is that they show a strong desire to learn, and get better based on their work ethic on the court. That's why Kellogg doesn't mind waiting as long as it takes for Farrell to develop into someone UMass feels comfortable relying on regularly.

box. Nearly eight minutes later, Stadler capitalized off of a UMass turnover and a pass from Mattia Melillo to give the Colonials the 3-0 lead, putting the game out of reach.

On the day, the Minutemen were outshot, 14-11, including 8-4 in the second half. UMass had just three corner kicks on the afternoon, while the Colonials had five. Junior goalkeeper Chris Piekos replaced Shane Curran-Hays in net at the start of the second half, making four saves. In a highly physical contest, there were nine cards issued between both teams, including the a yellow card and red card to Roswess and yellow cards issued to freshman defender Dominic Skrajewski, Piekos, and freshman forward Brodie Steigerwald. GW held the advantage in fouls, 15-9.

Roswess scored the golden goal and his first goal of the season in the overtime win against the Spiders off a cross from defender Mark Dangleis from the left flank to the back post in the 96th minute of play. The first half was scoreless for both teams, with the Minutemen holding a 10-6 shot advantage going into halftime. UMass went on to outshoot the Spiders, 27-10 on the day, with junior midfielder Ben Arikian and DeSantis both recording four shots on goal.

DeSantis scored on a cross from Roswess midway through the second half to put the Minutemen up 1-0. DeSantis scored his team-high fourth goal of the season from 10 yards out, but the Spiders answered with a goal from Houston Oldham with nine minutes to go, forcing overtime. The Minutemen responded offensively with seven shots to the Spiders zero in extra time, while Curran-Hays made three saves in the contest.

"It was well executed. Jeromy Miles had a great run on it and got the offense right back on the field and we scored a touchdown off that drive. So, certainly it was a great momentum builder for us."

With a second life UMass drove down the field, completing the 10-play, 71-yard drive with a 1-yard carry by Nelson on fourth down to take the 10-0 lead.

UMass went on to score three more times in the half, giving the Huskies a heavy dose of Victor Cruz, who grabbed an 11-yard touchdown pass and a key 31-yarder. Nelson added a 1-yard scoring run and Cuko hit a 36-yard field goal to put UMass up 27-0 going into the locker room. Cuko's second field goal of the game him a school record 17 on the season.

The Minutemen came out in the second half looking to put the game away. The UMass offense ground out the second drive of the half for 12 plays and five minutes and 39 seconds with Nelson scoring to make it 34-0, finishing the day for many of the starters on offense.

It looked as though the Huskies offense was about to produce its first points of the game as Tony Torres rushed and was met just before the goal line by the UMass defense. However, defensive back Warren Wilson came in and stripped Torres as the ball popped in the air and was recovered by Mele in the endzone for a touchback.

a lead the Minutewomen took into halftime.

"She's phenomenal," Sowry said. "She has such great heart and character. I saw her X-ray yesterday and her kneecap is actually in two pieces. So for her to be playing on that knee the later half of the season is just inspiring. She's been a great member of this program."

The game featured a rematch of last year's A-10 Championship game as UMass was defending its conference title over Richmond. It had the intensity of a championship game. The competitiveness of each team permeated throughout the match with several players getting carded. Three green cards were handed out as well as a yellow card. Multiple players took shots off of their bodies and had to leave the game temporarily to deal with injuries.

The UMass-Richmond contest was the most competitive game in the tournament as the other two games were each decided by three goals. Richmond went on to beat Temple in the conference championship game, 3-0, on Saturday.

The Minutewomen will dwell on this game for some time but Sowry believes that this loss can help the team as they return next year hungry for another championship.

"I'm really proud of the team," Sowry said. "We have to learn some lessons from this so we can come back next year and be a better, stronger unit, and bring back the title."

said. "I think the good thing is we can go forward and up pretty quickly."

"A win's a win," said center Sean Carter, who recorded a team-high 12 rebounds. "We can improve on a lot of things which everyone can see. I'm proud that, at the end of the game, that we stepped up in the last three minutes and started playing defense the way we needed to play it."

UMass' dribble-drive offense struggled in the early going as it went 0-of-13 inside the arc and 0-of-10 from deep. Forward Anthony Gurley finally provided the Minutemen with their first field goal banking a lay up on the left side of the basket.

The basket seemed to awaken UMass and it went on to score 30 points in the remaining 11 minutes of the first half.

Harris accounted for 16 of those points as he caught fire and scored 10 points in four possessions, shooting the Minutemen back into the contest.

The statistics for the two teams were even across the board by the end of the half, but the Minuteman Lions held an advantage in all three shooting percentage categories. UMass hosted 23 turnovers compared to 13 for Dowling. The Minutemen also struggled at the free-throw line, converting 7-of-12.

In the second half, the game turned into an offensive back-and-forth battle, Midway through the period, the Golden Lions created separation, going on a 13-2 run to take a seven-point lead.

Guard Sean Smith stepped up for Dowling, hitting three shots from beyond the arc and scoring 17 points in the second half to give him a team-high 26 points for the game.

As a team, the Golden Lions shot much better in the second period, improving on all three shooting categories from the first half. They were able to keep the game close, hitting 6-of-14 3-pointers while shooting nearly 52 percent from the field.

The Minutemen, on the other hand, never seemed to find their stroke from behind the arc, as they shot 20.6 percent on 34 attempts.

With UMass kicking off its regular season against Central Florida in Orlando on Friday, the Minutemen know that they must improve and get in form quickly.

"We got a lot of work to do," Kellogg said. "I don't know if that's good, bad, or indifferent, but we've got a lot of work to do."

Cuko breaks single season FG record

my way it comes my way. I can't control how many chances I get."

Cuko's 36-yard field goal at the end of the second quarter was his 17th of the season – he would alter add his 18th – and put Cuko first place all-time in UMass history for most made field goals in one season. Chris Koepplin (2006) and Sandro Vitiello (1978) were tied for first place with 16 in one season entering the game, but Cuko jumped both of them against the Huskies.

A 35-yard field goal late in the fourth quarter gave Cuko 30 career field goals and moved the Beverly, Mass. native into a tie for first place for career field goals with Silvio Bonvini who also hit 30 from 1985-88.

In PATs, Cuko currently ranks fourth all-time on the career total with 95, two behind third-place Doug White's 97 and 13 behind first-place Bonvini's 108.

Not only is Cuko at the top of the UMass record books, he's also among the nations' best in field goals per game and points per game. The senior's three field goals improved his nation's best 2.14 field goals per game to 2.25 and the 13 points he scored increased one of the nations best points per game total from 9.29 to 9.75.

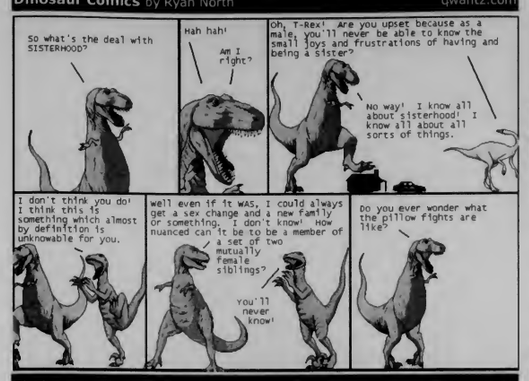
by scoring the game-tying goal in the second period as well as an empty netter that helped put the game away in the closing minutes.

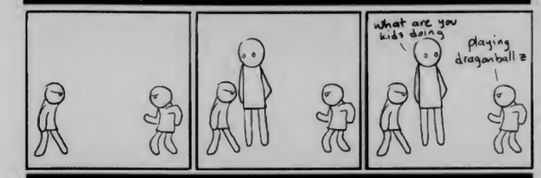
"Two goals first game back ... it was really nice. I wasn't expecting that," Lecomte said after Friday's game. "In the first period I was really off, trying to get the speed of the game and trying to find my teammates was hard but to get that goal was a big boost for me."

Twenty-two seconds into the second period, Ohlds put away his third goal of the season past UMass' Paul Dainton, who made 31 saves in the game, to give the Purple Eagles a 1-0 lead. Play remained back and forth until Lecomte received a pass from a pass in the slot from Ortiz and scored with seven minutes, 33 seconds remained in the second period. Ortiz, who was positioned behind the net, took a pass from Shawn Saunders before feeding Lecomte in front of the net for the tying goal.



"The guys gave the puck to Will Ortiz, who made a great play and then I just had to put the puck in the net," Lecomte said of the goal.

The Minutemen took advantage of a power-play opportunity to take a 2-1 lead with 13 seconds left in the second period. UMass got the man advantage with 2:03 left in the period after Danny Hobbs stole the puck and charged through the Purple Eagles zone before being tripped into the goal's post by Niagara's David Ross. Hobbs took a pass from Martin Nolet with 10 seconds left on the power play and got redemption by putting the goal away for his first of the season.



Two late empty-net goals in the final 1:30 would give UMass a 4-1 victory. Lecomte would add his second goal of the game – and season – after he stole a Niagara pass and went uncontested to the net. With 11 seconds remaining in the game, David Boehm added the second empty netter off an assist from Nolet.

Minutewomen fail to advance to A-10 finals

Fall to eventual champs Richmond in overtime

By Pete Vasquez
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts field hockey season ended its season ranne to a sudden end as Richmond beat the Minutewomen, 2-1, in overtime of the Atlantic 10 Conference semifinals at Garber Field on Friday afternoon.

We left it all out there," UMass coach Justine Sowry said. "I think we were prepared. We were playing well as a team. We certainly had our opportunities. Unfortunately we didn't come through right at the end."

With each team playing with only 10 players on sudden-death overtime, Richmond senior Sinead Wood, the leading goal scorer in the A-10, beat three UMass defenders and scored on a breakaway 33 minutes, 19 seconds into overtime to send the Spiders into the championship game.

The game-winner came after the Minutewomen appeared to have won the game. Senior forward Cher King appeared to deflect the ball into the Spiders' goal off a penalty corner. However, the referees ruled that the ball had never hit her stick and nullified the goal.

UMass goalkeeper Alesha Widdall helped keep the Minutewomen in the game by making eight saves, including multiple one-on-one stands against Blythe-Wood in the final minutes of the second half and overtime. Blythe-Wood however, won the final meeting between the two to seal the victory for Richmond.

"She was outstanding," Sowry said of Widdall. "I know she's very disappointed in that final goal but she made some outstanding saves and I'm really proud of the way she played today."

King, shaking off an injury that has plagued her throughout the season, had a multi-point day in the last game of her collegiate career. She scored the only UMass goal at the seven minute mark in the first half, off of an assist from freshman Kim Young, to give UMass an initial 1-0 lead.

Nelson runs all over Huskies

By Nick O'Malley
Collegian Staff

For the third week in a row, Kyle Havens was pulled from the game for senior Scott Woodward for performance reasons. But this time it was a good thing, as the Massachusetts football team returned to form Saturday in a 37-7 blowout of Northeastern.

The Minutemen (5-4, 3-3 Colonial Athletic Association) scored at will for much of the game on offense and prevented the Huskies (1-8, 1-5 CAA) from crossing midfield until midway through the fourth quarter on offense in a dominating performance on both sides of the ball.

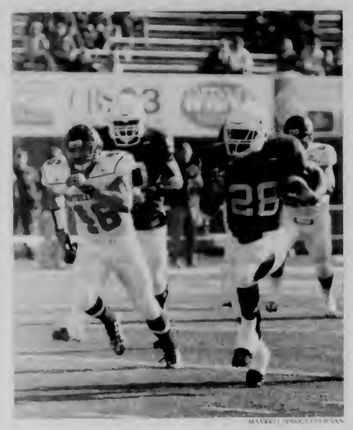
NU	7

After Havens was benched in his past two games, the UMass offense needed a solid outing from their quarterback. They got it Saturday against Northeastern with a little help from wideout Victor Cruz and tailback Tony Nelson.

Havens went 15-of-27 for 187 yards and a touchdown, including five passes for 87 yards and a score to Cruz, and went without an interception for the first time all season. Woodward was put in for the fourth quarter to finish out the game.

"I don't know so much as we needed it. This is the way we should be playing. Havens said when asked if the offense needed a solid outing to restore confidence. "The turnovers have been killing us, and we eliminated those today and it showed on the scoreboard."

Cruz, who entered the game as a high-caliber deep threat, failed to record a reception. Jonathan Hernandez-Salazar finally looked like the workhorse back the Minutemen have become by going into the season ranked 3rd in the CAA in rushing. On the day, he gave him 25 for his career, tying him for sixth all-time in UMass history.



Not to be outdone, the UMass defense put on another dominant performance, limiting the Huskies to 145 total yards and no points on offense. Two turnovers – both by quarterback Tyler Hilinski – led to 17 Minutemen points, including a pick-six by Jerome Solomon and a fumble recovery by Perry Jacobs.

Solomon's interception was the defensive highlight of the day, as he made a leaping grab over the middle of the field and then returned the ball 30 yards for the score.

Meanwhile, Jacobs' fumble recovery came on a punt formation on its own 29-yard line. It seemed as though another drive had been snuffed. But before the Huskies defense knew what was going on, the Minutemen had already snapped the ball to safety Jeromy Miles, who streaked down the left side of the field for 32 yards. The play is Miles' only career carry.

"Certainly on that drive, it gave us about [32 yards]," Morris said.

Tailback Tony Nelson outruns Northeastern's defense in Saturday's win. The senior rushed for 116 yards and three touchdowns.

Climbing the record books against NU

By Jeffrey R. Larnard
Collegian Staff

Tony Nelson had seen little of the field for the Massachusetts football team recently, but Saturday, in a 37-7 rout over Northeastern, the tailback looked just as he did before he was sidelined with a contusion to his thigh.

After only 10 carries at Maine, not traveling to Richmond, playing one series against New Hampshire and rushing for 33 yards at Delaware, Nelson found himself rushing for 116 yards on 20 carries and three touchdowns against the Huskies (1-8, 1-5 Colonial Athletic Association).

"It was tough sitting out in my senior year, but I'm glad just to be back healthy and helping out the team," Nelson said after the game. "You can see the offense did a great job and pushing the ball up downfield and getting the ball into the end zone. The linemen did a great job, the backs did a great job and it felt real good to get back out there."

The three touchdowns in the game were the most for the senior since he rushed for three in 2006 against William & Mary. Nelson entered the game tied for 11th all-time rushing touchdowns in UMass history, but moved up to sixth to tie Kevin Smellie's 21 career rushing touchdowns that he posted from 1985-88.

Nelson scored from one yard out on two occasions in the first five minutes of the second quarter for the Minutemen (5-4, 3-3 CAA) to increase UMass' lead from three to 17 early in the game. The tailback would later punch it in from nine yards out with six minutes, 33 seconds left in the third quarter to give UMass a 34-0 lead.

With this performance Nelson appears to be back to himself, but the senior still feels he has room for improvement, despite rushing for his third 100-yard rushing game of the season.

Kicking for the books

With the offense often struggling deep in its opponents' territory at times this year, UMass has leaned on kicker Armando Cuko to help put points on the board. The senior has not disappointed as he has hit 18-of-23 field-goal attempts on the year and is a perfect 24-for-24 on extra-point attempts, as well as going 3-for-3 against Northeastern.

The strong season and Saturday's performance have moved Cuko's names to the tops of many UMass' record books, including career field goals, single season field goals and career PATs, with still two games to go.

"I kept an eye on it but I try not to think about breaking anything," Cuko said. "If it comes

UMass tops Dowling

In its first action of the 2009-10 season, the Massachusetts men's basketball team came out showing rust in its preseason exhibition tilt with Dowling at the Mullins Center on Saturday night.

the game to get into a rhythm on offense, as the Golden Lions took an early 11-3 lead. Even though the Minutemen outscored Dowling 80-67 the rest of the way, the Bulldogs were able to keep UMass close enough to force overtime with the game tied at 70.

UMass coach Derek Kellogg wasn't dissatisfied with his team's performance, but instead saw the exhibition as a good way to gauge them.

"[Dowling], at this stage, was a little more prepared than we were," Kellogg said after the win. "It was good for us to get to see where we are as a team and a program."

With under four minutes remaining in the contest, UMass applied its full-court press and forced four turnovers in Dowling's backcourt in the span of a minute to tie the game at 75.

When the Golden Lions finally advanced the ball past half court with under two minutes remaining, they were unable to take the lead as they went 3-of-9 at the free-throw line.

Junior guard Ricky Harris, who scored a team-high 28 points, converted 1-of-2 at the line with two seconds remaining to give UMass the two-point lead. After missing the second, Dowling attempted a hoist from half court that was off the mark to give the Minutemen the closely-contested win.

Kellogg felt his team could improve in a lot of areas, but was pleased with the toughness they showed down the stretch.

"I told these guys, 'you want to get people in the seats, you want to get the students to come, well then you play as hard as you can every time out,'" Kellogg

Minutemen take weekend set in come-from behind fashion

By Jeffrey R. Larnard
Collegian Staff

With two come-from-behind wins over Niagara over the weekend, the Massachusetts hockey team bounced back after its first loss of the season last weekend to Providence.

Sunday afternoon, the No. 19 Minutemen fell behind 1-0 in the first period at Niagara before pulling out a 4-2 win over the winless Purple Eagles (0-6-1, 0-0-0 College Hockey America). Similarly, UMass (6-1-0, 3-1-0 Hockey East) overcame a 1-0 deficit on Friday in Amherst, before scoring four unanswered goals for a 4-1 win.

"We had to stay with it to come from behind," UMass coach Don Cahoon said after Sunday's game. "So there were a lot of positives about it but make no mistake about it we need to get better."

Seven minutes into the first period, Niagara took a 1-0 lead on an Egor Mironov shot that found its way past the shoulder of UMass goalkeeper Dan Meyers, who made 25 saves in the win. The start for Meyers was his first game after starting off the season with a three-game suspension for an off-the-field incident.

The Minutemen tied the game and took the lead on goals by Michael Marcou and Will Ortiz within 50 seconds of eachother. Four minutes into the period, Marcou took a pass from Casey Wellman for his second goal of the season. Ortiz gave UMass a 2-1 lead when he took a low shot from the right side of the rink that found its way past Niagara's Adam Avramenko.

With 10 minutes remaining in the period, the Purple Eagles evened the score at two on Ryan Olids' fourth goal of the season.

Wellman broke the tie with five minutes to go in the game with what would be the game-winning goal and his fourth of the season. After a shot by Justin Braun was stopped, Wellman grabbed the rebound and backhanded a shot into the net. James Marcou added the final tally with two minutes remaining.

All four of the Minutemen's goals came with both teams at full strength, a good sign for UMass. Prior to the game, the Minutemen had scored 23 goals, 12 of which came on the power play.

Friday's game was highlighted by Michael Lecomte, who played in only his second game of the season and scored twice. After missing all but the first game of the season due to a back injury, but the junior made up for lost time

UMass cancels lecture amid threats, protests

By Bobby Hitt
Collegian Staff

Amid protest from police organizations and state representatives, officials at the University of Massachusetts have cancelled a lecture by Ray Luc Levasseur, a former member of the United Freedom Front.

The lecture, which was to be held Thursday Nov. 12, was planned by the UMass Amherst Libraries with partial support from the Massachusetts Foundation for the Humanities and the Dean of the Graduate school, for the fifth annual colloquium on social change.

Levasseur was tried on federal charges of seditious conspiracy in 1989.

The trial was recorded as being the most expensive in the history of Massachusetts.

He and his co-defendants, Richard Williams and Pat Levasseur, were found not guilty of trying to overthrow the United States government.

In 1986 Levasseur was convicted of bombing buildings throughout the northeastern United States and sent to prison for twenty years.

These bombings were meant to protest the U.S. government's supposed backing of the apartheid South African government and Central American death squads.

Levasseur was released on parole in 2004.

Robert Cox, head of the library's special collections and the university's archives announced the event would not be held in a release issued on Nov. 5.

"The cancellation was a decision made out of moral and political weakness," Levasseur said.

"The police are limiting the first amendment instead of the courts."

Members of the United Freedom Front, of which Levasseur was the leader, were convicted of the murder of a New Jersey state police officer and the attempted murder of two Massachusetts state police officers.

Levasseur himself was never charged for these crimes nor was he at the scene of these crimes.

Michele McPhee of The Boston Herald interviewed Donna Lamonoco about the cancellation of the lecture in an article published Nov. 6. Lamonoco is the widow of Phil Lamonoco, the New Jersey State Trooper who was killed by Levasseur's colleague Thomas Manning in 1981.

"They were treating a terrorist as a hero. The governor was going to let him educate college students at a public school," Lamonoco said.

"A guy who represents an organization that killed my husband that tried to execute two troopers in Massachusetts."

According to Levasseur, "of the two men who were convicted of the murder one died in prison from lack of medical attention, isn't that punishment enough?"

Before its cancellation, a release for the event stated that Levasseur would have spoken about his life and the significance of the Springfield sedition trial.

The organizers of the event sought to understand the reasons behind the actions of the United Freedom Front.

Several high level academics have voiced their protest on the cancellation of the lecture titled "Ray Luc Levasseur: Defendant in the Great Sedition Trial of Western Mass"

In a letter to Chancellor, Robert C. Holub, Professor C. G. Caffentzis, a philosophy professor at the University of Southern Maine expressed his concern over the University's decision to cancel the lecture.

"The lecture was to deal with the crime of sedition, an issue that is important to all students of US history ...It was to feature Levasseur, one of the defendants in the country's last major sedition trial that took place in Springfield in 1989," Caffentzis said.

"I have no doubt that Levasseur's lecture and the subsequent discussion would have been the source of knowledge about this the charge of sedition," Caffentzis added.

"We cannot deepen our knowledge of U.S. history without opening the public space in academe to figures who were involved in that very history."

Police organizations planned on protesting the lecture had the event taken place.

Ross Bergen, an undeclared freshman at UMass planned on attending these protests.

"I don't think he should come to UMass," said Bergen.

"I think his speaking is a mockery to the innocent families his organization has affected," Bergen said.

Bergen added that, "It is wrong that he was even invited to speak at the University."

Other UMass students have voiced their support for the lecture on the grounds of freedom of speech.

"I definitely feel like he should have been able to speak. I understand why the police department would be concerned," said Emily Vartabedian, a kinesiology major.

"People need to take precautions but should not infringe on a person's freedom of speech."

Dan Chard, a graduate student of the UMass History Department, was one of the organizers of the now-cancelled lecture.

"[Levasseur] has never endorsed violence in any of his lectures," Chard said.

"He has spoken at Temple, Columbia, University of Southern Maine and other colleges with little to no opposition, some of them having large crowds."

"Cancelling the talk denied the UMass community an opportunity to learn," Chard said.

"[The lecture] was shutdown because of police pressure. The police are dictating what conversations are off limits to the University and to me that is scary."

Levasseur said that he and his supporters hope to re-plan his lecture for a venue other than UMass.

Levasseur also said that he will issue a release today concerning the rescheduling of his event but would not give further details.

Bobby Hitt can be reached at rhitt@student.umass.edu

Due to threats by police organizations and some state representatives, the lecture by Ray Luc Levasseur scheduled for Nov. 12 has been cancelled by University officials.

The Amherst Cinema will present TimesTalks Live, a discussion between author Stephen King and Janet Maslin, a New York Times book critic on Tuesday Nov. 10 from 7 to 8:30 p.m. with an introductory video to the TimesTalk LIVE event series at 6:30 p.m.

Broadcast live from New York City, Stephen King will discuss his latest novel as well as his past work, which includes over 50 novels.

Throughout his career, King has sold over 350 million copies of his novels and short stories.

He has also worked as a columnist, a screenwriter and an activist.

King will discuss his newest work with Maslin, titled "Under the Dome."

His upcoming novel is a work that has been written and re-written since the 1970s, being separated and re-jointed numerous times.

The novel is a thriller set in a Maine town, featuring more than 100 characters who endure a supernatural experience.

In speaking about his latest work in an interview with Lilja's Library, an online website dedicated to the work of the author himself, King said the rewrites were a part of two different attempts to utilize the same idea.

The idea for the novel, according to King, concerns itself with how people behave when they are cut off from the society to which they have always belonged.

Maslin has written over 4600 articles for the New York Times as a film critic for 22 years and is currently as a literary critic.

She has also written as a rock music critic for the Boston Phoenix and Rolling Stone magazine.

Produced by the New York Times and BY Experience, Inc. the launch of TimesTalk LIVE will broadcast intimate discussions with authors, actors and other media personalities in the future.

Future conversations include Sir Roger Moore, an actor who has the distinction of serving as James Bond the longest, the cast of the 2008 film Milk and former friends of the openly gay politician Harvey Milk, as well as actor Tom Cruise.

This is the pilot season of this series.

Prior to the launch of this new project, the public was able to attend the event at the Times Center in New York City or listen to the podcast through their website or iTunes.

Across the United States and Canada, 74 theaters will be broadcasting the simulcast feed in high definition via satellite.

Augusta Savage Gallery hosts new exhibition of 'outsiders'

UMass art gallery features 30 paintings of cultural diversity in a two-week exhibition

By Christa Romano
Collegian Staff

The Augusta Savage Gallery located on the University of Massachusetts campus opened an exhibit on Nov 2 with brightly colored abstract paintings titled "Inside the Outside."

The exhibit consisted of some 30 paintings by artists Jay Dickens, Arnold Nelson and Floyd Nelson.

The exhibit will be on display in the gallery, located in the New Africa House until Nov. 20.

The "Inside the Outside" exhibition continues with the Augusta Savage Gallery's mission to promote artistic works from a broad spectrum of cultures, according to Jerry Jenoure, the gallery's director.

Jenoure, who has run the gallery for over 20 years, said she discovered these artists while visiting a group art show in New Mexico.

Out of the many artists on display, Jenoure said the three particularly caught her eye.

"I was immediately attracted to their work," she said.

She added, "I found them to be very free and expressive and contemporary."

The culture demonstrated in this exhibit is that of "outsider" artists, she said.

Jenour added that the three New Mexican artists are considered "outsider artists" because they have not received any formal art instruction.

She said they have developed their own personal styles without preconceived notions or limitations, something she said resulted in truly expressional works of art.

Determined to bring some of this newfound art back to Massachusetts, Jenoure said that she researched and traveled to the disability services organization that sponsors the artists, each of whom had spent a number of years institutionalized for disabilities.

Through her cooperation with the organization, Jenoure said the opportunity had given her the chance to learn more about them, and she was even able to watch them paint in the disability services studio.

"They all have spent time [institutionalized] but are now living independently, so they are supported by disability services," Jenoure said.

Jenoure added that, "These men go to a studio every day and they paint. It's a service that these artists really responded to, expressing themselves through art."

Jenoure said that she believes that the paintings help to portray a commonly misrepresented subculture within the United States.

"Their experiences in institutions really mark the way they see the world," Jenoure said. "They have a lot to say about the way they've lived over the past 50 years."

Republicans seek influence in Senate health care debates

By David Lightman
McClatchy Newspapers

WASHINGTON – Republicans Monday had new hope that they could influence health care deliberations – influence that so far has eluded them – as the debate moves to the Senate, where the rules and the politics can work to their advantage.

Some Republicans are trying to win Democratic support for more help for small business, different medical malpractice policies and changes in how the health care overhaul would be funded.

Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, one of three GOP senators to vote for the Democratic-authored economic stimulus plan earlier this year, said moderates from both parties are discussing potential areas of agreement.

The odds are still long, and probably insurmountable, against the Senate's 40 Republicans having significant input into the biggest decisions notably mandates on employers and individuals and the plan's funding. They continue to complain that, as Sen. Bob Corker, R-Tenn., put it, the bill "is being drafted behind closed doors."

Democrats control 60 of the 100 Senate seats, but as many as 12 moderate Democrats have expressed serious concerns about the package's cost, now estimated at $829 billion over 10 years, as well as about the government-run insurance plan, or public option.

It takes 60 votes to cut off debate and move to a vote, and Democrats probably will need GOP help on certain parts of the bill. Full Senate consideration could begin later this month.

Collins was optimistic about the GOP role, saying, "I believe we can put together a bipartisan bill that could cover so many areas where there's agreement on what should be done."

The biggest controversy is likely to involve the government plan; the Senate version now includes a provision that would let states opt out of it. Sen. Joseph Lieberman, a Connecticut independent who excuses with Democrats, has said that he won't vote to end debate on that plan, and at least two Democratic moderates are undecided. That means Democrats may have to seek votes among Republicans to shut off debate on the public option.

The most obvious choice is Sen. Olympia Snowe, R-Maine, the only GOP member of the Senate Finance Committee who voted with Democrats last month to approve that panel's health care plan.

Snowe, however, said she's "deeply disappointed" with the opt-out plan and prefers instead the idea of a "trigger" that would allow a government option only if private insurers don't meet certain benchmarks, notably making policies more affordable.

Whether Democrats can pick up any other Republican support for a public option is doubtful – Collins is opposed – but GOP influence could extend further, in small but meaningful ways.

"Senate Republicans have more clout because the rules of the institution mean they get taken more seriously," said Darrell West, director of Governance Studies at Washington's Brookings Institution, a center-left research group.

In the House of Representatives, Republicans were shut out of any meaningful deliberations. Under House rules, most proposals can get a floor vote only if they are first approved by the Democratic-dominated Rules Committee, which made it impossible for the GOP to get votes on specific amendments.

Republicans there were allowed only to offer an alternative comprehensive plan, which lost on a largely party-line vote.

In the Senate, though, anyone can bring up an amendment that leads to a full vote.

Already, there have been signs of bipartisanship. When a public option plan similar to the one the House passed on Saturday came up in the Senate Finance Committee earlier this year, Democrats joined Republicans to defeat it.

Art gallery displays new show featuring range of diversity

The watercolor, gouache, acrylics and oil paintings on display were painted with large strokes, vibrant colors and demonstrate great energy Jenoure said.

Those that have already visited the exhibit wrote comments in the guest book, which included remarks acknowledging these colors and unique textures of the work.

The Augusta Savage Gallery selects different exhibits for their aesthetic integrity and ability to enlighten the viewer on social issues.

"There are so many different ways that people identify themselves and live in the world," Jenoure said.

Jenoure also added, "And that's part of what we do here: we display a range of ethnic and cultural differences through art."

"Inside the Outside" is the last exhibit for the Augusta Savage Gallery this semester.

All of the paintings on display are for sale and range in price from $55-$160.

This free public exhibit is entirely non-profit, and all of the proceeds go directly to the artists and to other disability services.

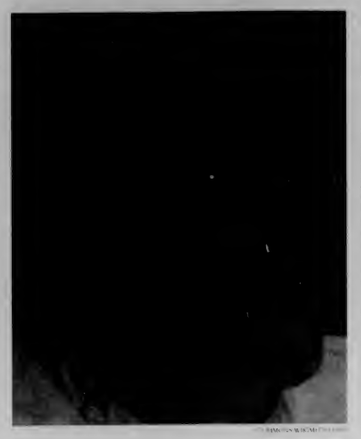
Also participating in the event are 54 theaters throughout Canada and 20 venues in the U.S including California, Connecticut, Massachusetts, Maine, Nebraska, New Mexico, New York, Oregon, Pennsylvania and Washington.

The first event broadcasted on Wednesday Oct. 28 featured acclaimed novelist John Irving and New York Times writer Charles McGrath.

Attendees were able to submit questions to Irving and have them answered on air.



The same option is available for Tuesday's discussion with King.

When asked about her feelings on the program, Carol Johnson, the executive director of Amherst Cinema and the Pleasant Street Theater in Northampton said, "It's fabulous. I love the idea of this program."

Johnson added, "In New York City, people have to pay $30 to go see these interviews.

Here in Amherst it's available to the community in HD, a program were very excited to offer to the community."

While the equipment was expensive, costing over $5,000 according to Johnson, it offers Amherst Cinema the opportunity not only to host future TimesTalk LIVE programming, but they also have plans to screen performances of the London Ballet in real time from the Royal Opera House.

The discussion will focus on the work of author Stephen King, who has sold over 350 million copies of his novels and short stories

The Amherst Cinema's theater can hold 182 attendees and currently still have dozens of seats available.

Tickets are $12 and are available at the Amherst Cinema Box Office 20 minutes before the show or available for download from the cinema's website.

Colleges respond to mental issues facing their students

By Susan Snyder
The Philadelphia Inquirer

PHILADELPHIA — Mental health counselors at La Salle University were feeling overwhelmed, their appointment books packed with students in need of help, seemingly more so than ever. Counseling director Suzanne Boyll recently ran numbers and confirmed her suspicion. They were busier.

As of Oct. 16, the number of counseling sessions had spiked 48 percent to 204, up from 137 the same time last year, a jump not solely explained by the school's record freshman enrollment.

"There are trauma-related problems, death of a family member, bad news about a class, other family stresses, boyfriend/girlfriend issues, conflict with a roommate," said Boyll, a 30-year veteran and one of four psychologists on staff.

Counseling centers at many schools in the region and nationally note the same trend: more students seeking help for routine and severe problems.

Still shaken from the Virginia Tech shootings in 2007, campuses are responding to the demand by adding counselors, reorganizing how they assess students to get to the most acute cases quickly, and training workers to deal with newly emerging problems.

Rutgers University's main campus in New Brunswick, N.J., opened a new $5 million, 35-room counseling center this fall with all mental health services consolidated there. It also has overhauled how it responds to students.

"If a student calls for help and they need urgent help, they're seen the same day or same moment," said Jill Richards, counseling director.

At Rowan University in Glassboro, Pa., an increased number of students are "coming in with heightened symptoms of depression, anxiety and suicidality, as well as students with developmental disorders, specifically Asperger's disorder, as well as attention-deficit disorder," said David Rubenstein, counseling and psychological director.

Gwynedd-Mercy College in Gwynedd Valley, Pa., has treated students with deeper problems, too. Counselors in 1999-2000 saw 133 students for 227 sessions; last year, the numbers were 126 students for 610 sessions.

Increasingly, students are requiring hospitalization, some schools say. Temple University last year had 37 students hospitalized, up from 16 in 2007-08.

"We don't know if that's a trend, but we're going to monitor it," said John DiMino, Temple's counseling director.

And more students are coming to campus already with a mental diagnosis.

Nationally, nearly 15 percent of college students in spring 2008 said they had been diagnosed with depression, up from 10 percent in 2000, the American College Health Association says.

A report by Pennsylvania State University's Center for the Study of Collegiate Mental Health found that one in four students who showed up at a sampling of college counseling centers last fall had seriously considered suicide. One-third had previously taken psychiatric drugs.

The influx comes as advances in psychiatric drugs allow more students with serious mental problems to attend college.

Students also find less stigma in seeking help; they routinely see commercials for psychiatric drugs on TV and billboards, experts say.

"These kids want to be in therapy today," said Ian Birky, counseling and psychological director at Lehigh University in Bethlehem, where the number of students seeking individual or group counseling has crept up in the last decade to 841. "They're growing up in a little bit of a different culture."

Add to that the stresses of a bad economy, uncertain environmental conditions, and more "hyper parents" who haven't allowed their children to develop their own coping skills, counselors say.

"If you have a parent who is so hyper-concerned that they 'rescue' them, you don't allow them the time that they need to sort of struggle," said La Salle's Boyll. "They're really cheating their child out of their ability to learn to manage their own stress."

Consequently, Boyll said, her center is getting more calls from parents asking about their children. By law, counseling centers can't reveal information or acknowledge that a student is a patient without written consent from the student, she said.

"We tell them to have their child sign a release," she said.

Also contributing to the rise in demand is the better job that counseling centers are doing of advertising their services and making students feel welcome, no matter the severity of their problem.

"We say you don't have to be sick to come. If you broke up with your boyfriend or have a roommate problem, you can come," said William Alexander, counseling and psychological director at the University of Pennsylvania, where the percentage of students seeking service has risen from about 9.5 to more than 11 in the last decade.

To respond to the increased demand, schools are adding staff. Temple hired three more counselors over the last five years, at a cost of about $250,000.

Lehigh University got two doctoral interns.

Ursinus College grew from one counselor four years ago to three. About 8 percent of the 1,676 students sought counseling in spring 2009.

Some schools have taken the unusual step of adding specific fees to help cover burgeoning costs.

Emory University in Atlanta a year ago tacked onto bills for all students a $50 fee for mental health and counseling. The reason wasn't only to bring in more revenue for counseling. The university also wanted to reduce the stigma, said Mark McLeod, director of student counseling for the 12,000-student school.

"Our board of trustees wanted to say ... it's OK to talk about this," he said.

Penn State charges a fee for some services. Psychiatric sessions cost $30; the first 10 sessions with a psychologist are free, and there is a $30 fee for each additional one.

Other schools embed costs in health or general fees.

To improve service, Temple several years ago converted to a "walk-in clinic format," allowing students to come without an appointment during a four-hour daily window, DiMino said.

In the past, students would have to wait several weeks for an appointment, and some were found to have acute issues.

Rutgers made a similar shift in spring 2008 that has resulted in more students going in for counseling, said Richards, the counseling director.

About 2,800 of the campus's 35,000 students went for counseling last year.

"If you make a person wait, anxiety builds," she said. "If they have to wait two weeks, they may not go for the help."

The center employs 17 psychologists and social workers, five psychiatrists, three substance-abuse specialists, six doctoral students, and several graduate trainees. Staff has not increased but has been consolidated at the new center.

The center also is training its staff in how to deal with students who have increasingly common "pervasive personality disorders," Richards said. The students fail at relationships, struggle with authority figures and have poor self-concept.

The counseling center also prepared and sent out 18,000 fliers to faculty and staff on how to direct a student in crisis, she added.

"Students will write things in an English assignment or say things on e-mail and instant messages that they can't say in face-to-face contact," she said.

Some schools are creating committees with liaisons from academics, mental health, campus security and other areas to coordinate help for those with severe problems.

In its third year, La Salle's group, called Threads, meets once a week.

"We really try to identify students at risk and intervene," Boyll said.

Gywnedd-Mercy added a similar team this fall.

St. Joseph's University, where up to 13 percent of undergrads seek counseling, is hiring a case manager to coordinate care for an increasing number of severe cases.

Mark Salzer, an associate professor in psychiatry at Penn, has found that some college counseling centers still don't know what students with psychiatric disorders need to be successful.

"Pills and therapy are great things, but those aren't the only ... things," he said. "They need contacts who will help them with academic accommodations, check to see if they're going to class and doing homework, and encourage them to stay in treatment."

Lawyers of child defendant tell Supreme Court life sentence in prison is too cruel for children

By David G. Savage
Tribune Washington Bureau

WASHINGTON

Confronted with the stark reality of a 13-year old sentenced to spend the rest of his life in prison, the Supreme Court justices signaled Monday they are inclined to limit, or perhaps abolish, the use of life prison terms for young teenagers whose crimes do not involve murder.

Until now, the high court has often invoked the Constitution's ban on "cruel and unusual punishment" to restrict the death penalty.

But on Monday, the justices sounded ready to rule that some states, in particular Florida, have gone too far by sentencing young teenagers to life in prison without a chance for a parole.

"To say to any child of 13 that you are only fit to die in prison is cruel," attorney Bryan Stevenson told the court.

"It cannot be reconciled with what we know about the nature of children. It cannot be reconciled with our standards of decency."

He is representing Joe Sullivan, who at age 13 was convicted of raping a 72-year-old woman in 1989 and given a life prison term.

Stevenson said rapists in Florida are sentenced, on average, to 10 years in prison.

But Sullivan, who has already served 20 years, will die in prison unless the Supreme Court intervenes.

A second case heard Monday involves Terrance Graham, who at 17 was given a life term for his part in an armed robbery of a restaurant and a later home invasion robbery.

Sullivan and Graham are among 109 prison inmates nationwide who were sentenced to life in prison without parole for non-homicide crimes.

They are among 77 who are held in Florida.

Louisiana has 17 such inmates, and California has four. The others are in Iowa, Mississippi, Nebraska and South Carolina.

The lawyers for Graham and Sullivan agreed their clients committed violent crimes and deserved to spend time behind bars.

But they also argued they deserved a chance, at some time, to seek their release through parole.

"Sentencing an adolescent to life without any possibility of parole condemns him to die in prison and rejects any hope he will change for the better," said Byron Gowdy, Graham's lawyer.

Amnesty International also said the United States is the only nation in the world that impose such long prison terms on young criminals.

During the oral arguments, most of the justices sounded as though they were inclined to overturn at least some of these sentences as too extreme.

However, they differed on how to do it.

Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. offered a middle-ground approach that could overturn prison terms in some cases if the state judges failed to weigh the youth of the offender.

Roberts said this "case-by-case approach" was wiser than setting a single rule.

Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. said he agreed.

But most of the liberal justices hinted they would go further and rule it is always cruel and unusual punishment to impose a life term for an offender who is under age 18 and who did not commit a murder.

"Every state recognizes the difference between an adult and a minor. And you have to make a line. We have it at 18," said Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg.

"The teenager can't drink, can't drive, can't marry. There are many (legal) limitations on children just because they are children."

Only Justice Antonin Scalia defended Florida's policy.

He said the ban on "cruel and unusual" punishment does not give the court grounds to second-guess the length of prison terms.

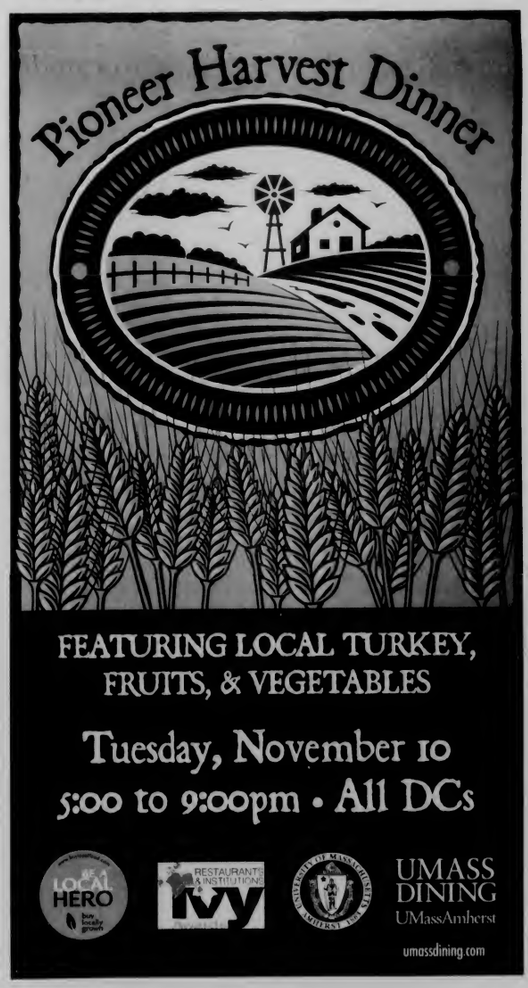
He said the court should look to history.

"When the 'cruel and unusual' clause was adopted (in 1791), 12 years was viewed as the year when a person reaches maturity," Scalia said.

"And then all felonies (were subject to) the death penalty."

Florida's Solicitor General Scott Makar agreed with Scalia and said the court should take a hands-off approach.

"I believe Florida is very balanced," he said.



The two defense lawyers also differed somewhat. Sullivan's lawyers said the justices should outlaw life prison terms for all offenders who are 13 or 14, including murderers.

Graham's lawyer said the court should only forbid life prison terms without parole for criminals under age 18 who are not involved in a homicide.

Even if Sullivan and Graham prevail, it is not likely that a ruling in their favor will affect the more than 2,000 prisoners nationwide who were sent to prison for life as juveniles for crimes where someone died.

In many states, young criminals can be given life terms if they participated in a violent crime, such as a store robbery, where someone was killed, even if they did not commit the murder.

A Florida State University survey in July found the states with the most juvenile criminals serving life terms, including for homicide, were Pennsylvania (375), Michigan (347), Louisiana (335), Florida (302), California (249) and Illinois (103).

Answered Prayers

Thomas Moore

It is 8:17 a.m. on a quiet autumn Tuesday. I eaves blanket our tenby-five foot lawn as if it were an artist's abstract creation with paints of orange, red, yellow and brown. The sky stares back with a pale blue face. Touches of clouds are marked here and there as if that same artist was dissatisfied with a single colored heaven. Most of us students from the University of Massachusetts engage in our morning routines which include coffee and last minute homework. We secretly wish for the day off but quickly disregard the fantasy as impossibility. But what if we could have a day off?

I know I can't, considering I want to obliterate everything and anything that makes enough noise to wake me up at that hour.

With classes cancelled on the whim of the weather defined by a gorgeous day, not just one snuffed out by ten feet of snow?

For those who have read my Gospel-centered columns in the past, it may be a surprise to know that one of my greatest sources of joy in life other than Jesus is reading the yellow-highlighted text on the University website announcing that "Classes are cancelled." It's as if those words in all their official rigidity actually speak life into me saying, "Look, buddy. I know you're working really hard, but just take a day off. Get back in bed, and don't wake up 'till noon. Then mosey on over to the dining hall for lunch and then go play outside."

So why can't we have more of these days that uplift our spirits? A couple of our sister schools in the Five Colleges have a day in the fall called "Mountain Day." Now this is the coolest thing I've ever heard of.

According to Alricen Roberts, a student at Smith College, the president of the school chooses a day based on how nice the weather is to cancel classes. This day is only known to them (not even the professors know), and at a sound of the campus bell at 7:00a.m., all of the classes for that day are cancelled.

Can you imagine a more anticipated noise at 7:00am for a college student? I know I can't, considering I want to obliterate everything and anything that makes enough noise to wake me up at that hour.

"It's like a snow day but more wonderful because it's a glorious autumn day," Amanda Sickles, an alumnae from Mount Holyoke College, said. She continued to talk about how that one day off improved her overall morale and "increased [her] fondness for MHC."

There will always be those whom we all envy with tight schedules consisting of a one credit yoga class at noon and a five-hour lunch break before the three credit rock-climbing seminar at Hampshire College. But I think the majority of students here at UMass run from class to class to extracurricular with just minutes to scarf down a taco salad from the Bluewall. With a job on campus along with my classes, I don't taste sweet freedom until 6:00 p.m. after having left for my morning routine at 9:00 a.m.. We could all use, at the very least, a day off to look forward to like the students at Smith and Mount Holyoke.

I don't think this is too much to ask. The cost of a professor having to wait another day to hand out their exam because of the spontaneous vacation day will most likely be paid. What better way to raise morale on campus than to provide hope for the (plentifully) stressed students?

I'm a person who regularly deals with all forms of attention deficit whether hyper active or just hyper imaginative, so the thought of a random break appeals to me. For the people who live by highly structured schedules and appointments more strictly, this may add even more stress to them. Nevertheless I think it's a necessary experience to introduce.

"Life moves pretty fast. You don't stop and look around once in a while, you could miss it," said Matthew Broderick in the great American classic film, "Ferris Bueller's Day Off." And he's right. I know the American model for "success" can only come into existence when our noses are firmly pressed on the grindstone, but I hope we're getting more out of this college experience than chronic ulcers and an addiction to caffeine.

So until the administration gets the paperwork done to include our school in the Pioneer Valley's tradition of Mountain Day, I encourage you to take it upon yourself to create time to enjoy this fall season in New England. If you need help, tomorrow is conveniently Veterans Day so practice your lounging, eating and hiking skills on your day off.

Garbage is our friend

Chris Amarosi

Throughout the ages, the most economic and expedient method of trash disposal was to dump garbage no farther than one could heave, pour or excrete it. Yet the bottle-sorting liberal elite now argues that we must reduce, reuse and recycle our waste or face irreversible ecological damage.

This is patent nonsense. Garbage represents many things for modern civilization such as an appreciation of the past. The greater the garbage, the greater a civilization. Recycling is nothing less than historical revisionism, and environmentalists are the unabashed censors of our time.

The Egyptian government, presiding over perhaps the largest historical patrimony in the world, completed a mass pig culling in May of this year. Why pigs? The given reason was to fight swine flu, but there have been no cases of the flu in Egypt. However, pigs formed a part of the ad hoc garbage disposal system in major cities like Cairo and Alexandria. The pigs were kept by the Zabaleen, who were Christian garbage collectors. The Zabaleen would gather trash door to door, bring it to a dump and let the pigs eat the organic matter. Then they would eat the pigs. A system of insidious balance between the Muslims' need for trash collection and the Zabaleen's need for a cheap food source.

Garbage forms an integral part of archaeological preservation. Many long-inhabited cities in the Middle East sit upon tells, or hills, formed from packing ruins of former cities on the site with trash.

Why bury it in obscure mountains when we can cordon off our graveyards and memorials with the warm grip of radioactive death?

This has the effect of smoothing out the ground and providing a flat location to build upon. Surely with the resilience of our modern plastics, which take tens of thousands of years to break down, we can build foundations for indestructible cities.

Fortunately, the streets of Cairo have quickly filled with garbage since May. Without pigs to feed and subsequently eat, the Zabaleen have no more incentive to collect what they cannot use. The Egyptian government, with a characteristic desire to protect antiquities from the past and future, bickers with an international garbage disposal firm, and nothing gets done. At last Egypt maintains a truly sustainable history.

There is a staggering number of applications for the great heaps of garbage in Cairo. They need only travel a few miles to find the Great Pyramid and Sphinx at Giza. Both structures have been exposed to the harsh elements for thousands of years. The lost nose of the Sphinx, often lampooned in popular culture, and the blunted tops of the pyramids are some examples of damage.

Clearly the only solution is to coat the structures with a protective layer of filth.

In this economy, we should be more concerned with preserving sites of historical importance than keeping them open but underfunded. Nuclear waste disposal has the potential to make sites of supreme importance sacrosanct for millennia. Why bury it in obscure mountains when we can cordon off our graveyards and memorials with the warm grip of radioactive death?

If whales and dolphins are destined to die from intentional or accidental encounters with fishermen, then should we not encase a few examples within plastic garbage dumped into the sea? Millions of years from now, evolved post-human life forms will dig up the fossils and marvel at our forethought.

American college dorms will be among the best-preserved structures in the world. At UMass in particular I have seen a great amount of preservation work along the footpaths on campus and floating in the pond with the ducks. In fact, there is a pile of reeking garbage down the hall from my apartment in North Residential Area.

I dream of the day when the Great Pyramid's apex acts as a low garbage mark – the day I can stand face to face with Lady Liberty without the aid of a helicopter.

Environmentalists would have us wait for the extraordinary fortune of the Pompeiians, with their city buried under natural volcanic ash and choked with soot. Instead, let us embrace the staggering size of waste we produce and put it to use. So pull our garbage bags up by the tie straps, empty it on the very spot upon which we stand, and litter for posterity's sake.

FIVE REASONS WHY

Martha Coakley did not attend Sunday's debate . . .

1) she was working on changing her name to Kennedy.

2) she actually has work to do.

3) she was consulting a decorator about the interior of her Senate office.

4) she must protect her secret identity.

5) the priceless irony of the only woman in the race not showing up to a League of Women Voters event.

A win for democracy

Eric Magazu

On both Monday and Wednesday of last week, select Amherst citizens met for a special session of Town Meeting. Fourteen separate articles were brought up for consideration by a select group of Amherst citizens that have been elected by their fellow citizens for the purpose of representing them at Town Meeting. While these meetings can often be quite dry, they are an extraordinary experience in the representative Democracy that we are welcome to witness here in Amherst.

For international students, academicians and guests, this is a great time to observe an American institution that has been copied in many places across the world. Our form of government is no longer the exclusive province of the American people, but is open to all the peoples and nations of the world. For local students who grew up in New England, it is a great chance to finally delve into the form of government that many of our own towns share.

Of the 14 articles, there were two articles during this special session of Town Meeting that were more contested than the others, Article 9 and Article 14.

While these meetings can often be quite dry, they are an extraordinary experience in representative democracy that we are welcome to witness here in Amherst.

Article 9 made an important bylaw change that makes it much easier to open medical offices inside of professional research parks, a zoning area that previously did not allow such offices. For a professional research park, there is a desire that there be limited traffic to and from the various offices inside of the PRP. A previous bylaw change allowed for attorneys to place their offices in PRPs. This was approved with the expectation that there would be only a certain number of appointments that a lawyer can take throughout the day. With medical offices, the number of appointments taken throughout the day is much higher, and there were concerns that such a change to the bylaws would alter the character of PRP zones.

Nevertheless, supporters of the Article 9 won the day by arguing that it makes it much easier to operate small medical offices and retain good doctors right here in Amherst. The article needed a two-thirds majority and passed with 105 votes in favor to 51 against.

Article 14 was much more in the public eye due to the fact that it is national in scope. The article addressed the fact that last year President Barack Obama made a commitment to close down the detention center at the American military base at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. The detention center currently holds many people who have been suspected of aiding and abetting terrorism, but to this day have not yet had their cases discharged in any satisfactory military or civilian court proceeding.

Article 14 made two separate requests in this regard. The first part requests that Congress repeal the ban on releasing cleared detainees into the United States, and the second part welcomes these cleared detainees into the Amherst community.

Detractors of our college town, who lovingly refer to Amherst as the "People's Republic of Amherst," have played this article nationally as radicals voting to give terrorists safe haven in Amherst. However, local residents on both sides of the issue did not see it this way.

Opponents of the article, including chair of the Amherst Select Board Stephanie O'Keeffe, did not argue against the merits of article, but primarily on the scope of Town Meeting to take policy positions on issues of American national security. While it has been a tradition in certain towns to pass articles on national issues, generally they are viewed dismissively by their opponents throughout the nation. O'Keeffe was also concerned about the reputation of the town and the ability of our local colleges.

The argument that won the day was exemplified by the sentiments of Select Board members Gerry Weiss and Diana Stein.

Weiss delivered the report of the Select Board, who had earlier voted 2-1 to endorse the article, with passion and conviction. He invoked the situation during World War II of Jewish refugees from Germany being denied entry into Cuba, and eventually being sent back to Europe where many were later killed. Since many of the Guantanamo terror suspects are not trusted in their home countries, there is fear that many may meet a similar end. Other supporters of the article, including Selectwoman Diana Stein, were strong in asserting that the article only applies to Guantanamo detainees that have been cleared of any wrongdoing.

Both parts of Article 14, the last article of last week's special session of Town Meeting, were both passed by a voice vote. Supporters left the meeting with grins on their faces. Stein said that she is "so happy to be living in the People's Republic of Amherst." No matter what our individual position may be on particular issues, we have to be glad that we have the amazing form of government that we do in Amherst, and even opponents have to smile knowing that we reside in such an interesting and marvelous college town like Amherst.

Fire in the belly and the heart

Matt Kushi

There are different types of ways that life's lessons present themselves. They either come from the realm of experience or inspiration. In many cases, they come from both realms.

Why am I bothering to devote an article to talking about lessons? Perhaps it's because I realize that I have learned several lessons this year. Perhaps it is because I know that there are many other kids sitting in the same position that I am – wondering what is going to become of their lives once the calendar rolls past Commencement. May 15, 2010. Many are sitting and asking themselves the question, "Who am I?"

In a sense, we all know who we are. We know what makes us who we are. However, we do not know what will happen to us in the future. Of course, we are not supposed to but it is a daunting question just the same.

With parents, advisors and our own consciences pressing us on job searches and our futures, it is not hard to get a little stressed out on this matter. Mix this with the normal array of young adult stresses, and one can feel that he is in a blender. How do we avoid from getting pushed around?

The answer is to view things from multiple perspectives small and large scale, individually and collectively. Sometimes we try so hard to put things into perspective that we forget with what we are dealing. What we need to do is be happy with who we are, not what people think we should be.

As we talked about this fire, various pictures of inspiration appeared in my mind – pictures of inspiration that make up some of my fire.

Over the past weekend, I had a conversation with a friend, Mitchell, who reminded me of this. He knows what it means to put things into perspective and having good things happen because you are true to yourself.

This past summer, Mitchell had one of his dreams come true this summer when he was drafted by the Washington Nationals in the Major League Baseball Amateur Draft. I've known Mitchell for a few years now but the conversation that we had over the weekend was personal.

We talked about hopes and dreams. We talked about perspective and motivation. We talked about who we were. Though we talk to our parents about these subjects all of the time, it was a different perspective to talk these things over with a friend.

The one thing that motivates Mitchell is his older brother, who serves our country as a member of the United States Marine Corps. What Mitchell told me was something I have known all along, something we all know but that we often need reminding of.

We all have the chance to do something great.

The difference between greatness and mediocrity is commitment. What we discussed this past weekend was fire. Not a bonfire but something deeper the fire that drives us to be who we are, the fire that is our conscience and our raw dedication to ourselves and all things beyond ourselves. We talked about harnessing that fire and walking to unknown depths in our lives with it.

As we talked about this fire, various pictures of inspiration appeared in my mind – pictures of inspiration that make up some of my fire.

I thought of the background on my computer, Marines raising the flag on Mount Suribachi, the fifth day of the Battle of Iwo Jima during World War II. These men dedicated their lives to something greater than themselves. Heroes that took their dreams and ran with it, no matter what others thought, much like those that lost their lives in the tragic shooting at Fort Hood last week.

Yes, there are personal stories that motivate me as well. Among them are my family – one bound by love. We all have this revelation at some point. These are our components.

We must take into perspective our position in the world. We live in the United States of America. We have the opportunity to do what we want and follow our dreams. Many parts of this world do not have that luxury. However, this is only the bigger picture.

While it is true that we must look out for each other, we must not forget to look out for ourselves either. We have to our individual self into perspective before we can put ourselves in perspective with the world.

In the end, we have to find that fire within us and run with it as my friend put it.

Through a simple conversation with a friend, I was reminded of this lesson. I was also reminded of the fact that life isn't about what is popular. It is about what is right, whether it be individually or collectively.

No cushion for the pushin' in 'Pokey'

By Ellie Rulon-Miller
Collegian Staff

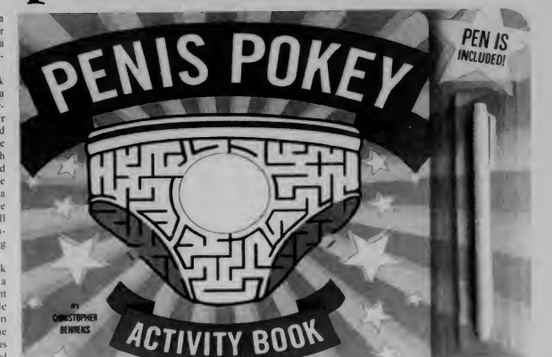
Christopher Behrens must think he's a clever guy.

The writer of the epically stupid novelty book "Penis Pokey," apparently did not test his product before publisher Quirk Books picked it up for distribution. The book with its sparse length of only nine pages, thick cardboard pages and bright, bold illustrations reminiscent of a children's story – has a 1 and three fourth inch hole cut out of its middle, inviting male readers to fill in what is missing from each picture: their man parts.

At first glance, "Penis Pokey" looks like it could be entertaining, as long as there are two people present: one to put his member through the hole, and the other to look at it, point and giggle.

What Behrens failed to think through was the fact that the skin on a man's junk is incredibly sensitive and, if it had a brain and the ability to speak, would probably scream in terror at the thought of rubbing itself against the rough cardboard contained within this book.

Surprisingly enough, you are not actually supposed to put your poker through the hole in the book. There is a disclaimer on the back of the book which reads: "Do not put your penis through the holes in this book or any other unfamiliar holes. Death, severe injury or paper cut may occur." I know what you're thinking: that would be one hell of a paper cut.



Unless you're into inserting your stuff into dry, coarse, cardboard holes, the book is wholly idiotic. Each page has a children's activity to go along with the "missing piece" aspect: "Can you circle the 20 differences in these pictures?" "Use the marker [which is included] to finish these pictures" of a man's face and a sandwich, which are missing your penis as the guy's nose and, oddly, the contents of a (man)wich, which has been illustrated with a toothpick piercing it.

Perhaps the most awkward pages of the book are the two in which you are supposed to "invite a friend to help you finish this picture." The center-fold picture is of two dragons that are missing their heads. The thing about this picture is that if you hold the book straight open, you cannot fit two people right next to each other to put their things through the holes unless they're small boys, which would be entirely too inappropriate. In order to make the dragon image work, you have to have the book at a 90 degree angle and slip your phallus at such so the dragons have heads. However, the book is just small enough that the two anacondas who would be completing the picture would undoubtedly be touching and probably creating an uncomfortable moment.

There is no way that the "Penis Pokey" book could be any fun to a single user, unless he had a mirror present. There can't be very much excitement in pushing Admiral Winky through this abrasive hole and chuckling to yourself over the fact that, even though you can't see it, you're completing some ridiculous illustration with your most scandalous body part. This book obviously isn't meant to be used solo but in a mixed company setting instead.

Overall, "Penis Pokey" isn't worth the $10.36 that it's going for on Amazon.com. No paper cut – no matter how humorous the story of how you got it is – is worth that kind of a sacrifice.

Paper cuts and guilty chuckles abound when author Christopher Behrens' phallic-oriented cut out book, "Penis Pokey," pokes its way into a social setting.

Hoping to foster a more courteous demeanor in smokers toward those around them, the Student Health Advisory Board hosted the fourth annual "No Butts About It" event.

Students clean up campus butts

Annual hunt worth its weight in cigarette tips

By Lisa Linsley
Collegian Staff

Don't like cigarette butts cluttering up your campus? Neither do the University of Massachusetts students who volunteered last Sunday to collect stray ones across campus for the fourth annual "No Butts About It" event.

Stations were set up outside of Franklin, Worcester and Berkshire Dining Commons from 12 to 3 p.m. Sunday, where participating students were given a pair of latex gloves and a zip-lock bag to hunt for cigarette butts. The event was organized by the Student Health Advisory Board (SHAB), which serves as a liaison between students and University Health Services.

The purpose of "No Butts About It" is to raise awareness of the pernicious environmental effects of smoking, rather than just the health risks.

"We aren't saying not to smoke but to be more cautious of where you dispose of cigarettes," said Tom Schiff, supervisor of the Student Health Advisory Board. From the lawn of the W.E.B. Du Bois to dormitory areas, students spent the afternoon picking up the remnants of once-smoked cigarettes. According to Schiff, "If you look around a dorm building you can see hundreds of cigarette butts. We want people to keep in mind that the campus is our home."

Another goal of the event was to help foster, in smokers, a more courteous demeanor toward those around them by acknowledging the risks of second-hand smoke.

"There are huge amounts of evidence that smoking is harmful to people around us. So people should move away from entrances and think about their neighbors," said Schiff.

According to SHAB President Nathan Colon, "The process of making cigarettes takes a toll on the planet. Everyone always learns about the personal affects of smoking, but the environmental impacts are neglected. It takes 25 years for cigarette butts to decompose, so often they are there for people's lifetime."

Cigarette butts have a negative impact on the environment by being harmful to animals and forest. The tobacco industry burns as much as one acre of forest for every acre of tobacco. Many animals and fish eat cigarette butts by mistake and die because their bodies have no way to digest the filters.

Last year, students collected 12 pounds of cigarette butts, and about 30 students participated. "This year over 60 students signed up," said Schiff.

Students were asked to return the collected butts to a designated station so that they can be on display for the American Cancer Society's "Great American Smoke-Out." The "Great American Smoke-Out" is a day when smokers stop smoking for the day and hopefully continue trying to quit after. Now in its 31st year, the event takes place every third Thursday in November.

"On this day, millions of Americans choose to quit smoking. Most people who smoke want to quit smoking, but it takes a number of attempts," said Schiff.

There will be a table set up in the campus center Nov. 19 in honor of this event, when collected cigarette butts will be on display. Last year, students in the art department created art work and sculptures out of the butts.

"The purpose of the event is to be an eye-opener to the campus. We want students to realize the number of cigarettes left behind and what it's doing to the environment," said Colon.

Kids stay up late for a brush with 'Hollywood'

By Dave Mansfield
Collegian Staff

If last Saturday's show was any indication, the future for the local indie rock scene is looking pretty bright. Fresh faced local rockers Who Shot Hollywood headlined a show at Pearl Street that featured other young and talented acts, Mountain Interval, Bad Vibes and Client Number 9. The crowd was pretty young themselves, with lots of shaggy haired, flat brim hat wearing middle-schoolers abound, relishing a night in which they could rock out free from parental supervision.

Mountain Interval was first to take the stage, and had to field a replacement drummer at the last minute as their regular drummer had fallen victim to the notorious swine flu. However, the six-member group didn't miss a beat, as their opening number, "No Time," opened with loud, rolling percussion and synth effects reminiscent of church bells. Lead singer Alexa Clark provided some impressive, powerful female vocals that were particularly resonant on songs such as "Upstrokes." Their catchy, syncopated riffs and layered melodies may remind some of Minus the Bear or The Annuals.

In a somewhat bittersweet performance, Bad Vibes left everything on the stage after announcing that they were playing their last show for about six months. In what was perhaps the most impressive performance of the night, Bad Vibes pleased their youthful onlookers with great energy, heartfelt choruses and danceable riffs.

Bad Vibes front man Will Cole sounded a bit like Paul Banks of Interpol with his deep, sometimes raspy and angst-filled vocals. Highlighting their set were songs "Bars and Restaurants" and "These Days," which evoked some passionate "whoas" from the audience. In an appreciative gesture towards their fans who quickly clamored to the the front of the stage, the band handed out about 50 free CDs.

Bad Vibes were followed up by instrumental rock act Client Number 9. The recent Amherst Regional "Battle of the Bands" winners provided a bit of a change of pace, giving the crowd some slower, more grandiose-sounding music. The three-piece act, consisting of a guitarist, a bassist and a drummer, produced an array of sound surprising for such a small ensemble, although they didn't sacrifice musicality for volume.

Seizing on the opportunity to create intricate layers and dynamic builds and climaxes, Client Number 9 earned their comparisons to more established acts such as Explosions in the Sky. The highlight of their set was their impressive, instrumental adaptation of "Disorder," a song originally produced by Joy Division.

They only played a three-song set, but after much pleading from the crowd and some coaxing from members of Who Shot Hollywood, the soundboard operator agreed to let them play one more song.

The most anticipated act of the evening, Who Shot Hollywood, took to the stage and jumped into their set in a frenetic fashion that sent their pubescent crowd into a tizzy. They opened with "Langston" off of their new EP "Cat Ears."

The youngest ensemble of the show definitely showed their youth, as they danced around stage as if they could barely contain their excitement. They followed up with "Runescape," a short minute and a half track in which front man Daniel Kendall showed off his simple yet catchy lyrics: "It's too bad, you're so sad," wailed Kendall. "I can't wait to meet your dad."

The band displayed a varied style with the aptly-titled track "Who Shot Hollywood." Songs like "Astronomer" Scouts Honor" chanted the band before each chorus. With mostly distorted vocals, sometimes dissonant guitar riffs and keyboard arrangements that seemed effortlessly melodic, Who Shot Hollywood displayed a lot of skill and raw ability for a group its meager in years.

Although their energy was a bit over the top at times, their enthusiasm was infectious. They closed with the title track "Cat Ears," perhaps the most well-crafted song from the new EP. Kendall sang lyrics tinged with the furor that only youth can supply, such as "You won't ever get me, cause I'll kill you if you try" which really summed up the band's punk rock attitude.

Before being called back for an encore, Kendall displayed how adept he was at being a salesman. He reminded the crowd that they didn't have to buy their album, but that they could just download it for free off the band's website. During the encore, keyboardist Tamion Wick and guitarist Lucas Graham ditched their instruments to stage dive, while brothers Lucas and Dana Kendall treated the crowd to one more song, capping off a show that no doubt left a lasting impression on spectators young and old alike.

Fresh-faced youngsters flocked en masse to Northampton's Pearl Street last Saturday to experience the mostly distorted, often angst-laden musical stylings of Who Shot Hollywood.

Flyers end year as undefeated A–10 Champs

Freshman Colleen Williams looking for an open patch in a game against Charlotte earlier this season. Williams scored her seventh goal of the season against Charlotte on Sunday, tying the game.

By Geena Lombardi
Collegian Staff

A new Atlantic 10 women's soccer champion emerged this past weekend of play.

Top-seeded Dayton faced off against second-seeded Charlotte, as the Flyers continued their perfect season and came out with the 2-1 victory.

The 49ers (16-3-2, 9-0-2 A-10) struck first during Sunday's game. In the 19th minute, Kirby Stenard took a pass from Oni Bernard and headed it into the net for her eighth score of the season.

Dayton (16-0-5, 10-0-1 A-10) was not to be outdone, as Colleen Williams evened out the score at 1-1 just over a minute later. The goal was William's seventh of the season and came from an assist by Mandi Back.

The score remained tied until the 87th minute, when junior Jerica DeWolfe came through for the Flyers with the game-winning goal from 40 yards out.

Charlotte had a few opportunities to take the lead, such as a penalty kick in the 23rd minute that was missed by senior Hailey Beam. A goal was scored by the 49ers towards the end of the second half, though it did not count due to the player being offside. Charlotte also held a slight shot advantage over Dayton, 19-14, and 49ers goalkeeper Katherine Boone had eight saves and was named A-10 Defensive Player of the Year.

A-10 Women's Soccer

The A-10 championship win serves as the sixth for the Flyers – the most in its conference. Dayton also won the A-10 regular season title with its nation-leading undefeated record. Williams, who scored the first goal for the Flyers, was named A-10 Rookie of the Year. Back and sophomore Kathleen Beljan were named to the All-Championship team. Concluding the list of awards for Dayton was junior Cara Cornacchia, who was named the Championship Most Outstanding Player.

Saint Louis, Fordham advance

The A-10 women's soccer championship started off on Thursday, Nov. 5 with games between Fordham versus Massachusetts and Saint Louis versus St. Bonaventure.

Third-seeded Fordham defeated sixth-seeded Massachusetts, 3-0, in the first game of conference play.

Annie Worden opened up the Rams' (9-12-1, 7-4-0 A-10) scoring with her sixth goal of the season in the 30th minute. Fordham kept the 1-0 lead throughout the first half, until Michelle Ancelj increased the score to 2-0 in the 57th minute. Megan Cookson scored the final goal for the Rams in the 72nd minute off of an assist from Mariella Romano.

The Rams held a 27-7 shot advantage over the Minutewomen (6-11-2, 5-6-0 A-10). UMass goalkeepers Lauren Luckey and Emily Cota recorded 13 saves for their team. The Massachusetts offense, however, could not capitalize on any scoring opportunities, giving Fordham the win and advancement in the A-10 tournament.

Game two of the conference was a matchup between No. 5 Saint Louis and No. 4 St. Bonaventure.

The Billikens (8-9-4, 4-4-3 A-10) jumped out to an early lead with a goal from sophomore Andrea Barklage at the 2:15 mark. Senior Ashley Hayes was credited with the assist, her fifth of the season. Junior Ashley Brazill netted her fourth goal of the season to give Saint Louis a 2-0 advantage. Senior Kelly Waeckerle wrapped up the Billikens' scoring with a goal in the 67th minute.

Saint Louis goalkeeper Hannah Perry recorded her eighth shutout of the season, saving four shots during the game, compared to Bonnies' (10-11-0, 7-4-0 A-10) goalkeeper, Nicole Markert, who made 12 saves. The Billikens outshot St. Bonaventure 14-5 and claimed the 3-0 victory to advance to the semi-finals.

Semifinals Dominated by Charlotte, Dayton

Saturday's A-10 conference semifinal games consisted of matchups between Charlotte versus Fordham and Dayton versus Saint Louis.

Fordham took the early lead in game one when Annie Worden scored in the first 45 seconds of play for her team-leading seventh goal of the season.

Charlotte's Sam Huecker took a shot from 13 yards out and tied the score at 1-1 27 minutes later. The 49ers thought they had taken the lead with a Whitney Weinraub goal in the 83rd minute, but she was called offside and the goal was taken away. Six minutes later, Megan Minnix executed a pass to India Winford who scored Charlotte's second and final goal.

Scoring opportunities by Leah Loguidice and Katie McDermott were shut down by 49ers' goalkeeper Lauren Brown, who tallied four total saves and helped Charlotte to the 2-1 victory.

Rachel Suther and Sarah Zieman each played a half in goal for the Rams, combining for four saves.

Game two of semifinal play was dominated by Dayton who defeated Saint Louis, 5-1.

Colleen Williams netted an early goal for the Flyers in the third minute of play off of an assist from Cara Cornacchia. Williams scored again later in the first half, along with Tori Oelschlager.

Saint Louis attempted a comeback in the 33rd minute, when Emily Kryzer took an assist from Susan Frederickson and moved the score to 3-1.

The Flyers' senior Lauren MacCormick contributed a fourth goal to Dayton's lead nearly 12 minutes into the second half.

The Billikens brought in backup goalie Amber Zdanovec as an attempt to stop the scoring frenzy. Kelly Blumenshein was not deterred by this change in goaltending, as she took a long shot and scored Dayton's fifth and final goal of the game.

UM teams win, move to 3–1 on the season

By Jeffrey Engmann
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's and women's swimming and diving teams were victorious this weekend in their home meet versus Binghamton.

The Minutemen won by a score of 171-107. The women were dominant as well, defeating Binghamton, 182-117.

"I think it was a really good team effort. We had a lot of people step up," UMass women's coach Bob Newcomb said.

Among those who performed well were freshman Amina Meho, who was able to win the 100-yard backstroke with a time of 1:00.87. Fellow freshman Julie Maygar also emerged with a win in the 1000-yard freestyle.

The women were able to take both the 100 and 200-yard breaststroke events. Junior Jessica Staroseilec earned first place in both the 100 and 200, and her teammates did well to keep up with her. In the 100, Rachel Borden came in second place, and Megan Nowak finished fourth.

Sophomore Hannah Swift earned first place in both the one and three meter diving events. Freshman Michaela Butler performed well, finishing right behind Swift in the one meter diving event.

On the men's side, there were many strong performances as well.

Sophomore Joey Sbordon had a very strong showing, as he displayed his skills in the freestyle events. Sbordon was able to win the 200, 500 and 1000-yard freestyle events in impressive fashion.

The quartet of Chris Howard, Juan Moliere, Sasan Tehrani and Julian Mckean capped off the day with an attention-grabbing performance in the 200-yard freestyle relay. Moliere's anchor performance made an impression on his head coach, as he was able finish the last 50 yards in 19.97 seconds.

"The stand out performer was Juan Moliere. He was lights out," UMass men's coach Russ Yarworth said. "You don't see a kid go under 20 seconds in the 50. That's blistering."

Moliere also swept the sprints on Saturday, as he put forth dominant performances in the 50 and 100 freestyle meets.

Jason Cook was once again strong on the diving board, as he took first place in the one meter dive. His performance allowed him to remain undefeated in the young season. Adam Duffield also performed well on Saturday, as he came in second place in both the one and three meter events.

"It's nice to be home in a very loud environment," Newcomb said.

The energy could be seen from the sideline, as both teams rooted each other on throughout the day. That energy was imitated by a strong crowd that filled the gymnasium, as some alumni came to the meet to support their former team.

The meet also marked the return of Binghamton head coaches Sean Clark and Rueben Rappe to Joseph Rogers Pool. The two coaches are UMass alumni who had great careers as members of the swim team.

After four dual meets, both the men's and women's teams hold a 3-1 record.

Minutewomen novice squad finish third overall

By Peter Vasquez
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts rowing team sent its novice squad to Dartmouth on Saturday to participate in the Green Monster Regatta, held annually on the Connecticut River in New Hampshire.

The Minutewomen finished third overall, a result determined by combining their two boats' times. The UMass boats finished in sixth and ninth place respectively.

UMass assistant coach Alex Binkowski traveled with the group and organized two equal boats of eight rowers comprised mostly of walk-ons.

"I would say 65 to 70 percent of our team is made up of walk-ons," Binkowski said. "Our team thrives on walk-ons. But our walk-ons aren't like most teams. Some 99 percent of our walk-ons never rowed before they came and took part in our tryouts."

Many, he said, excel at other sports including basketball, volleyball and swimming, but they may not have had an opportunity to play on the UMass team and were looking for something more than a club sport.

"It's a great athletic opportunity," Binkowski said. "Athletically speaking, it's a second chance or third chance for a lot of these athletes."

Binkowski embraces the challenge of trying to get inexperienced rowers ready to compete in a short period of time. Races such as the Green Monster Regatta allow him to integrate the walk-ons with the recruits.

"From my standpoint, their learning curve is just going straight up," Binkowski said. "I have people who may have rowed a year or two in high school and a lot of people who have never rowed, and I get five to six weeks to try to teach them how to row and get them ready to race. I get to watch them develop during the course of the year, so it's a lot of fun. It's rewarding in that way."

The Minutewomen faced stiff competition this weekend with programs such as Radcliffe and Dartmouth racing two boats apiece in a race totaling 11 boats. It spanned a distance of 4,500 meters and was comparable to a cross-country race, unlike during the spring season when most races resemble a sprint. However the results were not so important to Binkowski as the overall learning experience.

"It was excellent competition," he said. "But it's no pressure – low key. It's a small group in a small regatta. So it just helps them with the whole learning process. It's a dry run for our spring regattas. I want everyone to learn what it entails."

While a majority of the UMass novice team has not had formal training in rowing, the same cannot be said for the other programs in attendance.

"I told the novice squad if anybody thinks anybody in the two Radcliffe boats or the two Dartmouth boats had anybody that didn't know how to row six weeks ago, then you're kidding yourself," Binkowski said. "They were all experienced. There wasn't anybody in those four boats who was new to rowing."

Nevertheless, Binkowski sees many of his novice rowers eventually working their way into the varsity boats.

"They have nothing but potential," he said, "and all it takes is continued hard work."

Wildcats overthrow top-ranked Spiders

CAA Football

The No. 4 Villanova football team won its battle with No. 1 Richmond, 21-20, in the headlining bout Saturday.

Senior Brandyn Harvey made a one-handed grab for a game-winning 29-yard touchdown with less than a minute to go to defeat the defending national champions.

The Wildcats (8-1, 5-1 Colonial Athletic Association) snapped the Spiders' (8-1, 6-1 CAA) 17-game winning streak in front of 11,667 at UR Stadium.

Villanova marched down the field for the victory after Richmond took their first lead of the game, 20-14, with two minutes, 22 seconds remaining. The Spiders threatened to hold, as they forced Villanova into a climatic 4th-and-11 from their own 29-yard line. Then, junior quarterback Chris Whitney found Harvey for the game-winning strike.

The win was Villanova's second over a top-ranked opponent with the other also being a victory over Richmond. The Wildcats defeated the Spiders, 26-20, last year at Villanova Stadium.

Whitney went 21-34 for 277 yards and three touchdowns on the day. Harvey snared six balls for 79 yards as well as the game-winning touchdown.

Wildcats survive in high-scoring affair

No. 8 New Hampshire (8-1, 5-1 CAA) was the last one standing in its shootout with Rhode Island (1-8, 0-6 CAA), as it defeated the Rams, 55-42, at Cowell Stadium.

New Hampshire used a balanced offensive attack to defeat Rhode Island with 262 rushing yards and 234 passing yards. The Rams compiled 535 total yards, with 424 coming through the air, in a losing effort.

Running back Chad Kackert piled up 267 all-purpose yards, including 166 yards and two touchdowns on the ground. Quarterback R.J. Toman threw for 234 yards and two scores on the day as well. Tight End Scott Sicko caught three passes for 41 yards and a touchdown as he moved into the UNH Top 10 for career receptions.

Rhode Island quarterback Chris Paul-Etienne racked up 424 yards and four touchdowns through the air in the loss, with receiver Shawn Leonard catching 10 passes for 275 yards. Running back Ayo Isjola ran for 66 yards on 13 carries to lead the Rams on the ground.

No. 23 Delaware held on to beat Hofstra, 28-24, in Delaware Stadium on Saturday. The Blue Hens (6-3, 4-3 CAA) had a crucial fourth down stop in their own territory, as linebacker Bernard Makumbi made a tackle to preserve the victory over the Pride (4-5, 2-4 CAA).

Delaware clinched a .500 or better record for the 19th time in the last 23 seasons with the win, but had to overcome three turnovers to do it. They also caught a break early in the fourth quarter, as an interception return for a touchdown by safety Ray McDonough was nullified by an offside penalty on the Pride. The Blue Hens retained possession and drove 93 yards in nine plays for the game-winning touchdown.

Delaware quarterback Pat Devlin completed 14 of 22 passes for 185 yards and two touchdowns, and running back Jerry Butler carried the ball 18 times for 89 yards and two scores to pace the Blue Hens to victory.

A-10 Tournament to begin, matchups set

By Herb Scribner
Collegian Staff

A-10 Men's Soccer

After a final weekend of play, the playoff matchups have been established for the Atlantic 10 Championships beginning Thursday.

Fordham will play St. Bonaventure in the first round, which will mark the second meeting between the two teams this season. Earlier in the year, the game resulted in a 2-1 win for the Rams (9-6-3, 6-1-2 A-10).

During the contest, Fordham was eager to strike first as senior Alex Brunbauer scored in the 29th minute. In the same minute, however, the Bonnies (9-8, 5-4 A-10) scored right back with a goal by senior Sam Maheu.

Going into the halftime break, the two teams were evenly matched. It took a goal by freshman Marcus Axelsson in the 54th minute to put the Rams ahead for good. With these two teams meeting again in the playoffs, a tight game should be expected.

The second match taking place on Nov. 12 is likely to be the most highly anticipated match of the weekend, as No. 15 Charlotte will take on host, Rhode Island. The 49ers (11-3-4, 5-2-2 A-10) and Rams (9-8-1, 6-3-0 A-10) have not previously met this season.

While Rhode Island has the fourth seed in the playoff bracket, Charlotte has arguably had a better season, earning a national rank.

The 49ers currently lead the A-10 in goals with 39, while Rhode Island has had fewer scores as they sit in seventh place with 26 goals. This is one of four categories that Charlotte leads the conference in, along with shots, points and goals per game.

First seeded Dayton awaits the lowest remaining seed after the first two matches, while second seeded Saint Louis will play the highest remaining seed.

Saint Joseph's ends season winless

It was a winless season for Saint Joseph's, as it could not capitalize on its final shot at victory when it was shutout, 3-0, by Saint Louis.

Facing the Billikens (12-6-0, 7-2-0 A-10) was not an easy task for a team without any wins. The Hawks (0-17-0, 0-9-0 A-10) could not find an answer during the match, as their nine shots were stopped by Saint Louis.

Saint Joseph's let up a goal 22 minutes into the match to give the Billikens the lead. This was followed by two yellow card bookings to junior Greg Dunsang and senior Travis Gist.

A bright spot for the Hawks was goalkeeper Andrew D'Ottavi who had four saves during the match. D'Ottavi's saving efforts gave Saint Joseph's the league lead in saves – its only conference-leading category.

Double OT thriller gives Dayton regular season conference title

To clinch the A-10 regular season title, No. 23 Dayton needed either a tie or a win. The Flyers got what they wanted with a 2-1 win over St. Bonaventure after two overtime periods.

Dayton (13-4-1, 8-1-0 A-10) cut it close during the match, trailing 1-0 with about a minute left to play in regulation. Senior Jeff Popella scored a goal to knot the game up and send it into overtime. The goal could not have been more dramatic, as Popella scored on the penalty kick.

Popella scored again during the overtime period, giving Dayton the 2-1 victory. Though the win was not necessary, it did put a stamp on a successful season for the Flyers.

This is the first time since 2000 that Dayton has won the regular season conference title.

Levasseur denied right to travel to MA

U.S. Parole Commission refuses speaker's request to cross state lines to speak at UMass

By Sam Butterfield and Bobby Hett
Collegian Staff

After a dizzying back-and-forth of controversy, one thing appears to have finally been decided in the heated debate surrounding Ray Luc Levasseur's expected speech at the University of Massachusetts Thursday.

Levasseur, a convicted bomber hailed by some as a hero and derided by others as a terrorist, will not be speaking at the event, "The Great Western Massachusetts Sedition Trial: Twenty Years Later."

The U.S. Parole Commission, which supervises the parole of people convicted of federal offenses, denied Levasseur the right to travel from his home state of Maine to Massachusetts to deliver the address. Levasseur can only cross state lines with permission from the Commission, and though he has been allowed to speak before at universities such as Columbia, Temple and the University of Southern Maine, the Commission denied him the right to travel to Amherst.

Levasseur would not speculate on why the Commission rejected this request.

"I don't have any inside knowledge of what they based their decision on," said Levasseur, reached by the Daily Collegian Wednesday night from his home in Portland, Maine. "I leave it up to others to see how things unfolded and what they think led to it. I didn't get a written notification," he said.

Calls requesting comment from the Parole Commission, based in Chevy Chase, Md., on why the board refused Mr. Levasseur's request were not returned before press time.

Levasseur, the former leader of the now infamous United Freedom Front, said of the event that he "will be there in spirit," but that he would not be participating in any capacity.

He said he was frustrated with the Commission's decision because he feels he will not be able to exercise his right to free speech.

"Obviously I'm disappointed, I'm not able to exercise my first amendment rights," he said. "I feel like I have a right to speak, I feel like other people have a right to listen, discuss, and debate, and I think there's an infringement on that," he added.

Levasseur said he hoped people would still attend the speech and that their presence would send a message of support for the first amendment.

"What I'm hoping for is that the student body and the public will really turn out and fill every seat there, and by their presence and their participation and interaction in this event, that that itself will be an affirmation that the first amendment is not easily trampled on," he said.

Levasseur became embroiled in this controversy after he was invited as part of the W.E.B. Du Bois Library's fifth annual Colloquium on Social Change.

The original event, also planned for Thursday, was cancelled after the family of a New Jersey State Police

UM energy conference connects Springfield

By Christa Romano
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts has an extensive history of providing clean energy research and education and is quickly becoming a nationwide leader in green research, advocacy and campus sustainability.

On Tuesday, UMass hosted its second annual Clean Energy Connections conference in Springfield. The event was geared toward career and business development and networking for anyone interested in working in the burgeoning green economy.

Many speakers were present throughout the ten-hour event, discussing topics such as the different possibilities for careers in energy efficiency, how to begin and finance a clean energy business and ways to foster a green economy within a community.

Alexandra Risley-Schroeder spoke about utilizing the resources at the conference to gain experience, in the hopes of beginning a green career.

"You don't need to learn how to put solar panels on a roof right away," she said. "But you can use short term training opportunities as a launch pad for something more significant."

Even volunteering, Schroeder said, would be beneficial to anyone aspiring to get into the clean energy industry.

"You may be thinking 'I can't volunteer, I'm trying to start a career here,' but never underestimate the training possibilities it can provide," she said.

"The thing about volunteering is that there is such a variety out there," she said, "but companies will need help installing solar energy water heaters."

In addition to the lectures taking place all day, over 50 tables were stationed in the Mass Mutual Center where the conference took place, demonstrating the fact that sustainability and clean energy are emerging as critical drivers of business development, job creation and economic growth in Massachusetts and nationwide. The tables were stations for representatives from a wide variety of companies, ranging from banks to home construction to higher education.

Goals of the different companies ranged from recruitment purposes to marketing and awareness. One company present at the opportunity fair was Green Monster E-Cycling, which will pick up any old electronics and recycle them, keeping out-of-date computers and cell phones out of landfills.

Another company represented was Peoples Bank, which Xiaolei Hua, head of the company's environmental company, said is "working toward improving internal green standards as well as promoting green energy externally." Hua explained to passersby that Peoples

UMass marks 20 years since fall of Berlin Wall

Demonstrators gather at Berlin's Brandenburg Gate, where the Berlin Wall once stood, to mark 20 years since the fall of the border between capitalist western Europe and the communist east. A sign reads "stop the wars."

By Michael Toomey
Collegian Staff

On Tuesday, November 10, the University of Massachusetts hosted a celebration of the 20-year anniversary of the fall of the Berlin Wall on the second floor of the Herter Hall Annex. The festivities included a well-catered reception, the official opening of an art exhibit in tribute of the historic anniversary and a screening of the documentary, "Leipzig in the Fall," which chronicles the demonstrations that helped topple the Wall from the perspective of the citizens involved.

The event, organized by the UMass German and Scandinavian Studies Department, with help from the History Department was part of an international effort of the German government to celebrate this historically and culturally significant date. Chancellor Robert C. Holub, also a professor of German and Scandinavian studies spoke briefly in honor of the event.

German Ambassador Klaus Scharioth extended an invitation to UMass to submit a proposal for participating in the Freedom Without Walls program, where campuses around the country receive funding to host events in memory of this critical turning point in modern history.

UMass professors Barton Byg and Skyler Arndt-Briggs of German and Scandinavian Studies, along with History professor Jon Olsen created the proposal that was approved by the German Embassy. UMass is

Cooley-Dickinson institutes new visiting rules

By Jessica Bonheur
Collegian Staff

Due to the rising number of influenza cases this fall, many hospitals in the region have re-evaluated their visitation policies. As a measure to help preserve public health and the safety and well-being of inpatients and visitors, Cooley-Dickinson Hospital in Northampton is the most recent hospital to implement a change to its policy.

The hospital announced that effective Monday, Nov. 9, there would be new restrictions to visitation. These measures were initiated to provide safe environments for patients, staff and visitors. The policy changes consist of an age requirement of 18-years-old for visitors, a ban on sick visitors and limiting the number of guests allowed near the patient's bedside. The policy states that only those guests necessary for the patient's comfort will be permitted to be near their bed.

To minimize the spread of the flu in the community, Cooley-Dickinson also suggests not bringing children to hospital appointments to minimize the number of people in the waiting rooms. It is recommended that patients come alone for hospital appointments.

These policies will be in place during the entire flu season, which lasts until May. As always, the hospital recommends washing hands frequently, keeping hand sanitizer available and avoiding close contact with others in the event of illness.

According to Christina Trinchero, the senior director of marketing and communications at Cooley-Dickinson, "the hospital saw 10 cases of flu in September and 40 cases in October."

Dr. Joanne Levin, a medical director and infection prevention specialist at Cooley-Dickinson, said the hospital's visitation policies will be in effect while the flu is affecting the area's children.

They will last "as long as flu is circulating widely among the children of our community," she said, "hopefully this will be a relatively short time."

Levin said patients should encourage only healthy family and friends to see them while they are hospitalized and should heartily enforce hand-washing practices.

"(Patients) can ask friends and family who are sick not to visit and to adhere to our visitation policy," she said. "They can watch to be sure their care-giver washes his or her hands before giving care; it's okay to ask someone to wash their hands if they see someone has forgotten," she continued.

Levin said there are as yet no reliable figures on the number of flu cases in the area.

"We don't have an accurate and quick test for this flu," she said, advising citizens that "the best information for the nation and New England is found on the CDC website."

Levin said that there is an age restriction for hospital visitors because, "this flu preferentially infects younger people."

She added that hospital staff is taking precautions to curtail the spread of the flu.

"We are encouraging all direct care givers to be immunized, as supply is available," she said. "The response has been very good, as staff have been clamoring for vaccines, though we have not yet had enough for everyone."

"As always, good hand hygiene is of prime importance to limiting the spread of a variety of infections," said Levin.

Levin said the general public should take the flu seriously and get rest in the event of feeling sick.

"Stay home if you are sick," she cautioned, "wash your hands frequently when out in public, don't visit others who are sick with the flu, if possible."

Levin said this is the first time Cooley-Dickinson has put such restrictions in place.

"Not that I am aware of," she said when asked about restrictions, "but this flu is different."

Levin said the efficacy of the new measure will be difficult to track but that she hopes ultimately it will lead to no patients developing flu while in the hospital.

"(Tracking the policy) will be difficult to measure," she said, "I am hoping to see very little, if any, flu inpatients who did not come in with it, especially in infants and moms."

Embattled organizer protested at visit

ACORN founder Wade Rathke gives speech Tuesday at UMass' Gordon Hall

By Cameron Ford
Collegian Staff

S.P. Sullivan/Collegian

Protesters turned out Tuesday to oppose ACORN founder and civic organizer Wade Rathke's appearance at UMass promoting his new book, Citizen Wealth: Winning the Campaign to Save Working Families. Members of the Glenn Beck backed 912 Project oppose ACORN and Rathke.

Wade Rathke, founder of the Association of Community Organizations for Reform Now (ACORN) spoke on Tuesday evening at the University of Massachusetts' Gordon Hall to promote his new book, Citizen Wealth: Winning the Campaign to Save Working Families.

On Monday, Nov. 9 Rathke spoke at Springfield College, where nearly 30 conservatives were waiting to disrupt his talk. According to an eyewitness account, several conservatives stood up and began shouting accusations at Rathke, who was able to convince them to wait until the following question-and-answer session.

Rathke posted an account of the lecture on his blog, noting that "the room filled up amazingly to almost the full 250 capacity. There were people from local community organizations: ARISE, Springfield ACORN and ADP. There were 9/12ers sitting in the front row in motorcycle vests as well as some others sprinkled about the hall. There were students galore and a number of older faculty and retired types."

"I was introduced and as I walked to the lectern, the first of the Beckers jumped up from his seat to protest my speaking and rant about ACORN and its evil and prostitution and whatnot. Department chair, Herb Zette, walked up to him and ushered him out."

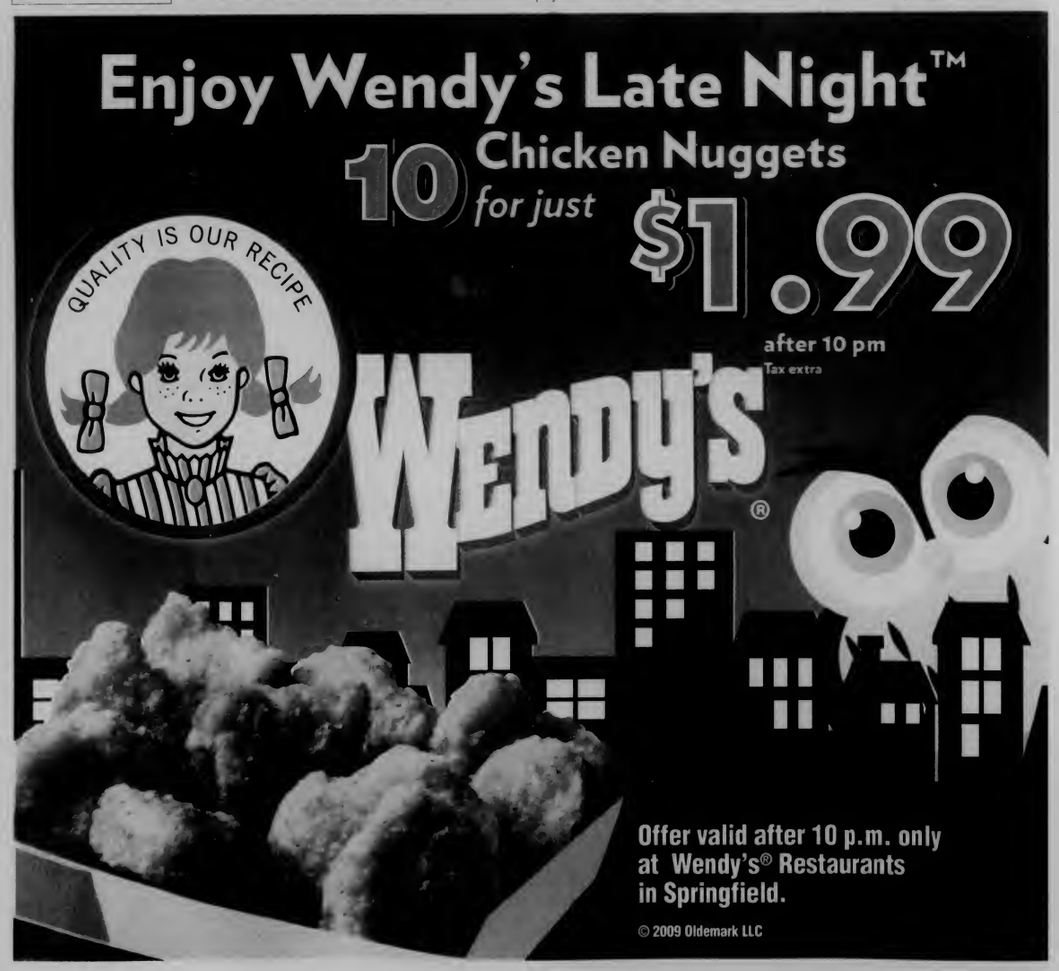
If Rathke had been expecting something similar Tuesday at UMass, he was sorely mistaken. Rather, the crowd sat and listened quietly as Professor Dan Clawson of the Department of Sociology introduced Rathke and turned over the podium to him. Clawson became concerned that the lecture would be interrupted by protests again.

"Anybody is welcome to attend and listen and ask questions," Clawson said in an interview on the morning of the lecture. "On the other hand, anybody who disrupts the talk will be asked to leave."

During the talk, which was sponsored by the Political Economy Research Institute (PERI), the Departments of Sociology, Economics, Political Science, Social Thought and Political Economy Program (STPEC) and the labor center, Rathke mainly focused on his book's criticisms of how the government has attempted to bridge the gap between rich and poor. He argues instead that "wealth-building" is key to solving these problems, and that the government's attempts to do so, such as food stamps, unemployment insurance, and tax relief provide some temporary relief but ultimately make things worse by preventing individuals from building up the assets they need to provide themselves with a stable lifestyle.

Rathke fervently advocated minimum-wage increases as an effective way of coping with poverty. "[They've been small raises] like a dollar, a dollar and a quarter, a dollar fifty, but if you're in full-time work, if any of you are labor students, you know, full-time work is still 2080 hours a year, that's a $2000-plus raise if you're a full-time worker," he said.



After the talk, attendees leaving walked into several conservative protesters outside Gordon. The protest was organized by the Western Mass 912 Project, a local chapter of a national movement called the 912 Project, started by conservative radio and television host Glenn Beck.

"We're not affiliated with anybody but [Glenn Beck] was the encouragement to start it," said Bill Gunn, a Ware resident and one of the organizers of both the Springfield College event protest and the protest at UMass.

But the protest outside Gordon hall was significantly smaller than the one in Springfield the night before, drawing about eight people who gathered outside, brandishing signs as diverse as "Community Activism Leads to Corruption" to "Buy Locally Grown," also waving United Nations and American flags, shouting anti-ACORN slogans, and handing out flyers accusing ACORN of socialism, embezzlement, voter fraud and other criminal activities. All of the protesters refused to give comment.

"We agree with some of ACORN's causes," said Gunn, citing voter registration and the empowerment of poor people as some examples. "We disagree with the way they go about it. Those are great goals, we share those goals. But we actually mean it when we say it."

No way, no Ray: USPC rejects travel plan

Levasseur will not be able to travel to Massachusetts

officer murdered by a member of the Freedom Front protested Levasseur's invitation to UMass. Levasseur was never charged in connection with the shooting, but critics saw his invitation to speak as an endorsement of the UFF's violence against police officers.

From there, right-wing talk shows around the Northeast picked up the story and criticized the university for offering Levasseur the chance to speak.

Word eventually reached Governor Deval Patrick, who asked Chancellor Robert Holub to call off the event.

The event was initially cancelled last week, but harsh responses from around the academic community forced UMass to grudgingly allow the speech to proceed, citing academic freedom, despite what the University said were strong reservations on its behalf.

The event was renamed "The Great Western Massachusetts Sedition Trial: Twenty Years Later," and will still take place at 7:15 p.m. in the Isenberg School of Management's room 137, but without Levasseur himself on the bill.

The headlining speaker will now be Mr. Levasseur's ex-wife, Pat, who was also charged with sedition, members of the defense team who represented the Levasseurs in their sedition trial, and a juror from the case.

The Levasseurs and co-defendant Richard Williams stood trial in Springfield in 1989 for sedition, the act of attempting to overthrow the government or civic order. After a 10-month trial which became the costliest in Massachusetts history, all three were acquitted.

While Levasseur, as it turns out, will not speak Thursday, officials were not pleased that he would have spoke had the Parole Commission not allowed him to travel.

UMass system president Jack Wilson said in a statement Tuesday that "Chancellor Holub and I have instructed that no state funds be used to support this activity."

Rumors circulated Tuesday that the Massachusetts chapter of the American Civil Liberties Union, which had spoken out against the cancellation, was either sponsoring or funding the event. Christopher Ott, communications director for the Massachusetts ACLU, said Tuesday that it was "not true."

He did say, however, that the event has their support.

"We applaud the efforts of students and faculty leaders that have been working to see that the scheduling of the talk is forwarded despite the calls for censorship," he said.

It remains unclear how the event is being funded.

Levasseur was sent to prison in 1986 for bombing buildings across the East Coast, including eight bombings in the Boston area along with a string of bank robberies. The stated intent of the United Freedom Front was to protest the supposed U.S. backing of the South African apartheid government and Central American death squads.

Members of the United Freedom Front were convicted of the murder of New Jersey State Police officer Phil Lamonaco and the attempted murder of two Massachusetts State Police officers. Levasseur, however, was never charged with these crimes, nor was he at the scene of either incident.

The event will be sponsored by the departments of communication, economics, history, languages, literature, and culture and sociology, as well as the social thought and political economy and women, gender and sexuality programs, the Sociology Graduate Student Association and executive members of the Student Government Association.

Co-sponsoring the event are several non-profit community groups, foundations, and businesses including the Rosenberg Fund for Children, Food for Thought Books, Vermont Action for Political Prisoners and the Massachusetts Foundation for the Humanities.

Conference cleans up

Bank is pushing for more electronic transactions and will be holding paper-shredding events to safely destroy financial information while recycling.

Keeping up with the theme of energy efficiency and sustainability, a free rideshare service called Ridebuzz.org was available to conference attendees. Those looking for a ride to and from the event were able to look up names in a directory of car-owners in order to share the cost of parking and gas and the automative burden on the environment.

There were about 400 registered attendees who were able to sit in on lectures as well as several hundred others visiting the opportunity fair. Among the hundreds who showed up to support Clean Energy Connections were students from UMass and other colleges in the Pioneer Valley and the Springfield area.

One student, Seth Binstol, said that he attended the conference because the green movement will soon be impacting his future career in carpentry.

"When wind towers and solar panels get big that could be something that contractors could be getting into," he said.

Sam King, a student at Greenfield Community College said that he is very interested in getting into the engineering or social marketing of wind turbines.

"I think turbines are important because they offer such a large amount of energy and wind is completely sustainable," he said. "They have a low maintenance cost and there is already a lot of money and innovation going into them," he continued.

Another student from GCC, Molly Steinmark, said that she doesn't necessarily want a career directly related to clean energy but feels strongly about what the conference had to offer.

"I just want to learn as much as I can so I can help educate others," she said. "I didn't come here to discover a career, I'm just passionate about saving the environment."

Visitors to the Clean Energy Connections conference, sponsored by UMass and held Tuesday at Springfield's Mass Mutual Center, were able to network with representatives from across the green energy industry.

Iron Curtain hurtin', UMass marks 20 years since fall of wall

one of 30 colleges and universities holding Freedom Without Walls events.

Replica Berlin Walls were erected in the second floor annex of Herter Hall. Buckets of markers sat beside the walls, inviting passersby to apply graffiti. The walls will remain in the Herter Annex for an unspecified amount of time.

The coordinating staff said they endeavored to capture the ground-level citizen's perspective in the civil rights movements and political climate of East Germany in the late 1980s.

Text and image displays about the history of the Berlin War, from its political beginnings to its cultural influences, were fixed temporarily to the annex's bulletin board. A display titled, "We Remember 89-09" featured written testimonies from a number of figures, involved in fields from filmmaking to academia, about memories associated with the Berlin Wall. These testimonies ranged from personal recollections of places and people, to retrospective analyses of the many changes caused by the Wall's destruction, covering in depth a range of perspectives.

"Leipzig in the Fall" is a documentary directed by German filmmakers Gerd Kroske and Andreas Voigt documenting the robust civilian protests in Leipzig. The film documents the demonstrations and political climate in East Germany in the words and experiences of the people involved.

Protestors in Leipzig met in public squares on Mondays, beginning in the fall of 1989, to demand rights from the stifling control of the Soviet run government. Citizens across East Germany adopted Leipzig's model, holding large demonstrations on Mondays. The mass unification of the largely peaceful Monday demonstrations played a vital role in the opening of Berlin Wall.

Skyler Arndt-Briggs, adjunct professor in German and Scandinavian studies, and Associate Director of the DEFA Film Library, an extensive collection of East German films, said she felt mainstream historical discourse on the fall of the Berlin Wall tends to underemphasize the importance of the East German citizens' political activism and focus on state and political actors.

"The fall of the Berlin Wall is often attributed to Reagan's speech, or Gorbachev's speech, or that capitalism simply won, but the fact is, without these protests, without the voice of the people, it never would have happened," said Arndt-Briggs.

Barton Byg, a central coordinator of the event responsible for facilitating, said that the unified Germany is emerging a leader in a more interconnected Europe.

"Right now, Germany is in the center of what may come to be the United States of Europe, and I think the most important reason for promoting these events is to show they are committed to a peaceful united Europe, without the kind of conflict and division we saw during the Cold War," said Byg. "The opening of the Berlin Wall, and in effect, the end of the Cold War, is a legacy of bloodless revolution that Germany can be proud of," he added.

Schanioth said in an interview conducted November 9, the day of the anniversary, "The fall of the wall has shown that freedom ultimately prevails. For the system of liberal democracy and the rule of law can best meet the needs of the people. That gives us reason to be optimistic also about the future. Things can always turn out well. And if we work hard together, there is a good chance that they will."

Friday, Nov. 6

Shashank Chandra of 124 Laurie Ave. West Roxbury, Mass., was arrested near the intersection of Commonwealth Ave. and Massachusetts Ave. as a result of failure to stop at the traffic light at 2:46 a.m. The arresting officer detected the smell of alcohol and saw the driver's bloodshot eyes. The officer ordered Chandra to perform field sobriety tests, all of which were failed.

Michael Pracella of 63 Shandel Dr. Tewksbury, Mass., was arrested on Route 9 near Chili's as a result of a traffic stop at 1:39 p.m. Pracella was charged with possession of liquor while under the age of 21.

Alexander R. Mullins of 51 Burget Ave. Medford, Mass., and Patrick R. Bonner of 20 Hastings Ln. Medford, Mass., were arrested at 6:12 p.m. due to reportedly suspicious activity. Mullins was charged with possession of liquor while under the age of 21, and Bonner was charged with intent to sell/ deliver liquor to a person under the age of 21.

David Connelly of 28 Franklin Rodgers Rd. Hingham, Mass., and Jason Cerilli of 52A Canterbury St. Hingham, Mass., were arrested in Lot 33 West of University Dr. at 7:12 p.m. Both were charged with possession of liquor while under the age of 21.

Saturday, Nov. 7

Katelyn Mary Gralinski of 57 Mount Warner Rd. Hadley, Mass., was arrested as a result of a traffic stop on North Pleasant St. at 1:11 a.m. She was charged with speeding, operating a motor vehicle without insurance, and operating with suspended registration.

Samuel A. Smith of 15 Heroult Rd. Worcester, Mass., was arrested in John Quincy Adams Hall at 2:18 a.m. While inside the hall, a student security guard recognized Smith as having a restraining order that prevented him from being inside the building. The guard called the UMPD, who arrested Smith. He was charged with disturbing the peace, disorderly conduct, and violating his restraining order.

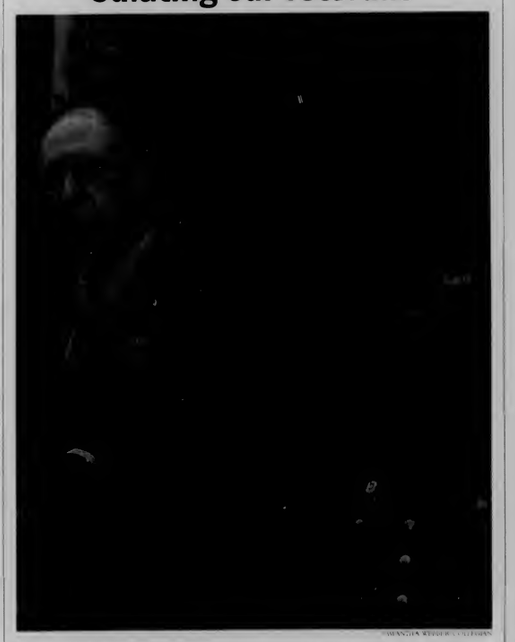
Colton James Buckley of 379 Lowell St. Peabody, Mass., was arrested as a result of a traffic stop on Infirmary Way at 8:49 p.m. Buckley was charged with possession of liquor while under the age of 21 and possession of an open container of alcohol in a motor vehicle.

Boone Jeremy Gibson of 1196 Highland St. Holliston, Mass., was arrested as a result of liquor law violations in Lot 33 West of University Dr. at 9:45 p.m. Gibson was charged with possession of liquor while under the age of 21.

John Joseph Paterwic of 46 Hemlock Hill Rd. West Springfield, Mass., was arrested on Lincoln Ave at 11:32. He was charged with disorderly conduct.

Sunday, Nov. 8

Anthony Robinson of 280 North Warren Ave. Brockton, Mass., was arrested for suspicious activity in John Quincy Adams Hall at 12:45 a.m. A resident assistant on the 4th floor of the building approached the cadet on duty and reported Robinson refusing to leave. Robinson fled the building, attempting to evade arrest. He was arrested outside of John Quincy Adams and charged with trespassing.



Rebecca L. Tobey of 318 Harkness Rd. Amherst, Mass., was arrested as a result of a traffic stop on Thatcher Rd. at 2:45 a.m. The arresting officer saw Tobey speeding and followed her. The officer observed her cross both the solid white and yellow lines on Thatcher Rd and ordered her to pull the car over. After performing a sobriety test, Tobey was found to have a blood alcohol level of .19 and was charged with speeding, violating marked lanes, and OUI.

Malcolm C. Lahage of 474 Spring St. Marshfield, Mass., was arrested for reportedly suspicious person or activity in Brett Hall at 8:47 p.m. Lahage was arrested for trespassing.

Poverty in Argentina

Michael Fox

Tucked under a highway in the lower to middle class Buenos Aires neighborhood of Barracas is a library and children's center that was a vacant lot about two months ago. During weekday afternoons, you can find groups of children playing there and doing their homework and adults taking free English classes.

Two programs for the children are run there. One is funded by the government and aimed at children from the local neighborhood. Paid Argentine staff members have access to a wide variety of equipment and a set of classrooms. The other group is aimed at children from the nearby neighborhood of La Boca.

La Boca is most famous for its street El Caminito. El Caminito is a pedestrian walkway lined with whimsically painted houses, street performers dancing the tango and lines of amateur painters. An idyllic slice of antiquated Argentina, it is one of the most recognizable city blocks in South America.

However, it's just a city block.

A block over from El Caminito, La Boca goes from Disney World Buenos Aires to one of the worse slums in South America. Towards the end of the tourist area, the desperate conditions that people are kept blind from start to seep in by the growing desperation of people pawning souvenirs or overpriced lunches.

At a certain point, locals just flat out tell tourists not to walk further. At this point, there are only vacant houses, cheap hotels and a shanty town house, and the occasional group of children walking across two neighborhoods to participate in activities at the library.

The non-government funded group is called Club Union de los Pibes. It was formally associated with ACORN (yeah, that ACORN), and founded as a group to help bring structure and a sense of community to La Boca. Since cutting ties with ACORN, the group had to move its location from where the children live to its new place, and has seen its funding bottom out; the coordinator has no definite salary.

The children, well, they're a lot different than the ones I had volunteered with the previous week in the campos. The children of the campos were shy but quick to warm up to us. The children of La Boca were boisterous and willing to shout off many Spanish swears, and slow to give out their trust. The older boys of the campos wrote love letters to the girls I came with. The older boys of La Boca, they broke up any conversation that I started with a female volunteer, insisting that the girl was "theirs."

The program for the children of La Boca has no set structure. There wouldn't be any point. Soccer games can start and end in an instant. The only thing that is attempted is to cater to the kids. To do what they want to do so they stay at the library. There's no structure, but there are limits, and even that is a new concept to some of these kids.

We switch off using the facility's park with the government run program, but we're never allowed to mix. They're groups of kids from different levels of life, different privileges and different levels of need. Ironically, it's the ones most in need that have less access.

The program also offers English lessons to the older kids along with adults from the neighborhood. About three people show up every week with their books in tow, willing to learn and struggle through English, taught by amateur instructors such as myself.

My Argentine friends are shocked that I travel down to this neighborhood.

They insist that I take a cab directly there even though I tell them that a bus drops me directly there and picks me up from there. At first I thought they insisted on the dangers of the area because I was a foreigner, someone who simply didn't know any better. However, I've realized that their warnings pour out from genuine concern.

From all my talk, it must seem at times that Argentina is some kind of third world war zone.

Well, it isn't. It's simply a place where the just isn't always handled correctly by the government, leading many into want. A situation, at times created by outside powers, of economic necessity gets driven down even further by government greed and a habit of taking advantage of individuals. Thus, regions of disparity are clearly evident and recognizable.

However, in a little corner of Buenos Aires, a group of Argentines and foreigners, many blessed to be born more comfortable than those of the area, sacrifice some time to correct this disturbed equilibrium of society.

Levasseur should speak

This week's back and forth over the scheduling of a lecture by Raymond Luc Levasseur, former leader of the United Freedom Front (UFF) and convicted bomber, sets a troubling precedent for the University of Massachusetts and how it handles outside pressure to suppress speech.

Levasseur is known as a domestic terrorist to his critics and a martyr to his supporters, but he's also a living artifact, a defendant in what was, in 1989, the longest and most expensive trial in Massachusetts history. He and his co-defendents Patricia Gros Levasseur and Richard C. Williams, were acquitted on charges of seditious conspiracy to overthrow the U.S. government.

His original lecture was to be held at the W.E.B. Du Bois Library as part of its fifth annual Colloquium on Social Change.

However, under pressure from fraternal-police organizations, as well as the family of victims of violent acts committed by the UFF, Gov. Patrick pressured UMass officials to rescind Levasseur's invitation. They did.

Days later, University professors invited Levasseur back to campus at a different venue with different sponsors. Following news of Levasseur's re-invitation, the University issued a statement, condemning it as "repugnant." The statement, unsigned and issued by spokesman Patrick Callahan, essentially throws its own faculty under the bus while trying to distance the administration from the decision.

Event organizers released a statement late yesterday afternoon saying that Levasseur had been denied permission to travel out of state by the U.S. Parole Board.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian outright condemns the bombings committed by Levasseur and the UFF. This should go without saying. However, critics of Levasseur's invitation to campus have tried to caricature it as an endorsement of terrorist activity, as if Levasseur was invited not to provide rare insight into a significant moment in this state's history, but to recruit for his next plot.

This whole episode reveals some unsettling things about the University leadership and the state government. When controversy over Levasseur's invitation first arose last week, UMass spokesman Ed Blaguszewski told The Republican that while UMass condemns Levasseur's actions, "understanding how and why people take different paths to seek social change are important."

That sounds like a University that knows the difference between engaging with those who have unpopular views and endorsing them. However, under pressure from Gov. Patrick and UMass system President Jack Wilson, the administration did an about-face, stating in the above unsigned statement that, "The university administration did not invite this speaker and would not invite him. A group of faculty members has decided to invite him. Although the university administration questions the wisdom and common sense of this judgment, the institution must respect academic freedom."

Now the University has lucked out. Rather than having to make a difficult decision themselves – to risk association with a violent man for giving him a forum to discuss his crimes or to kowtow to those who have reasons, be they personal or political, to silence him – the parole board made it for them.

From materials released before the original event, it seemed like the purpose of inviting Levasseur was to find out what drives someone to commit the atrocities like the UFF bombings.

In the age of the War on Terror, that sounds like a conversation worth having. While The Collegian thinks that people like Levasseur should not be treated as heroes, writing them off as unworthy of being heard only serves to perpetuate the disenfranchisement that can lead to these acts of violence.

Our nation has the highest incarceration rate in the world; perhaps listening to criminals, suspending judgment until after they've spoken, might contribute to its decline.

In need of Afghan policy

Nick Milano

This is what General McChrystal is facing. He needs to implement a counterinsurgency strategy that can succeed in winning over the population.

Throughout the presidential election, there were several points that one could expect to hear at an Obama rally. Health care needed to be reformed, policies should help those on Main Street, not just those on Wall Street, and that the Iraq war should be brought to an end with a renewed focus on the "right war" in Afghanistan. On two of these issues, there has been undeniable action, though the efficacy of the measures should be questioned. On Afghanistan, however, President Obama has been a failure to his voters, to those under his command and to America.

There is never going to be a way to definitively know what kind of strategy will produce results in Afghanistan. It is important to understand what our goal is in this country, half a world away from Afghanistan. To my understanding, at first it was to find and kill Osama Bin Laden, but since then (now almost eight years into the conflict) there has been undeniable mission creep. The US military and its NATO allies have kicked out the Taliban only to see them come back. Al Qaeda has apparently relocated to Pakistan and Bin Laden has not been found or killed. The recent elections were marred by fraud and President Karzai's run-off opponent dropped out. News coming home from Afghanistan is beginning to sound similar to the news coming from Iraq at its worst with 14 Americans dying on a single day about two weeks ago.

Through it all, President Obama has appallingly failed to make a decision on his strategy in Afghanistan for the next several years. While it is necessary to take a step back and consider options when attacked by former Vice President Dick Cheney for failing to make a decision quickly, enough is enough. The war in Afghanistan was President Obama's number one foreign policy issue when he was campaigning. He should have known all sides of the issue.

Instead, it seems to have been a surprise that General Stanley McChrystal's report on Afghanistan requested many more soldiers. The general in charge of the Afghan theater requested at least 40,000 more soldiers to fully implement the counterinsurgency strategy initially endorsed by Obama. The basic tenets of counterinsurgency sound relatively simple: protect the population. This was the strategy that General Petraeus implemented to such great tactical success in Iraq when he oversaw the surge of military forces into that country. Now, McChrystal is attempting to replicate Petraeus' success.

To make counterinsurgency effective in Iraq, General Petraeus required a huge infusion of soldiers so he could begin moving them off huge forward operating bases and into villages. Their old mission involved driving routine patrols in convoys of armored humvees and tanks. Their new mission was to live among the population and to conduct patrols on foot, to take their sunglasses off and show Iraqis that American soldiers were not some monolithic foreign enemy.

Thomas Ricks' history of the Iraq War highlights General Petraeus and the tactical success he squeezed out of Iraq. Unfortunately, the political breakthroughs necessary to make the surge a total success have not yet happened years later. This is what General McChrystal is facing. He needs to implement a counterinsurgency strategy that can succeed in winning over the population. He needs the additional soldiers to protect common Afghanis who are just trying to live their lives. Based on the tactical success that emerged in Iraq after this new strategy was put into place, there is hope that the same will happen in Afghanistan. But General McChrystal, the soldiers on the ground, the people of Afghanistan and President Obama all desperately need political breakthroughs, as well.

I am a lowly college senior, basing what I write on foreign policy blogs, news articles and books about the region. I do not know if this new strategy will work out in the end. I do not know if an alternative strategy, such as reducing the number of American soldiers and focusing only on small special operations forces to contain Al Qaeda, is a better option. But, I do know this: lives depend on the decision. President Obama's presidency has been marked by taking the middle ground on the stimulus, on health care and on Wall Street reform. President Obama knew coming into office that all eyes were going to be on Afghanistan. He should have been prepared for all possible outcomes. Mr. President, the American people, the men and women putting their lives on the line and the Afghan people just fighting to live a normal life, need your decision.

Dear Editor,

With his column, "One last moment of triumph," Mr. Perry has once again caused the Founding Fathers to roll in their graves, bemoaning their decision to so highly stress the importance of free speech. I suppose Al Gore, the inventor of the Internet, is also to blame because he allowed Mr. Perry such easy access to a wealth of misinformation. Perhaps Mr. Perry accidentally changed the filter in StumbleUpon to "right winged nut job" and since then hasn't been able to find any other sites.

As far as I can tell, one of Mr. Perry's biggest concerns is that "Obamacare" will be so popular that it would be political suicide for anyone to oppose it in the future. "If a candidate is telling 30 million people he is taking their health care coverage away, those 30 million people are highly unlikely to vote for that candidate." I have to ask, if 30 million people are that happy with the plan, then why would politicians be trying to get rid of it? Mr. Perry goes on to say, "Democrats needed to seize the opportunity to push this bill through while they still held the political power to do so and they did it." Although this is a rarely accurate statement for him to make, it sheds no light on the situation. Why wouldn't the Democrats take advantage of an opportunity to pass a bill that has been a core of their platform for the past half century?

Costs seem to be a huge focus of his article. "In the next 10 years we can all look forward to health care costs skyrocketing, probably doubling and tripling before the costs become too high for anyone to afford." This statement confused me because these are very similar to the projected costs of healthcare if no legislation is implemented. This brings us to the real point of the column: Mr. Obama and the rest of the liberals have an elaborate plan to destroy our current healthcare system and replace it with government run health care.

In 2008, health care insurance was the 28th most profitable industry in the US, according to the Fortune 500. UnitedHealth Group, was the 25th most profitable company, beating companies such as Microsoft and Johnson & Johnson. So, is Obama trying to completely reconstruct the health care system? Maybe. Hopefully. Perhaps if Mr. Perry spent less time worrying about what hurt America and spent more time worrying what hurt the American people, he would worry less about how much money the insurance companies would lose, how much the government will spend and more about how many people it will help.

I would like to conclude with my favorite quote from Mr. Perry's article, "The bill was recently labeled 'the worst bill ever' by a Wall Street Journal editorial." Even after his criticism in his piece on global warming, where he quoted an economist and tried to pass him off as a climatologist, Mr. Perry still hasn't learned that saying something doesn't necessarily make it true. Thankfully, this is the case; otherwise, Mr. Ahmadinejad's comments on the Holocaust would have forced every publisher on the planet to rewrite their textbooks.

So much for the good week, indeed.

Thanks, Mr. Perry.

AN INVITATION OF SHAME

Dear Editor, Chancellor Holub and the University of Massachusetts general population,

I am a recent graduate from UMass Amherst (class of 2007). Many of my family members have gone to UMass. My father went to UMass, my uncle went to UMass, my sister went to UMass, my fiancé went to UMass and I went to UMass. I was an RA at UMass for three years. Until recently, I have been a proud member of UMass Alumni. Then, even though your administration and campus speak out against it, you are still letting a terrorist speak at UMass.

You are letting someone who plotted and acted to destroy lives, ruin families, attempt to destroy this great nation, harm innocent people and steal away society's peace of mind speak at UMass. You are using some sniveling story of "freedom of speech" to hide behind the atrocities you are too ashamed or too cowardly to stand up against. I used to champion the UMass campus, the good times I had, the great teachers, the events, the sports, the people, even sometimes the too liberal town. Not anymore. That feeling of community has been stripped from me because of your actions. Never have I been so ashamed to have been apart of something that was once so great.

Today is the sad day I take down my UMass pendants, scrape the UMass stickers off my cars, cancel all donations to UMass; the good word I spoke of UMass when telling friends and families about the good times, the great campus is all gone. All gone and replaced by a sense of shame, shame that I have supported UMass, shame that I went to UMass and shame that I recommended this University of Embarrassment to friends and family members.

There are still a few groups at UMass of which I am not ashamed. I would like to congratulate the UMass police for putting their foot down on the issue by organizing and attending a protest against this terrorist speaking. Well done, police, for standing up against this drivel of nonsense spewing from the professors at this once great campus. Also, President Jack Wilson must be commended for speaking out against such a deplorable human being speaking at a once great campus. Even he must remember though – actions speak louder than words.

The administration at UMass claims that it is letting this occur because of free speech. I support free speech. There is a fine line between supporting free speech and allowing hate to be echoed through the classrooms where many people have learned, taught and honored. You are giving a terrorist a forum to spout off his hatred. You are shaming the University by letting this atrocity occur on a campus without listening to the voice of the people who go there and who work there. You are bowing to the ACLU which is an extremist left wing propaganda factory.

I am sure you will lose many donations to the University over this issue, as you have already lost mine and I am sure many others as well. Perhaps if the losses get substantial enough you will finally think with a clearer head on matters such as this next time they arise, and with all the lunacy in the world today, I'm sure similar issues will occur in the future.

Remember, all that is needed for evil to succeed is for good men to do nothing.

DIY: Homemade Dry Skin Remedy

By Ellie Rufon-Miller
Collegian Staff

As you may already have noticed on your face, hands and legs, dry skin season (formerly known as "winter") is upon us. Its arrival is feared by many – people who may not have the cash flow for a decent moisturizer to help their now scaly, flaky skin recover from the damage of cold winter days. My family gets it bad every year, particularly my younger brother, who used to wake up in the morning with his knuckles chapped and bleeding. This, of course, was before he found a moisturizer that worked for him.

Like a lot of girls, I have standards when it comes to the products I use, but especially during the colder months. My entire exterior suffers from dryness, from my hair to my legs. While I don't bleed from my dry skin like my brother did, it still causes an inordinate amount of pain.

Last winter, I invested in a small tube of my favorite moisturizer: Clinique Dramatically Different Moisturizing Lotion. It's the only lotion I have used on my face that actually works. However, it cost $12.50 for a little bitty tube of it, and so, I am discouraged. As a college student, I can't afford to be spending that much money on such a small amount of product.

I decided to try my hand at homemade moisturizer. I scoured all of my usual DIY sources in books and on the Internet for the simplest, cheapest recipe. I wanted to be able to spend less than $15 on enough supplies to make an amount of lotion that would last me through the winter.

What you may not know about dry skin is, if you have it, you are more susceptible to infection and illness. Crackly skin opens up a million doors on your body that let in bacteria and can get you sick. It also, being flu season, is especially important, not only to wash your hands and maintain hygiene, but also to moisturize daily, surprisingly enough, your skin gets dehydrated when you shower and wash your hands.

After researching for a couple of hours online and finding nothing that I could do without having to order a type of wax of which I had never heard, I started looking in a book that one of my best friends gave me as a birthday gift last year: Mark Montano's "Big Ass Book of Crafts." It was there that I found a simple, two-ingredient recipe for DIY moisturizer which, after several days of testing, I can completely vouch for.

You will need to buy a plain, unscented body lotion (available at any craft store); virgin or extra virgin olive oil (at the grocery store), a small vial of whatever scented drops you want (also at any craft store) and, if you don't already have it, a container to put your finished lotion in.

Making this product took about five minutes. All you have to do is mix one cup of unscented body lotion with a quarter cup of olive oil and add between 10 and 15 drops of your scent. The olive oil is what does the moisturizing. According to Web MD, healthy skin has a certain amount of lipids, which decreases when your skin is dry. The olive oil, which contains fat, replaces the lost lipids and helps to lock in moisture.

While this moisturizer works fantastically on arms and legs, I do not suggest that you use a lot of it on your face simply because it contains oil, which is not your face's friend when poured on in large amounts. Don't worry about it too much, though; olive oil has been commonly used as a moisturizer in some cultures ever since its inception, and a lot of people swear by it as their sole moisturizing product.

If you don't intend to spend massive amounts of money on small amounts of moisturizing products this winter, try this recipe or search for another online. There are also a lot of recipes for DIY shampoos and conditioners made of common pantry items for those who prefer all natural products. Good luck and godspeed to you and your skin this winter.

Mike Doughty stops in NoHo for 'The Question Jar Show'

By Rachel Dougherty
Collegian Staff

Mike Doughty will will perform tonight with Andrew "Scrap" Livingston in Northampton. Doughty's former band, Soul Coughing split in 2000 after which he began his solo career.

Mike Doughty, former frontman of the New York based alternative rock group Soul Coughing and currently an independent artist, will play at Northampton's Iron Horse this Thursday as a part of his 2009 tour, The Question Jar Show.

Doughty's work is a mix of wordplay and weird experimental music ranging from jazz and alternative to funk-electro. Songs from his album "Haughty Melodic," "Golden Delicious," and "Sad Man Happy Man," have garnered critical approval and produced a massive cult following. Songs such as "Looking at the World from the Bottom of a Well" and "I Hear the Bells" have been featured on television shows such as Grey's Anatomy, Veronica Mars and Bones.

One of the major draws to Doughty's work is his stream-of-consciousness poetry. Doughty's lyrics, while sometimes nonsensical, are unparalleled in verbal wit and wordplay. His husky voice conveys the humor and the profundity of his music, making it as accessible as it is intellectual.

Doughty studied poetry at New York's "New School University," where he took classes and performed with a young Ani DiFranco, now a Grammy Award-winning singer-songwriter. While at New School, Doughty studied under Sekou Sundiata, a Grammy-nominated performer and playwright.

Doughty worked as a doorman in the early nineties at the Knitting Factory in Manhattan, a music club and concert hall specializing in jazz and experimental music. It was at the Knitting Factory that he met sampler player Merk De Gli Antoni, upright bass player Sebastian Steinberg, and drummer Yuval Gabay, with whom he would go on to form Soul Coughing in 1992. Soul Coughing released three albums, "Ruby Vroom" (1994), "Irresistible Bliss" (1996), and "El Oso" (1996), which mixed Doughty's stream-of-consciousness poetry with improvisational jazz, hip-hop, electronics and noisy experimental, described by Doughty as "deep slacker jazz."

He went on to work as a solo artist after Soul Coughing dissolved in 2000. He has released three official solo albums and the acoustic album Skittish, which he began in 1996. His first official solo album, "Haughty Melodic," was released under the Dave Matthews label ATO Records in 2005. "Haughty Melodic," an anagram for Michael Doughty, was Doughty's first collaboration with other musicians since Soul Coughing. The album features Dan Chen on keyboard and synthesizer, Pete McNeal on drums and Andrew "Scrap" Livingston on upright bass, with whom Doughty toured extensively in 2005.

"Haughty Melodic" is both humorous and haunting, as Doughty weaves between the pop-culture references of "Busting Up A Starbucks" to the revelation of Doughty's own addiction and recovery from heroin on "Looking at the World from the Bottom of a Well."

His later albums include "Golden Delicious," a more main-stream track released in 2008 that features simpler choruses and heavier instrumentation. Standouts from that album include "27 Jennifers" and "Fort Hood." His most recent album, "Sad Man Happy Man," released on October 6 of this year, represents a return to the acoustic sounds of Soul Coughing and those show cased on "Haughty Melodic."

The Question Jar Show, a duo performance by Mike Doughty and Andrew "Scrap" Livingston will play at the Iron Horse at 7pm and 10pm on Saturday night in Northampton. Tickets are $20 in advance and $23 at the door.

Rob Thomas plays 'smooth' Wang show

By Kate MacDonald
Collegian Staff

If anyone ever tries to claim that Carolina Liar, One Republic and Rob Thomas aren't among the best rock performers out there or that any one of them couldn't carry a show by themselves, they'd be sorely mistaken. Carolina Liar and One Republic opened up for Thomas Monday night at the Citi Performing Arts Center (aka The Wang Theater) in Boston and were equally as entertaining as Thomas. It cannot be stressed enough how underappreciated these three acts are.

The show was, in part, a product of its environment. The Wang Theatre is probably the most gorgeous venue in the city, with its high ceilings, pillared doorways and Rococo style decoration. It looks as if you've left the U.S. and are standing instead in the gilded halls of the Paris Opera House. The architecture did not go unnoticed by the performers. Ryan Tedder of One Republic called attention to the Wang's beauty (while Rob Thomas made fun of its name).

The audience was filled with mostly women in one of two age brackets, teenage or middle aged. Prior to the show, the place was buzzing, strangers talked to strangers about their experiences, which ranged from having followed Carolina Liar around to one woman who was seeing Rob Thomas for the fifth time.

The lights went down and L.A.-based band Carolina Liar took the stage, fronted by the energetic Chad Wolf. His enthusiasm and interaction really pumped up the crowd. The acoustics of the venue only added to their success; everyone's chests were literally vibrating to the beats of the bass and drums. With vocal stylings ranging from rasps to falsetto, Carolina Liar performed summer hits "I'm Not Over" and "Show Me What I'm Looking For" as well as others from their debut "Coming To Terms." They came off as genuinely nice guys, which was confirmed by many when they stood in the lobby meeting and hugging fans after the show.

Their set was nothing short of amazing. As concert-goer Irish Christiani said, "It was worth it just to see them, never mind actually staying for Rob [Thomas]!"

One Republic kept the energy high with their upbeat performance. Their only downfall was that many of the powerful guitar and bass lines actually overshadowed lead Tedder's voice, making him almost inaudible at times. This was surprising, as he let out almost Adam Lambert-like screeches from time to time. When he was easily understood, it must be noted that he had the voice of the next Justin Timberlake. The band performed an emotional version of "Stop and Stare," the Beck-esque head bobber "Everybody Loves Me," and their new single "Secrets." Over the course of their eight song set, each band member (except the drummer) switched instruments at least once, proving their musical prowess.

Keeping with Carolina Liar's way of communicating with the audience, Ryan Tedder shouted before a song, "Don't keep up with the Joneses, it ain't worth it." Neither opener did.

It took one man to bring everyone in the audience to their feet. When Rob Thomas took the stage to perform "Fire On the Mountain," not one person was left sitting. This pattern continued for almost the whole two hour performance. He crooned, danced and hammed it up in front of a three-paneled back screen which changed pictures and patterns depending on the mood of the song.

"Man, I don't know about you guys, but I'm ready to make some music tonight," were the first spoken words out of Thomas's mouth after a non-stop string of three semi-unknown songs. Thomas would go on performing tangents, sometimes going for five or six songs without taking even a moment for a drink, which was much needed, seeing as how he sweated completely through his shirt within the first half-hour.

During more songs than not, even unreleased tunes, the audience was singing along loudly. This was seen during his most upbeat song, "Lonely No More." Everyone bobbed up and down to the beat, and even one of the burly security guards was swaying to the beat. During the next song, "Mockingbird," another guard kept turning around, seemingly mesmerized by Thomas's performance.

If the audience's response wasn't testament enough to the electric atmosphere, even the guitarists and background singers were dancing, laughing, clapping and having a great time. Music was the most important element of the evening; Thomas stopped an ethereal "Natural" mid-song to hand the only other person on stage a different guitar because it didn't sound right.

Thomas called members of Carolina Liar and One Republic on stage to play instruments and sing many times. They covered a few country hits and even attempted a soft-rock version of Springsteen's "Dancing In The Dark." It was amazing to see older folks and younger teens dancing to a great version of The Boss's hit.

Rob Thomas successfully kept the audience's attention through the massive set, avoiding the lull that hits even the greatest performers, both before and after the audience-prompted encore. He swayed seductively across the stage and jumped around with the energy of a little kid. Some other well-received songs included "Cradlesong," an acoustic version of "Smooth" and "Her Diamonds." It would be surprising if even one person did not sing to "Her Diamonds;" the audience's volume even overtook Thomas's at points. This reaction seemed to be the norm.

"We're here just for the music to celebrate the time he have," shouted Carolina Liar's Chad Wolf early in their portion. Celebrate they did, in their show-stealing set.

Thomas echoed their sentiments in saying, "We wanna be the house band for your good time tonight!" Thomas really made his concert about the pleasure of the audience. No matter the price of the tickets, the experience was absolutely priceless for everyone in the crowd.

Junior Candynce Boney looks to serve in a match earlier this season. Boney will look to be the leader of the Minutewomen this season, after competing in the Big Green Invitational this weekend.

UMass goes against BU, SJU and Big Green in Invitational

By Chris Shores
Collegian Staff

At the Big Green Invitational tournament in Hanover, N.H. this past weekend, the Massachusetts tennis team got the chance to face three future opponents in an exhibition setting. While they did not fare well – suffering three losses – the tournament allowed the team and coach Judy Dixon one more chance to get more match experience, and see what they can improve upon before the winter season begins.

"The morale of the team is good," Dixon said. "Everyone got a chance to play."

Individuals that have not typically gotten significant playing time this fall, such as Gabriella Jannotta, got a chance to get some game-time experience this past weekend.

Freshman Chantal Swiszcz, who has been injured for most of the fall, played for most of the weekend, which was a positive sign for the coach.

"We need to get Chantal healthy," Dixon said. "It is one of the keys to making this team fly."

Dixon also pointed to a struggling Candynee Boney as being a key component in the team's success. She wants Boney to make some improvements and fine-tune her game during this offseason.

The tournament featured UMass, Boston University, St. John's and Dartmouth, with each team getting an opportunity to face the other three teams, one on each day of the tournament. While the matchups do not count for team standings, performances by the players have an impact on their individual rankings.

Dixon said the tournament allowed her and assistant coach Juancarlos Nunez to scout opponents. This will help determine practice strategy and lineup decisions when it comes time to play these teams again later on in the season.

Overall, Dixon was pleased with the fall performance of her squad. She says that they are looking forward to the rest, but will be ready to go at the start of their indoor season next February.

In the match against the Terriers on the first day, UMass dropped the doubles point, a point they are usually able to secure without much difficulty.

Terriers Francine Whu and Monika Mical defeated Maude Lecluyse and Boney, 8-4.

In the No. 2 doubles match, Petra Santini and Jessi Linero beat Magdalena Ploch and Julia Comas, 8-4.

In the No. 1 singles match, Ploch continued her great season with a hard-fought victory against Stefanie Nunic. The BU star was injured during the third set of play, and was forced to retire from the match, handing Ploch the victory, 4-6, 7-6, 2-2 (ret.)

For the second time that day, Santini defeated Comas, this time in singles play, 4-6, 7-5, 6-2.

Boney defeated Linero in No. 3 singles play in a hard-fought three-set match, 7-6, 6-7, 6-2.

Already victorious in the No. 1 doubles match, Whu defeated Lecluyse again in the No. 4 singles match, 6-1, 6-4.

Mical beat Tanisha Hodgson in the No. 5 singles match, 6-3, 6-3, and giving UMass their third and final win of the day, Jocelyn Providence defeated Inayat Khosla, 8-3.

Four exhibition matchups were then played against Dartmouth. Jannotta saw her first official action of the year, losing to Carissa King in two straight sets, 6-1, 6-1.

In her second match of the day, Providence faced off against Dartmouth's Christina Danosi. Providence lost this match 8-2.

Dartmouth's doubles team of Carley Markovitz and Jeri Reichel edged out Hodgson and Swiszcz 9-8.

Shelley Carpeni and Donisi beat the UMass doubles team of Jannotta and Providence 8-6.

For the match against St. John's, Dixon was forced to go with an alternate lineup, as both Lecluyse and Kaitlyn Carpenter were sick with the flu and unavailable. Carpenter was out the entire tournament.

The usual No. 2 doubles team of Ploch and Comas was bumped up to the top doubles spot for the match. There, they handily defeated Ece Firat and Jenny Yonkus, 8-1.

Joanna Zwirbulis and Ksenia Mikhaylova beat Hodgson and Swiszcz, 8-3.

After losses, Minutewomen take two games from Lady Buffaloes

By Geena Lombardi
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's club hockey team redeemed its negative start to the season with two dominating wins over the University of Colorado this past weekend.

After two losses the previous weekend, the Minutewomen (3-4) did not waste any time taking control over the visiting Lady Buffaloes. Sophomore Caitlin Ellis was the first to strike for UMass, scoring the first goal just two minutes into the game. Captain Hayley Kuhn was credited with the assist for Ellis' first goal of the season.

At the 6:33 mark, the Lady Buffaloes (2-5) took advantage of a two minute power- play situation and evened the score out at 1-1 with a goal from Kathryn Brewer.

With one minute left to play in the first period, junior Caitlin Scannell took a pass from Angela Rufo and gave the Minutewomen the lead going into the second period.

With the first ten minutes of the second period remaining quiet, the Lady Buffaloes came to life and challenged UMass. Ashley Abrams evened out the score at the 12:07 mark, followed five minutes later with a Kiara Atkinson goal to give Colorado the 3-2 lead.

UMass answered with a game-tying goal from Scannell, her second of the game.

At the 11:06 mark of the third period, UMass regained its lead on the Buffaloes. This time it was the Minutewomen who capitalized on a power play with a goal from Samantha Mack, assisted by Kuhn. Sophomore Ashley White provided the final insurance goal two minutes later, giving UMass the 5-3 victory.

Freshman goaltender Kelsey Magrane saved 17 shots for the Minutewomen, compared to Colorado goalie Alexandra Bower, who faced 48 shots.

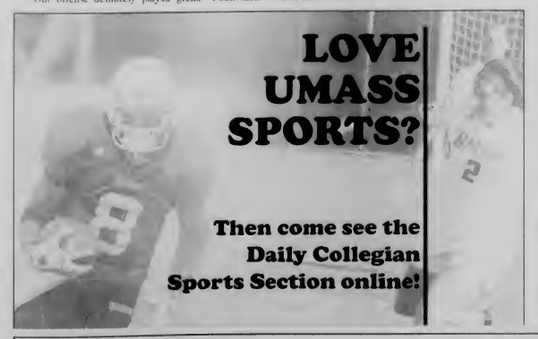
UMass coach Chris Cobb gave credit to his offense after making a few changes.

"Our offense definitely played great," Cobb said. "We made a couple changes and put one of our defenders, Angela Rufo, at center."

This change proved to be a positive one, with Rufo generating four assists for her teammates.

Building on momentum from Friday's game, UMass continued controlling the puck on Saturday.

Freshman Heather Paonessa scored the first goal for UMass at the 12:06 mark, when she took a pass from fellow freshman Stephanie Schlosky and slid the puck past the Buffaloes goalie. With three minutes remaining in the first period, Darah Thomas scored for the Minutewomen, giving them a 2-0 advantage.



Kuhn broke up the second period with a Rufo assisted goal in the 11th minute of play. The score would remain 3-0 until the third period, when the offensive line took off for UMass. Mack wasted no time on a power play to bring the Minutewomen total goals scored to four. Scannell was next to score two minutes later from a Catherine O'Brien pass. Thomas followed with a second goal in the final two minutes of play. Wrapping up the offensive attack was Stefani McGrath, scoring the final goal for Massachusetts in the last 10 seconds of play.

Freshman Katie Avery took charge of the net for UMass, where she recorded her first collegiate level win along with her first shutout. She saved 17 shots to give the Minutewomen the 7-0 victory.

"This was the best game of the year" Cobb said. "Everyone played good hockey. It started with the defense stepping up and breaking up the puck. Our offense generated a lot of goals."

UMass hopes to continue its winning streak this weekend while traveling to Burlington, Vt. to face Vermont (5-5). This will be the first time the Minutewomen will face the Catamounts, a fellow American Collegiate Hockey Association team. Unlike other ACHA teams, Vermont allows varsity level players to join the team, something that is sure to pose a new challenge for the Minutewomen.

Minutemen rebound

Goolsby, Arnao help UMass generate offense, team takes on Central Connecticut Friday

By Herb Scribner
Collegian Staff

After suffering its first loss to C.W. Post nearly two weeks ago, the Massachusetts men's club hockey team has found its winning ways once again with two straight victories, including one this past weekend.

The first came a day after the Minutemen's first loss of the season, when they hit the road to take on New York University. Similar to the games of UMass' past, the Minutemen (11-1-0) dominated, defeating the Violets 5-2.

Forward Reed Powers scored two goals and had one assist, as he sits right behind captain Alec Goolsby in goals scored this season. Powers has five goals on the season, while Goolsby is first in the Northeast Collegiate Hockey Association in points (12).

Forward Danny Arnao put in his fourth goal of the season and had an assist in the victory. Arnao, similar to Powers with goals, sits right behind Goolsby in assists on the team, but has seven assists in eight games played so far this season.

Goalie Joe Iadarola got the nod to start in goal, giving regular netminder Mark Leonard the night off. Iadarola stopped twenty shots in the match, but allowed two goals to the Violets (2-5-0).

After beating NYU, the Minutemen went back home to face Keene State, and pulled out a 5-4 victory despite highly contested play.

Goolsby continued his scoring ways by netting a goal and an assist.

Forward Julian Maleski, who is a native of Keene, N.H. and played for the Owls for one season (3-5-0) prior to playing for UMass, also scored a goal against his former team. Forwards Michael Bartlett, Justin Gauvin and Craig Cardone also scored in the win against the Owls.

Defensively, the Minutemen were on top as well, with Leonard stopping 32 shots during the entire game, allowing four goals. Leonard is tied for first in the NECHA with eight wins in 540 minutes on the ice so far in 2009.

The Minutemen will head to Keene on Feb. 5 to face off with the Owls again, the second to last game of UMass' season.

The Minutemen will return to the Mullins Center this Friday to take on Central Connecticut for the second time this season. UMass beat the Blue Devils, 8-6 back on Oct. 17. The match was a closely contested one, with the Minutemen maintaining enough control towards the end to gain a victory.

On Sunday, UMass will head down to Western Connecticut, where they will take on the Colonials (5-6-0).

The two teams met last season, with the Minutemen tripling Western Connecticut's score, winning 9-3. UMass and the Colonials met again a week later, where the Minutemen doubled the score, 8-4.

The Minutemen will face the Colonials again on Jan. 23, with this weekend marking the halfway point for the Minutemen this season. The rest of their schedule features some revisiting opponents as well as some new ones.

UMass is second in the NECHA America East standings with ten points, right behind Connecticut. The Minutemen have gotten consistent play out of forward Nick Crowley and defenders Matt Coughlin and Christian McCracken.

On Dec. 4, UMass will host its Military Appreciation Night when they take on United States Coastguard Academy. The team encourages all fans to come out to support the United States Military.

Another upcoming event for the Minutemen club hockey team is on Jan. 30 for Senior Night. UMass will honor seven players that night, three of whom are captains.

UM wants publicity
Battle over Jordan's footwear

"My legs are sore from walking through Southwest," Kellogg said. "But I think if you create a family atmosphere with the students, they'll want to come."

The fan club also includes a special seating section at home games and a bi-monthly dinner party at Kellogg's house throughout the school year.

He also plans to throw an end of the year party for everyone in the fan club. If Kellogg's promotions work the way he wants, he envisions turning the Mullins Center back to a hostile environment similar to the ones the Minutemen are going to play in front of this season.

THE JORDAN RULES

Anything associated with Michael Jordan during his playing days turned to gold. Kellogg hopes to get a similar result when UMass plays Central Florida on Friday, featuring Jordan's son, Marcus, who is a freshman at the school.

The Knights became part of a national controversy when Jordan chose to only wear his father's Nike Air Jordan shoes over the school's shoe sponsor, Adidas, which announced that it will end its sponsorship of all UCF teams.

Kellogg believes the high-profile battle over Jordan's feet will ultimately benefit UMass.

"Having Jordan's son and what's going on with that stuff hopefully will get us even more publicity," Kellogg said. "That's one of the reasons why we thought playing that game would be so good for us."

Florida also became a target area for recruiting after freshman Freddie Riley signed with the Minutemen last season. Kellogg is looking to expand his base in Florida with a game in a big stadium and over 53,000 students.

Adam Miller can be reached at amiller@dailycollegian.com.

Coach Derek Kellogg wants every home game to have a large cheering section, like the one against Fordham that was nationally televised during the 2007-2008 season.

Senior guard Ricky Harris shoots over a defender in a game last season. Harris will look to guide five freshmen this season in hopes of returning the Minutemen to national recognition.

times, who also play in Conference USA. While the Minutemen and Knights are similar in experience, the two teams run completely different systems.

"They're kind of the opposite of us," Kellogg said. They run more controlled sets, and try to slow the game down a little bit, and try to run certain plays for certain guys, so it will be kind of a contrast in styles of play."

UMass, who brought the dribble-drive offense back to Amherst last season and who return just 36.1 average points per game from five players, will need Harris to carry the scoring load and to help incorporate the freshmen into the offense against the Knights. Harris, named to the Atlantic 10 Pre-Season first team and returning leading scorer in the conference, (18. 2 points-per-game) is the only scholarship senior on the team.

The Knights are led by Issac Sosa (8.2 ppg) and return an average of just 31.5 percent of its scoring from last year, and must fill the void left by All-American shooting guard Jermaine Taylor. Taylor, who was drafted by the Washington Wizards and was traded to the Houston Rockets, was the Conference USA Player of the Year last year and was third in the nation in scoring (26.2 ppg). The Knights beat Saint Leo, 84-65 in an exhibition on Nov. 4, and have two big time non-conference match-ups against Notre Dame Dec. 6 and Connecticut Dec. 20.

Kellogg knows the comparisons between the two teams are there, and is optimistic for his second season at the helm of the Minutemen.

"It's two programs kind of in the same spot, and heading in the same direction."

UMass takes on BU, looks for better defense

By Mike Mastone
Collegian Staff

After losing two key players to graduation, the Massachusetts women's basketball team needs a lot of players to step up and take on new roles, as the team looks to improve on last year's 12-18 record.

The Minutewomen will have to work hard on the offensive end this season to fill the voids left by the graduation of Stefanie Gerardot and Sakera Young.

Gerardot was the team's leading scorer in her final season, averaging 14.9 points per game in addition to four rebounds and finishing the season with 40 assists. She was also affective on the defensive end, and finishing the 2008 season with 26 steals and only committing 27 fouls in 30 games.

Young was the facilitator of the Minutewomen's offensive attack. The guard posted 101 assists on the season while averaging 8.4 ppg. Young was also a solid defensive contributor, as she finished second on the team with 45 steals.

"Anytime you lose seniors who have played in a program for fours years, it has an impact on the following year," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said. "We lose [Young's] speed and her ability to get to the basket and her defensive presence on the floor [Gerardot] was just the consummate team player who really did everything we asked her to do."

Teya Wright will be the team's biggest loss defensively. She led the team in rebounds per game (7.9), blocks (20), and steals (51) last season. She also was fourth on the team with 8.4 ppg. However, Dacko said the team has improved tremendously after working on defense all preseason.

Waiting in the wings are sophomore Kristina Danella and junior Cerie Mosgrove, the top two scorers remaining from last year's squad. Danella averaged 9.3 ppg and 4.6 rpg in her freshman campaign, while Mosgrove chipped in 5.8 ppg and shot 35 percent from three-point range.

Senior guards Diatiemra Hill and Kim Benton will also need to step up and have strong seasons to close their careers. Hill is a solid all-around contributor and could have an impact if she can find and make more shots. Benton is a solid passer who also needs to create more shots for herself as well as her teammates.

This year's squad will feature three freshmen that could be strong all-around contributors.

Guard Dee Montgomery, forward Shakia Robinson, and center Jasmine Watson all possess good scoring abilities. Montgomery was a two-time Big Nine Conference Player of the Year in Tennessee, while Watson was the No. 23-ranked forward in the nation by Hoopgurlz.com. Watson and Robinson are also solid rebounders, while Watson could be a potes shot-blocker on the defensive end.

"I expect them to come in and make an impact right away," Dacko said. "They're a very, very strong class. They have strong personalities. They're team ball players and skilled athletes, so we expect them to come in and challenge the upper classmen."

The Minutewomen's schedule looks both fair and difficult. Of their 17 non-conference matchups, 10 are against teams with .500 winning-percentage or worse last season. UMass will face four winning teams in their first ten games.

However, the majority of the non-conference schedule takes the Minutewomen away from Amherst. They will play 10 of these games on the road.

UMass opens its season this Sunday at home against a strong Boston University squad and will then play two of the next three games at home against Big East teams St. John's and Villanova. The Minutewomen then hit the road for seven consecutive games, including appearances in the University of Miami Thanksgiving Tournament and the Brown Bear Classic against teams such as Miami, Morgan State and Quinnipiac.

After the Brown Bear Classic, the Minutewomen have a chance to finish off their non-conference schedule in a strong way. Four of their final six games take place in Amherst, with only two against winning teams in Vermont and Harvard.

UMass then has three days off before beginning a tough 14-game Atlantic-10 schedule. The Minutewomen have several difficult stretches against strong opponents. This includes consecutive games against Richmond, Duquesne and George Washington, back-to-back games against Temple and Dayton, and a season ending run against the likes of No. 11/15 Xavier, St. Joseph's and Charlotte.

In a preseason poll, A-10 coaches picked UMass to finish No. 11 in the conference, ahead of Rhode Island, La Salle and Fordham.

"We're not looking at the polls right now, we're looking at improving this ball club," Dacko said. "I think we're going to surprise a lot of people. I think our players are working extremely hard and doing everything we asked them to do. I think we are much better and stronger than we were a year ago."

Mike Mastone can be reached at mmastone@student.umass.edu.

Junior forward Cerie Mosgrove will look to lead the Minutewomen, who have three freshmen that could see substantial minutes. UMass takes on Boston University Sunday.

Senior point guard Kim Benton looks to find an open teammate. Benton will lead a Minutewomen without Stefanie Gerardot and Sakera Young, who graduated last year.

Without Gerardot and Young, Mosgrove and Danella stand up

By Steve Levine
Collegian Staff

Some players have graduated, some are returning, and some will step into the Mullins Center for the first time.

Just three days remain before the start of the Massachusetts women's basketball season, when the Minutewomen hit the court with a new-look roster.

UMass takes on Boston University Sunday, when they will try to diseredit their Atlantic-10 pre-season coaches' poll rank of 11.

Minutewomen coach Marnie Dacko understands her team needs to fill some voids, especially after losing star guards Stefanie Gerardot, the team's leading scorer, and Sakera Young, who was third in scoring.

Sophomore guard Kristina Danella was second in scoring as a freshman last year, and was named to the A-10 All-Rookie Team. Dacko understands Danella will play a big role in the offense this year, along with other players.

"Danella's been doing a great job along with Cerie Mosgrove and Stephanie Lawrence," she said. "They are the three mix-and-match forwards for us, and they give us a lot of court presence offensively and defensively. They've worked in the offseason on their shooting, and they'll be ready to go."

Mosgrove, a six-foot guard, started 11 of 30 games last year, registering 5.8 points per game, 1.9 rebounds and 16 assists. Lawrence saw limited time last year as a sophomore forward, but did finish with 58 points, 31 rebounds, seven assists, five blocks and five steals.

One of the biggest impact players on the roster is junior forward Teya Wright, who led the team last year in rebounds, blocks, steals and field goal percentage. The seasoned six-foot-one junior averaged 7.9 rebounds per game, registered 20 blocks and 51 steals, and had a .513 field goal percentage in 29 games.

Senior guard Diatiemra Hill started in all but one of the team's 30 games last year and had the second-most assists with 87. On top of that, she averaged 5.3 points per game and 3.7 assists.

Other returning players include senior guard Kim Benton, sophomore guard Emilie Teuscher, redshirt junior guard Megan Zullo, and sophomore center Nicole Jones.

Veterans aside, Dacko believes that the three incoming freshmen will have a big impact this year and will challenge the upper-classmen for playing time. Dee Montgomery, a freshman guard from Tennessee High School in Bluff City, Tenn. will join freshman teammates Shakia Robinson, a forward from North Penn High School in North Wales, Pa. and Jasmine Watson, a center from South Bend Washington High School in South Bend, Ind.

For the second straight year, UMass will be running a new offense that depends heavily on all five players scoring, with a lot of participation from the bench. As of now, the Minutewomen don't have a set starting lineup.

"We've changed our starting lineup around a lot so far," Dacko said. "A big thing for us is to look for who is going to give us a spark off the bench and who will contribute as a sixth or seventh player."

Dacko wants the offense to start with the defense, which is much improved from last year. The Minutewomen have worked on their defense throughout the preseason and expect it to pay huge dividends, especially in the post.

"We're much stronger in the post position this year than last year," Dacko said. "When healthy, we're a much deeper team in the post. We've got some imposing figures in the post and they'll see a lot of minutes throughout the season."

Although Dacko does not have a concrete starting lineup yet, expect that to change as the Minutewomen get their first few games in the books.

Five freshmen and two transfers give UMass new identity, look

By David Brenot
Collegian Staff

The only and last time the Massachusetts men's basketball team faced the University of Central Florida, it was a special year.

UMass won the game, 92-70, and was in the first round of the 1996 NCAA tournament en route to the programs first Final Four appearance.

The Minutemen will look to get back to the Big Dance when it open its 2009-2010 regular season this Friday against the Knights, pitting together two of the youngest teams in the country.

The Minutemen have five freshmen on their roster, including transfers Hasheem Bailey and Sean Carter, while the Knights have six freshmen, including Michael Jordan's son, Marcus and two red shirt freshmen.

"It will be hostile, but they are in a similar boat as us in that they have a lot of young new guys, so that sounds exactly like us," UMass coach Derek Kellogg said. "It will kind of be like, who's maybe a little more prepared at this point."

Coming off an 80-78 preseason exhibition win against Dowling last Saturday, the Minutemen will now go on the road, and will look to win its first game of a season for the seventh straight year.

In the victory against the Division II Golden Lions, senior guard Ricky Harris had 28 points, while junior Anthony Gurley added 13 in the win. Carter grabbed 12 rebounds and contributed six points. All five freshmen saw action in their first collegiate game, with Terell Vinson (four points, two rebounds), Sampson Carter (six points, three rebounds) and Freddie Riley (three points) seeing substantial minutes.

"There being at home, first night, football weekend, 60,000 kids go to school there, so they should have a pretty good crowd," Kellogg said. "It should be a good hostile environment for our young guys to see, this is what college basketball is all about."

Kellogg wants fans in the seats, promotions, parties and more

By Adam Miller

Massachusetts men's basketball coach Derek Kellogg sees winning and attendance at home games going hand-in-hand. The latter is something he knows can change this season.

Kellogg wants to bring the Mullins Center back to the way it was during his playing days when Kentucky coach John Calipari was at the helm for UMass. After his departure, no coach has been in Amherst for more than five years, and the Minutemen were last in the NCAA Tournament in 1998.

Between those two factors, Kellogg is aware of the challenge that comes with getting students to the games, so he doesn't mind going outside the box with his marketing ideas.

It started with Super Sunday; a replacement for Midnight Madness in the Mullins Center that was meant to boost season ticket sales and help fans get to know a team that consists mostly of players who, for one reason or another, have never seen a minute of playing time for the Minutemen.

The day featured an autograph session as well as a question and answer session, where fans asked a variety of topics from his thoughts on the season to what happens when players miss practice. Kellogg expressed his excitement over the fans' loyalty for those who showed up, despite the small crowd.

He recently started a fan club that gives students and people around the community access to the team that he knows most coaches wouldn't feel comfortable with.

"I understand that in order for us to make the moves we want to make, we have to have 2,000 students at every game cheering for us," Kellogg said.

Part of the promotion includes bringing fans into pre-game meetings to hear the pregame speech before running through the tunnel with UMass. In its exhibition game with Dowling, 30 fans came out of the locker room with the rest of the Minutemen.

Kellogg hopes to push that number to 500.

He publicized the club by having the entire team and people close to the program walk around the dorms and put fliers under every door.

UM tries to stay perfect

After dominating Huskies, UMass hosts JMU and tries to stay perfect at McGuirk Stadium

By Nick O'Malley
Collegian Staff

With all five of its victories coming at home this season, the Massachusetts football team looks to finish the season undefeated at McGuirk Alumni Stadium when it hosts James Madison Saturday.

While road woes took a toll on UMass' playoff hopes this season, the team's play at home has been a saving grace, especially with the home-heavy schedule for the season. A chance to finish the season with a spotless home record is just another motivation for the team heading into Saturday's match-up against the Dukes.

"It's very important to us, to protect our home. That's what we talk about. This game is real important [in order] to do that," defensive end Michael Hanson said of the team's home record. Hanson will be one of 19 seniors honored at Senior Day this weekend.

Running the numbers tells the difference between the Minutemen's performance at home and on the road. This season, UMass (5-4, 3-3 Colonial Athletic Association) at home has won all of its games by an average of 35.6-11.6. On the road, though, the Minutemen have lost by an average score of 29.3-16.3. That success, though, is not something the team takes for granted, as UMass coach Kevin Morris and his team look to finish their home slate against the Dukes.

"You always want to defend your home turf. We're a very prideful group, and we want to defend McGuirk Stadium. It's our home; we want to win," Morris said.

James Madison (4-5, 2-4 CAA), meanwhile, enters this weekend with a season that has been below expectations record-wise. The Dukes started off the season strong by tallying three straight wins against non-conference opponents, but ran into a four game skid once they began conference play.

"They're a very tough team, very athletic. Their record doesn't indicate how good of a team they are," Morris said.

JMU's struggles were compounded when junior quarterback Drew Dudzik broke his leg against Richmond in the team's fifth game of the season. Dudzik was splitting snaps with freshman Justin Thorpe at the time. But, since the injury, the rookie quarterback has been thrust into the starting role. After initial struggles, though, (the Dukes were shutout 27-0 in Thorpe's first full-time start), Thorpe has found success in the offense, winning CAA Rookie of the Week honors with his performance in last week's win over Maine while leading the team in rushing and passing.

"Rookie of the Week last week tells you that he's got some skills," Morris said of Thorpe. "He can throw it, he can run it and he's figuring out the tempo of play and figuring out their offense and he's doing a real nice job."

Thorpe, who is a threat to both run and pass from the pocket, presents a particular challenge for the UMass defense. Although the Minutemen have played against mobile quarterbacks in Rhode Island's Chris Paul-Etienne and Richmond's Eric Ward, Thorpe enters the game with more rushing yards (641, which ranks sixth in the CAA) than any player on either UMass or JMU.

"It's hard, because you've got to think about stopping him as well as everyone else, running-wise with the quarterback," Hanson said. "You've always got to worry about getting sacks and passing, but the fact that he can run brings another element to the game and another thing you have to worry about stopping."

The Minutemen are back over .500 with their 37-7 drumming and are currently tied for second place in the Colonial Athletic Association North with Maine. UMass currently trails No. 8 New Hampshire by two games.

With two games remaining on the conference schedule, the Minutemen are still alive in the race for the conference title, but do not control their own destiny. To have a chance, UMass must win out, while UNH must lose its final two games against No. 5 William & Mary and Maine.

Seniors honored against Dukes

Ducasse, Nelson, Zardas celebrated before final collegiate home game Saturday at noon

Last year, the winningest class in the history of the Massachusetts football team graduated, leaving a legacy that will long be remembered.

This Saturday, when the Minutemen take on James Madison, a class of seniors will be honored at their final career home game. This group has a chance to take a step closer to tying the record set by last year's senior class for most wins in a four-year span while leaving their own legacy.

"It's been a quality class, they have won a lot of football games," UMass coach Kevin Morris said. "Some of them got to play in the national championship game, most of them played in playoff games and they have had a great career here, and we're going to be said to see them go."

In the last four years, the class of seniors has gone 35-14, and with two wins in the final two games of the season, the class would tie the record for the best four-year span in UMass history. One win in the next two games would tie the class for second best with the seniors of 2006 and 2007.

The class of seniors includes defensive linemen Brandon Collier, Michael Hanson, Anthony Monette and Kyle Harrington, one of the best in the Colonial Athletic Conference this season. The group has led a defense that has only given up six rushing touchdowns all season, second best in the conference.

Kicker Armando Cuko, who set the single-season record for made field goals (18) last Saturday, and is one away from breaking the career made field goal record (30), is also among the graduating seniors.

On the defensive side of the ball, the Minutemen will also be losing captain and All-American safety Jeromy Miles, defensive back Corey Davis and linebackers Kurt Filler and Eric Dickson. The offense will lose NFL prospect and team captain Vladimir Ducasse on the offensive line, as well as fellow linemen Jared Chivers and Bryan Fisher.

Other offensive players who will play their final game at McGuirk Stadium are wideouts Victor Cruz, Jeromy Horne and Joe Sandford as well as the Minutemen's starting backfield, full back Chris Zardas and tailback Tony Nelson. Nelson is among one of the best running backs in UMass history, ranking sixth in career rushing yards (2,216), seventh in career rushing touchdowns (21) and seventh in career carries (498).

With a large senior class, this year's squad as well as Morris has relied heavily on its leadership.

"We've leaned on them through thick and thin, and we've had both this season, and they have done a great job," Morris said before Tuesday's practice.

That leadership has helped not only in winning football games, but also in preparing future classes for UMass. With many injuries and the loss of a number of key players from last year's squad to graduation, this year's team has had veteran experience translate into strong performances out of the younger players on the team.

"That is why those younger players are playing well, because they are getting great guidance," Morris said. "When a coach says something, it's one thing, but when a peer says it, it's a totally different thing. When a peer starts helping other peers out, that's a good thing."

But more importantly than the player's accomplishments on the football field, Morris is excited for the future of the players outside of football once they leave UMass with a degree.

"We have a large group of guys who will be leaving the program as seniors and graduating, which we're very proud of them for getting their degrees," Morris said. "But we're excited about what they brought to the program, and what they are going to bring to their communities down the road from the polished young men they are now."

Levasseur talks sedition

BOBBY HITT
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Camera crews and major news networks were on the scene hours before the scheduled lecture "The Great Western Massachusetts Sedition Trial: 20 years later." Protesters from various police organizations and civilians gathered on the Haigis Mall of the University of Massachusetts to protest the lecture, including a weeping Donna Lamonoco, wife of the New Jersey state trooper killed by members of the United Freedom Front.

The lecture, originally slated to include Ray Luc Levasseur, former leader of the United Freedom Front, was forced to continue without Levasseur because of the U.S. parole board's decision to prevent him from crossing state lines as part of his parole restrictions.

"We are here to protest the fact that they are bringing a domestic terrorist to campus," said Rick Brown, President of the State Police Association of Massachusetts. "There is no justification their actions, they are responsible for bombing over twenty buildings, and their organization is responsible for the murder of a New Jersey police officer and attempted murder of two Massachusetts state police officers."

Although Donna Lamonoco and members of the police were invited into the lecture to speak according to the organizers of the event they chose not to.

Just after 7 p.m. a group of protesting police officers filed in and gathered holding signs condemning the lecture. The UMass police department told everyone to sit during the presentation, which was marked by civility from all sides.

The room was filled to capacity with students, protesters, citizens and camera crews flanking the aisles of the large lecture hall.

Sarah Lennox, UMass director of social thought and political economy, was first to address the packed room.

Lennox stated that she wanted the presentation to be an "informative discussion."

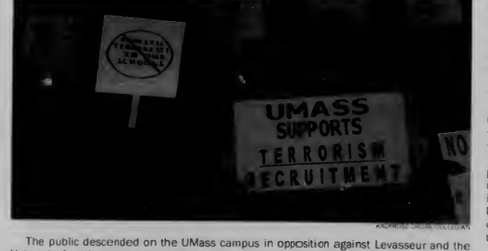
"This event is a commitment to free speech," Lennox said.

"I hope we learn a lot about how contested issues are," she added before giving the podium over to Bill Newman, director of the American Civil Liberties Union office in Western Massachusetts.

"There have been great defeats, but also great victories for the first amendment and freedom of speech," said Newman. "When censorship wins freedom of speech is shredded."

Patricia Levasseur, left, fielded questions with Attorney Daniel Meyers about the sedition trials taking the place of her ex-husband Raymond Luc Levasseur on Nov. 12.

"Our opinions matter an enormous amount," added Newman. Bob Boyle, former defense attorney for Richard Williams, a co-defendant in the case, gave his perspective of the timeline of the trial and how it was learning experience for him as a young attorney.



Patricia Levasseur, Ray Levasseur and Richard Williams were involved in the longest and most expensive trial of Massachusetts history. The proceedings of the trial on seditious conspiracy lasted from 1987 through Nov. 1989. All three were acquitted on these charges.

Seditious conspiracy is not only included attempting to overthrow the government, but can entail the preventing of any execution of a law, according to Elizabeth Fink, defense attorney for the Levasseurs.

"As an attorney I was made to take an oath to serve and protect the Constitution from all enemies foreign and domestic," Fink said. "[Including] against the American government."

"If Ray was allowed to speak he would have blown you away," Fink added. "He is a brilliant man."

"Everyone needs to hear what everyone else has to say," stated Fink, "It is the Constitution that makes us free."

The public descended on the UMass campus in opposition against Levasseur and the University for allowing the controversial former convict opportunity to speak to students.

Barbara Hubbard, a juror for the case, who at the time taught remedial English spoke of her experience during the trial.

"These defendants had an awesome jury," Hubbard said. "We heard hundreds of witnesses testify and we read and went through every piece of evidence."

Although Hubbard was not allowed to speak to the Levasseurs during the trial she did write to both Pat and Ray Levasseur when they were incarcerated.

Rochelle Calhoun, a foreperson of the jury and dean at Mt. Holyoke, spoke after Hubbard.

"The real fight is for our freedoms and looking at things squarely," said Calhoun. "It isn't ok to not allow defendants their say."

Next was Pat Levasseur co-defendant and ex-wife of Ray Levasseur. She spoke of her involvement with Ray Levasseur and how they came to be revolutionaries.

"In 1972 I hooked up with people against the war," said Levasseur. "When Nixon told us the [Vietnam] war was over, and it became clear it wasn't true we got angry."

The Levasseurs in Maine as they both worked for a Prison Reform group. Soon they went underground with the rest of what became to be known as the United Freedom Front.

Members of this group have been convicted of multiple bombings throughout the northeast, a string of bank robberies, attempted murder of two Massachusetts state troopers and the murder of Phil Lamonoco.

"If nobody fought for what's right we would be singing to the Queen instead of pledging allegiance to the flag," said Levasseur. "I believe in my heart we were well intentioned."

"I remember who I am and I understand who I was," said Levasseur.

Fink in response to a question by a member of the audience stated that Ray has often said that his writings have been more affected than any of the violent acts the UFF committed.

Some of the crowd in support of the protesting police organizations voiced their concern to this reporter. The protestors felt that the fact they were invited was ridiculous and people were put in fear by the bombings by the UFF. Also they pointed out that the taxpayers had to pay for the damages to the buildings that were bombed.

Palmer gets back on track with rail

BY TIM JONES
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Town of Palmer is currently making efforts to reinstate passenger rail service through Palmer, as well as to keep Amtrak, a company that services the town of Amherst, active for economic revitalization.

The town prepared a PowerPoint presentation, which was presented to the Massachusetts Department of Transportation by Palmer representatives. The proposed project is to reinstate a passenger loading station in Palmer.

Palmer, known as "The Town of Seven Railroads" officially ended rail passenger service on April 30, 1971, when, due to bankruptcy, Penn Central Railroad turned over operations to Amtrak, which excluded passenger operations in Palmer.

According to the presentation, which was sponsored by the Palmer Redevelopment Authority, "Rich railroad heritage has left behind an active and pivotal set of rails that serves as the HUB in all directions."

Amherst currently has passenger loading stations, and the Town of Palmer, according to the representatives, wishes to have one such station in between Amherst and Boston for more convenience to the community and for the ease of access to the surrounding towns and area.

With a revived passenger station, the town's representatives said they wish to improve Palmer's economy with possible tourism and better access to public transportation.

As well as the new loading station, several other ideas were proposed, including a parking lot, which would be set at either $5 or $7 per car each day. The lot would be built in the Water Street field and would cost an estimated $400,000 without security.

Another idea was for the creation of the "River Edge Railroad Theme Park", which would attract more people and provide entertainment for the community. According to the representatives, the Palmer Department of Public Works would be torn down and relocated to a more centralized area to make available land for the amusement park.

According to the railroads' website, www.sevenrailroads.com, The Palmer Rail Coalition, which consists of local and regional officials whose mission is to restore rail passenger and commuter service at Palmer meets regularly to discuss possibilities that are available.

The Palmer representatives added that the town is also looking into possibilities that the river could be utilized for.

The presentation stated that the project will be beneficial in the long run because there is an estimated short development time and minimal improvements to be made on the station. The town already consists of many railways, most of which are utilized by trains that already pass through.

COMMONS.WIKIMEDIA.ORG

The town of Palmer seeks to reinstate passenger loading stations similar to those of Amherst claiming the new stations will boost the town's economy.

Since the end of passenger loading in Palmer, the "Steaming Tender" restaurant, located right next to the rail lines, was built, and has been featured on shows like "Good Morning America" and "Phantom Gourmet".

Although there has been no passenger loading and disembarking, according to the town's representatives, trains do run through the town and the railroad infrastructure has be maintained by Amtrak, New England Central Railroad, the CSX Corporation and Massachusetts Central Railroad Corporation.

The proposed project has already gained support from several towns, including, Amherst, Ware and Warren, as well as the support of state representative Todd Smola, state Senator Stephen Brewer and Lt. Governor Timothy Murray.

There are several hurdles that the project will encounter, according to Palmer's representatives, some of which include the budget. The total estimated cost, according to the PowerPoint, would be just under $2 million, which the town would not have the money to be able to finance.

In addition to the proposed ideas, Palmer representatives said the town's officials have been attempting several other projects to revive their economy, including the proposition to build a Mohegan Sun Casino in the general area off the Mass Pike.

Before any ideas can be followed through, the representatives added, Palmer official's have to convince Amtrak and Lake Shore Limited that there is potential in stimulating the Western and Central Massachusetts economy, as well as a good amount of revenue to be gained.

There is no word on the future of this project or when it would take place.

UM Health Services to hold walk-in flu clinics

BY KIRSTEN SWENSON
COLLEGIAN STAFF

On Monday, Nov. 16, Maxim Health Systems, a private healthcare services company specializing in influenza and wellness services, will conduct a seasonal flu shot clinic from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. in the University of Massachusetts' Campus Center auditorium.

This is the third clinic Maxim Health Systems has hosted this semester.

"[These clinics] are going to be day-long events. Anyone can just walk in; there's no appointment necessary," said University Health Services (UHS) Communication and Marketing Manager Karen Dunbar Scully, regarding the ongoing clinics Maxim Health Systems host throughout the semester.

Dunbar added, "[The clinics] are actually being run by an outside agency that works with UHS, so we're not physically administering the vaccine. Maxim Health Systems is coming in and doing this as a public service here on campus."

According to the Center for Disease Control and Prevention's (CDC) website, the seasonal flu vaccine is appropriate for individuals who want to decrease their chances of contracting the illness. Certain high-risk groups, like health care workers, pregnant women and children ages six months to 19 years, should be vaccinated each year.

While the CDC recommends high-risk individuals also be given the H1N1 vaccine, which began being distributed to medical providers in early October, Dunbar Scully stressed that Maxim Health Systems' clinic will only be administering seasonal flu vaccines.

"This is purely a seasonal [flu] clinic, but we are doing an H1N1 clinic for high-risk individuals at the Mullins Center," Dunbar Scully said.

The H1N1 clinic at the Mullins Center will take place on Friday, Nov. 13 from 10 a.m. to 2 p.m. According to an e-mail sent out to the campus community by UHS, the University received a limited supply of the H1N1 vaccine, and will only be administering it to CDC-classified "target" and high-risk groups.

UHS conducts their own seasonal flu clinics every Thursday from 1-4 p.m. However, Dunbar Scully notes that Maxim Health System's walk-in clinics are convenient for those looking to receive a flu shot without scheduling an appointment.

"The clinics are really aimed at people that don't receive all their primary care at UHS," Dunbar Scully said. "Some faculty and staff have their medical care outside campus. The general public, somebody who's just visiting campus or someone here for a conference can just stop in if they want to get vaccinated."

Dunbar Scully added, "The cost of the vaccination is $30, but some insurance providers will cover it. [Students] can check the UHS website to see if their provider is listed."

'FAC' seeks to revitalize theater with partnership

BY ANGELA HILSMAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

With budgetary concerns slowing their progress, the Fine Arts Center (FAC), located on the University of Massachusetts campus has recently announced collaboration with experts in the hope of reactivating its cultural movement, the New WORLD Theater.

FAC director Dr. Willie Hill will be collaborating with New York City based Talvin Wilks to innovate ways to restart the New WORLD Theater program.

Wilks started working as a consultant for FAC in October. He is a playwright, director, dramaturge, actor, advocate and historian. He was the New WORLD Theater's interim artistic director and associate professor in the Department of Theater in 2002 and 2003.

The program was suspended in September following the announcement of budget cuts by the University in July.

"We didn't have operating capital to fund the theater," said Dennis Conway, FAC assistant director.

According to Conway, "[New WORLD Theater] was a program of the Fine Arts Center that focused on performance art by artists of color."

In addition to Conway's comments, Hill said that the New WORLD is committed to equality and progressive social change.

"Through art, we work against racism and oppression in all forms," he said.

Hill said "The university, through the Fine Arts Center, supported salaries and benefits for New WORLD Theater employees and provided a small allocation for the programming."

Altogether the costs will be approximately $213,000. Although the theater did raise more through gifts, grants and ticket sales, the New WORLD Theater's programs cost more than the theater raised. For fiscal year 2010, FAC had to reduce its budget by 7.5 percent and could no longer support New WORLD Theater, Hill said.

The theater, which received $375,000 in new grant awards from the Ford, Surdna and Nathan Cummings foundations, is now working with its founders to bring back the program with the money they have available.

New WORLD programs require funds for salary and operational support, Hill said, adding that the FAC does not have these funds as a result of the budget cut.

Before budget cuts Hill said, the grants were intended to support the Intersection Conference, Project 2050 and some general operating expenses of the theater.

Hill called the decision to suspend the New WORLD Theater last September "a painful one."

Homelessness, the 'unseen crisis' in the Valley

If you or anyone you know needs help, call Benny Johnson. He will house, clothe and feed anyone who shows up at his modest apartment.

"30 Gatehouse Rd., Apartment 308, Amherst, Massachusetts. Come by anytime," he told me during our first encounter.

Chris Russell

Many nights, one or two people stay with him, other times much more.

"I've had this place full," he said. "Sometimes I get out of bed and I'm stepping in people's mouths."

Even though the apartment has two bedrooms, Johnson sleeps in the living room to make his guests feel as comfortable as possible.

"Some people are shy, and wouldn't feel as comfortable sleeping in the living room," he said. "It's my apartment and I feel comfortable wherever I am, so I don't care."

Johnson also cooks huge dinners on a regular basis. Last Wednesday he prepared Southern fried chicken, fish, omelets and finger foods for about 30 people.

"I put the word out. I want people to come to me," he said. "What do I get out of it? I feel good that I know that I'm helping people. I know that Larry [a mentally handicapped man who lives in Johnson's building] ain't hungry."

Johnson, 62, has been working for others most of his life. Upon moving to Northampton in 1982, he organized a Tenants Association for residents of the Florence Heights housing project to press the city's Housing Authority to fix leaky roofs, broken pipes, cockroaches and other unsanitary living conditions.

> In 2007, over 5000 people in the Pioneer Valley experienced some period of homelessness, almost half of whom were families with children.

When the complaints were ignored, Johnson appealed to the Massachusetts Commission Against Discrimination, which successfully sued the Northampton Housing Authority for $100,000 in damages. Each family received $2,000, along with the maintenance they were entitled to.

Johnson hasn't slowed down since. Many nights, he can be seen on the streets of Amherst and Northampton, wearing a number of colorful capes and singing some of the 200 songs he has memorized, accompanied by a bucket he found in the trash several years ago and a kazoo that hangs around his neck.

This has earned him the alias "Motown Man."

"Because I play Motown music," Johnson said.

He grew up in New Orleans and began playing music as early as he can remember, eventually traveling the world as a vocalist and drummer in a band with his five brothers.

"Music is my high," he said. "When I'm playing, I don't feel the injuries I have in my shoulder or spinal cord."

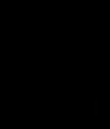
Many think he is homeless when they see him playing on the street, a reaction Johnson hopes to provoke.

"I get a chance to change people's mind about judging people … They tell me 'you changed my way of thinking.' That's why I'm out on the street," he said. "I never finished high school, but I feel like a psychiatrist … I make my rounds like a doctor, except, instead of a bag I got a bucket."

Johnson hopes to persuade more to aid Amherst's homeless population. In 2007, over 5,000 people in the Pioneer Valley experienced some period of homelessness, almost half of whom were families with children, according to a report commissioned by the mayors of Holyoke, Springfield and Northampton.

"[Homelessness] is a crisis. An unseen crisis, but a crisis," Johnson said.

For those who cannot afford to aid the homeless financially, Johnson said there are other ways to help. Instead of ignoring a homeless person on the street one could point out places they can find help, as many are not aware of all the resources available to them, or simply make small talk.



"At least then they would feel like a human being," Johnson said.

Yet Johnson lamented many do not even extend this small courtesy, including some people who call themselves Christians.

"A lot of people who go to church are against homeless people … They say 'I'm not giving that crackhead no money, I'm not giving that wino no money,'" Johnson said. "These people forget that if Jesus were here he wouldn't be hanging out with the rich people, he would be with the crackheads and the prostitutes."

Chris Russell is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at crussell@student.umass.edu.

Looking for answers amidst the Fort Hood tragedy

Evan Haddad

Flags fluttered at half staff this weekend to commemorate the violent and unprecedented shooting at Fort Hood, which ended with 13 dead soldiers and 29 wounded at the American military base in Texas.

Grief mingled with bitterness, adding to the perplexity of a public already leery of recent military activities. But the developing investigation of the Fort Hood shooting does little to abate the mistrust many Americans feel. If anything, it's pulling the curtain on the incongruous system to which we entrust our national security.

An American born citizen of Palestinian heritage, 39 year-old Major Nidal Malik Hasan, transferred to Fort Hood last July from Walter Reed Memorial hospital where he had worked as a psychiatrist for six years.

Military records indicate, however, that Hasan fell far short of the exemplary model psychiatrist. NPR News disclosed that, while stationed at Walter Reed Memorial, Hasan was characteristically late and distracted in his work. Reports suggest that he even tried to convert one of his patients to Islam, telling him that his religion would "save him."

Relatives described him as a quiet and devout Muslim, who had become increasingly disillusioned with the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and wanted his ticket out of the service.

They reported that fellow soldiers had often harassed Hasan on account of his ethnicity and religion. In the August following the 9/11 attacks, Hasan's car was keyed and a bumper sticker reading, "Allah is Love," was torn off, according to CNN. But to all appearances, Hasan was no extremist, no more than the millions of other average Muslims around the world. Yet, the circumstances surrounding the crime could tempt many distraught Americans to believe otherwise.

Media sources reveal that Hasan worshipped at the Dar al-Hijrah mosque in Falls Church, Va. in 2001. The mosque was led at that time by Anwar al-Aulaqi, an imam who is now thought to have aided Al-Quaeda in the Sept. 11 attacks. Two of the 9/11 hijackers emerged from under al-Aulaqi's tutelage, having attended his lectures both at mosques in California and Falls Church. Despite the increasing scrutiny of government intelligence, al-Aulaqi managed to flee the country in 2002.

> Hasan was no extremist; no more than the millions of other average Muslims around the world.

The depth of al-Aulaqi's influence on Hasan, at this moment, is unclear. Several days after the attack, al-Aulaqi lauded Hasan on his website, writing "the only way a Muslim could Islamically justify serving as a soldier in the U.S. Army is if his intention is to follow the footsteps of men like Nidal."

Soldiers who witnessed the shooting told reporters of the Associated Press that Hasan shouted "Allah Akbar" (translating to "Allah is the greatest") as he blazed through the base's military processing center with a powerful semi-automatic handgun.

Military and government officials have undertaken a study of Hasan's character, but would like to avoid any hasty conclusions about his motives. The operating hypothesis remains that Hasan acted alone in the attack and without any terrorist connections.

The general Muslim community, including the one at Dar al-Hijrah, hastily condemned the violence of last week. Extremist groups were delighted by it, praising Hasan as a hero. Despite the predictability of the fundamentalist response, it goads a tender spot in many Americans, and may provoke more anti-Muslim sentiment.

Army Chief of Staff General George Casey told CNN on Sunday that focusing on Hasan's Muslim background could "heighten the backlash" against other Muslims in the army … an issue which has already complicated both the solidarity and success of the armed forces in the Middle East.

NPR's story claimed that FBI officials learned of Hasan's connection to the extremist-minded al-Aulaqi as early as 2008, but did nothing. They explained that thousands of similar reports are filed each year. Few are compelling enough to support further inquiry.

The Fort Hood shooting has resurrected old questions about the scrupulousness of military intelligence, which the army would probably have liked to remain unearthed.

Could this information have helped army officials deter Hasan from his violent meltdown at Fort Hood? Or was it a crime of passion, coming from a man deeply conflicted between the duty to his faith and country?

Either way, it's a lose-lose situation. If military intelligence suspected Hasan of former terrorist ties, they should have questioned him; if he appeared distraught or confused, he should have been helped.

Hasan's experience of cultural estrangement reveals just another kink in the crumbling chain of the military.

In Amherst, 1800 miles away, PVTA buses whir by, plastered with ads for ROTC, which beckon young men and women under the tarpaulin of an "Army of One." It's a rickety claim, indeed, and one which was just barely held up by the base of mutual terror and some training last Thursday at Fort Hood.

DC Showdown: Franklin v. Worcester

Franklin has it all

Matthew M. Robare

Quite frankly, Worcester Dining Commons sucks. Its only redeeming qualities are the Pita Pit and the store, which hardly qualify for our purpose since they're retail operations and not dining operations.

The best dining hall on campus, better even than the legendary Berkshire, is Franklin. Yes, Franklin.

It all starts with the name. The name Franklin has wonderfully positive associations which resonate throughout American history and culture, as well as being a down to earth and populist name. The Shires are aristocratic, with all the connotations of elitism and exclusivity. I bet they're great for people named Cabot Lodge, who have Roman numerals after the name of someone who made a lot of money or held some once-influential government job, but I doubt we'll find many of that class here. UMass is all about the hoi polloi. Worcester, by contrast, is associated with crime and steak sauce. And the steak sauce is for the English Worcester.

The positive connotations of Franklin go back far in American history. Benjamin Franklin, anyone? Inventor, statesman, minister to France, lover, captured for all time by Howard Da Silva in 1776 and immortalized as the first newspaper publisher in "Ben and Me." Or perhaps Franklin Delano Roosevelt? President, leader through World War II, architect of the New Deal and its political coalition that created the modern Democratic Party. Best of all, he did some of his best work while courageously battling a paralytic illness that made his life one of constant pain. The man is so universally beloved that he generally gets a free pass on the Japanese-American internment and denying asylum to Jewish refugees from Europe.

But where Franklin (the DC) really takes the cake is its layout. For my freshmen and sophomore years I lived in Sylvan, but spent a lot of time around Herter and the Newman Center. Every Friday night, before the Improv With Attitude show at 8 p.m. in Herter 231, I ate at Franklin. Every morning and most weekday evenings I tended to eat at Worcester, so I got in a very good position to compare the two.

The layout of Franklin is superior because of color and space. Franklin has a lot of big windows and its tables are arranged carefully, making the dining area seem bigger than it is. In addition to the use of space, Franklin is rarely crowded. Worcester is usually packed from 5 p.m to around 7:30 p.m.

When I say packed, I mean hungry people starting to think that the person in front of them might taste good with the right amount of Tabasco sauce packed. If I was lucky enough to get food, I'd spend 10 minutes wandering the whole area until I found an empty seat. The situation was exacerbated by the fact that people had the tendency to leave their stuff at the table they intended to sit at and then spend the 25 minutes in line it took to get food.

Franklin also beats Worcester by miles in terms of community. I know that word gets thrown around with as little discretion as if it were "fascist" or "socialist," but I mean it. Franklin has a unique community. It is the closest dining hall to Central and so it attracts that entire crowd.

I don't know why, but Central attracts a good deal of the most unique and wonderfully distinctive students on campus … and they usually eat at Franklin. I could people watch for hours, admiring the superb ways each person expressed themselves through their clothing and hair styles. Face it, Worcesterites, if it weren't for Sylvan, the only people there would be the bland science and engineering majors.

The superior location of Franklin to the other dining halls may seem entirely subjective after all convenience counts for a lot and Southwesties might think Berkshire and Hampshire have the best locations because they're close. But, in fact, this is not the case. Franklin has the best location because it is closest to University Health Services. If someone gets sick from dining hall food, the doctors and a stomach pump are right there. In Worcester they'd have to drag themselves down that road. In Southwest, they'd need an ambulance.

Believe it or not, Franklin's food is superior to Worcester's in every way, too. Worcester always gave me diarrhea. Franklin made me constipated. Worcester was the poison and Franklin was the hallucinogen. In Franklin the coffee was always hotter, the vegetarian options were always tastier and the fake eggs were always faker.

Franklin rules; Worcester drools!

Worcester worth the trip

What is there to be said about Worcester? For those dwelling outside of the mini-metropolis we call Southwest, those living in Central, Northeast, North Apartments and Sylvan are left with relatively scant choices. The aforementioned Worcester is located on the inner-outskirts of Northeast, and Franklin is right at the bottom of the hillside residence area of Central.

Dave Coffey

I remember living in Butterfield last year at the very top of the hill in Central, and instead of strolling right down the hill to Franklin, I would always make the trek down North Pleasant Street to the Mecca that is Worcester dining.

Now, why would someone as lazy as myself make the daunting trip all the way from the Arctic Circle of Central, that is "The Butt," and back just for one dining common over the other?

The answer is simply that Worcester is a cut above the rest. Am I saying that Franklin is despicable, disgusting and otherwise intolerable? Absolutely not; the case is merely that Worcester reigns supreme for those that live anywhere but Southwest.

As I sat pondering over the differences in the actual culinary aspects of Worcester and Franklin, I came to the realization that there actually aren't that many. Aside from the facts that Worcester typically has some more impressive "special" items available, and that their pasta and entrees tend to be less, for lack of a better word, "congeal-ey," the food choices are essentially the same.

If one was restricted to either dining common, you certainly would be hard pressed to find a way to go hungry. Both offer several varieties of pizza, pastas, soups, entrees and desserts, as well as, well-stocked salad, sandwich and cereal bars every day. In both locations, these selections rarely disappoint.

I came to the secondary realization, however, that the experience at Worcester is nonetheless far better than the one at Franklin. This opinion is mostly based on the aesthetic values possessed by the respective dining commons.

While living in Central, I remember one of the more frequent complaints I heard frequently was that of the "Franklin smell." I don't really know what the cause of this particular odor is, but I can't count on my hands how many times people in my building actually didn't go eat on a given night because they, "don't want to smell like Franklin." While not everyone can readily identify this particular scent, a good amount of people who resided in Central regarded this as a good reason to avoid Franklin as much as possible.

Another major area where Worcester trounces Franklin is in the layout department. Worcester, by and large, keeps it simple in terms of the way it's laid out. There are two entrances on two sides of the building, both of which lead to the same place. Franklin has the unfortunate structure that necessitates having "sides."

At first, it doesn't really seem like that big of a deal, but it can get pretty frustrating pretty quickly. If one is looking for something or someone, such a preferred beverage or a friend, and you don't know which side it's on, it's easy when navigating Franklin to feel like running laps around the building with a full tray in your hand.

There are other smaller layout differences that don't amount to much on their own, but add up rather quickly. Worcester's seating is laid out in a fairly creative manner to allow for a comfortable yet economic seating pattern (and let's not forget that seating blessing known as a booth).

Franklin is fairly spacious, yet it seems to fill up much quicker despite its size. If you have to go to the bathroom while dining at Worcester, it's a few steps away. At Franklin, it's half a lap around the building and a steep flight of stairs away. I don't think I have to go into detail about how troublesome a set of stairs can be when one is badly in need of a restroom.

Not only is Worcester's C-Store of a larger and higher quality than Franklin's, the former also has the Pita Pit, something the latter really has nothing in comparison to. Also, while getting food at Worcester, one's experience compares much less to the high school cafeteria feel that Franklin gives off.

Like I said, there's nothing inherently wrong with Franklin. The food is perfectly fine, and there's nothing completely intolerable about the building itself. Yet, when left with a choice between Worcester and Franklin, there is no choice. Worcester is the clear winner.

Palmer brings wild act to Pearl St.

COURTESY MYSPACE.COM/CRAZY_ANI

Tonight, Friday the 13th, Amanda Palmer will be taking her "Who Killed Amanda Palmer" tour to the Pearl Street Night Club at 9 p.m. The Lexington-native went to Wesleyan University and has been playing with Regina Spektor and ...And You Will Know Us By The Trail of Dead.

Don't be put off by superstitions. Sometimes 13 is a lucky number.

This Friday, Nov. 13, Dresden Doll's singer, songwriter and pianist Amanda Palmer will try her luck at Pearl Street Night Club in Northampton. The 9 p.m. show follows the recent conclusion to her "Who Killed Amanda Palmer" tour.

Palmer's distinctive blend of powerful piano melodies and daring drama has come to be referred to as punk cabaret. Music and performer alike are always theatrical but never over the top.

Having grown up in Lexington, Mass. Palmer is another proud product of the Bay State. An all around performer, she has been playing music since her early high school years. Upon graduating, she went on to attend Wesleyan University and became highly involved in the dramatic arts.

In songwriting Palmer draws directly from her influences, from operas to indies. She has performed with the likes of Regina Spektor and ...And You Will Know Us By the Trail of Dead.

While her Dresden Dolls act rests on indefinite hiatus, Palmer has been forging the way for a solo career.

Her first solo studio release, "Who Killed Amanda Palmer," debuted in September of 2008. The album was born from a surprisingly diverse ensemble of artists, including producer and piano pop king, Ben Folds, and writer, Neil Gaiman.

Gaiman is most recognized for the novel "Good Omens" and children's tale "Coraline," which was recently adapted to film. He was also responsible for the art accompaniment to "Who Killed Amanda Palmer." However, his connection to Palmer's project did not end with the album release. Gaiman and Palmer have been in a relationship since the summer of this year.

Her debut was somewhat of a concept album, chronicling the life and hypothetical "death" of Ms. Palmer. It remains semiautobiographical throughout, touching on some of the performer's darker life experiences. The title is also a blatant "Twin Peaks," reference, for fans of 90s television programming.

"A lot of the songs are piano ballads that never found a home on a Dolls' record, because I hadn't wanted to overload the record with slow material. But there's a really intense, exciting energy to the tracks at the same time. It definitely won't drag," said Palmer of the album in an interview with The Boston Phoenix.

"Astronaut" opens the album with a jolt. Only the percussion section, composed of none other than Folds himself, matches the ferocity of Palmer's piano track. Put simply, the song educes shivers, a rare reminder of the power of piano and a strong vocalist.

Showing off her softer side, songs like "Ampersand" and "Blake Says" feature hushed vocals over lush piano. She transitions from whispers to elevated arias with surprising ease.

As close to her music as she could safely be, Palmer is not afraid to handle touchy subjects, most of which she bases on her own experiences. The most notable of these true-life tales is "Oasis," a controversial account of rape and abortion set to a bright piano backing. For this reason, Palmer says on her blog that the song was banned from rotation in the UK with representatives claiming it made light of "rape, religion, and abortion."

Confounded by the harsh reactions of her UK label, Palmer responded in her blog on amandapalmer.net saying, "When you cannot joke about the darkness of life, that's when the darkness takes over."

Palmer has also covered tracks from a wide variety of sources. Admittedly influenced by Spektor, she has taken a stab at several of the young songwriter's finest as well as a slew of other modern acts. One of her first recordings with Folds was a cover of Death Cab For Cutie's "I Will Follow You Into the Dark," which she released via her myspace page.

Opening for Palmer is Nervous Cabaret, a New York based band that has taken much of its inspiration from Palmer's work with the Dresden Dolls.

There are quite simply no other voices in the industry quite like Palmer. She is pure piano power and sass, all at once captivating and terrifying. The performer pours her entirely into every song, broadcasting the type of brutal honesty few people even have in private.

Regardless of superstitions, Palmer is worth the risk.

Amanda Palmer is performing on Friday, Nov. 13 at 9 P.M. at Pearl Street Ballroom in Northampton. Tickets are $17.50 in advance and $20 at the door.

90s band The Cranberries to reunite in Boston

By Kate MacDonald
Collegian Staff

Incorporating an infusion of Irish music, rock, pop and grunge, The Cranberries wrote some of the most popular songs worldwide in the 1990s. Unless you've lived under a rock during that whole decade and at least part of this, chances are you've heard a song or two of theirs. The band, however, went on a hiatus in 2003, citing the need for each individual to branch out into their own solo career. Now, for the first time in years, The Cranberries will play in Boston tonight, Friday, Nov. 13th at 7:30 p.m. at The Orpheum.

The Cranberries, who hail from Limerick, Ireland, are best known for their first and second albums. Their 90s album "Everybody Else Is Doing It So Why Can't We," spurred the hits "Dreams" and "Linger," both of which were huge in the U.S. It's widely hailed as their most successful album, although their next CD, "No Need To Argue" went platinum seven times in America. One can find "Zombie," a ode to Irish revolutionaries during the 1916 rebellion as well "The Troubles of Northern Ireland," "Yeats Grave" and "Ode To My Family," both of which are less known in the U.S., but hits in their own right.

They went on to release three more studio albums, five EPs and four compilation albums, all of which had mediocre reception in America but furthered their career overseas, particularly in the United Kingdom and Ireland.

Lead singer Dolores O'Riordan launched a successful career in Europe, but her otherwise worldwide fame did not reach the U.S.

This current tour comes right on the heels of the second solo CD. Expect to hear both old and new in these shows, the band has confirmed they will be playing old hits, O'Riordan's solo material, as well as, new, unreleased Cranberries tunes.

Though this is being hailed as a reunion tour, there was no official breakup of the group. O'Riordan attributes the need to go on a break to the demands of record companies always wanting more from the five person band. Now, however, they're refocused on the music and are shying away from celebrity. In an interview with a London magazine, O'Riordan states, "I just make music for fun now — it's a hobby, there's no pressure. It's just art and fun like it was when I first joined The Cranberries."

As one of only a handful of Irish bands who've found success in the United States (in the same category as U2 and The Corrs), The Cranberries should have no problem proving themselves once more in Boston, a vibrant city rich with Celtic ancestry. Boston is their second show in their 19 date U.S. tour, which ends in early December in Seattle before picking up in March in Europe.

Dolores O'Riordan croons in their later hit "Just My Imagination," "There was a game we used to play - We would hit the town on Friday night and stay in bed until Sunday." The audience in The Orpheum tonight should expect nothing less from this energetic Irish band.

Stephen Kellogg catches 'The Bear'

By David Mansfield
Collegian Correspondent

"Sometimes you get the bear, sometimes the bear gets you." Stephen Kellogg and the Sixers are really starting to catch that bear. The Sixers' new album, "The Bear," which hit stores in September, addresses the many trials and tribulations of life, as well as the chronological progression from being a teenager to middle aged. "Our manager actually came up with the title, and it's very fittin.," said Sixers' bassist Kit "Goose" Karlson.

A full time act for six years now, the Western Mass. based rock group has only now really begun to take flight. "The Bear," released on Vanguard Records, debuted at number 189 on the Billboard 200, thrusting them a little closer to rock-star status. Their hit single, "Shady Esperanto and the Young Hearts," has endeared them to the mainstream crowd and has received radio play all over the country.

Their reputation for passionate, energetic live performances and a wide range of instrumental abilities works in their favor as well. Karlson, for example, is an accomplished bassist, pianist, and tuba player. He even rocks out on the accordion on a few songs. Drummer Brian "Boots" Factor is versatile as well, as he is known to give the drum set a rest every now and then to throw down on the mandolin and the banjo. "We all look up to The Band, who play a lot of different instruments," said Karlson. "So during shows we try to break out the accordion, or the tuba, or the banjo at least once."

Their recent success has been no stroke of luck, however, but rather the product of a lot of hard work and more time spent producing a record than they had spent ever before. "Our biggest problem before was that we didn't have enough time. We would be touring eight months out of the year," said Karlson. "This time we spent about six months making the record, whereas before we would go in and do it all in two weeks." The attention to detail can really be felt on the record, as well as their increased collaboration while song writing. According to Karlson, Kellogg would do the majority of the song writing on previous records. This time around, Karlson and Factor had more opportunity to contribute their own ideas. The Sixers have also begun to play with new guitarist Sam Getz, from Ohio.

The three core members, consisting of front man Kellogg, Karlson, and Factor, all attended UMass Amherst at the same time, although their vision of the Sixers was far from fruition. "We knew of each other, but didn't necessarily know each other," said Karlson. Years later, Kellogg, who had been performing as a solo act for some time-was working at a ticket kiosk when he ran into Karlson. They soon arranged a jam session. Coincidentally, Factor also met up with Kellogg, and asked him if he wanted to play sometime. "We all kind of had crappy jobs at the time, and then randomly got together," said Karlson. Factor and Karlson, who were both in dissipating bands at the time, joined forces with Kellogg full time and in 2003, the Sixers were born.

After their debut release, "Bulletproof Heart," and their follow-up self-titled album, both released with Universal Records, the Sixers switched gears and released "Glassjaw Boxer" in 2007 with OAR's label Everfine. "The guys in OAR have been good friends of ours, and we figured it was a pretty good situation for one album," said Karlson. The album was met with critical acclaim, as Brian Mansfield of USA Today listed it on his Top Five of the Year. The Sixers have now released "The Bear" with Vanguard, and appear to have found a home with them.

With the rising popularity of their single, "Shady Esperanto and the Youngheart," the band and their colleagues at Vanguard figured it was time to shoot a music video. Since they all went to UMass, the state's flagship campus provided the perfect setting. "I got a call at a friend's wedding about 10 days before the start of band camp from our manager who actually pitched the idea to us to shoot the video with the marching band," said Karlson. A former member of the band himself, Karlson approached band director George Parks with the idea, who readily agreed. The lighthearted video, which features members of the Sixers dancing around in marching band uniforms, was recorded all in one morning session of band camp and two hours into the afternoon. Directed by Factor himself, the video has quickly become a YouTube hit and has also afforded the Sixers a unique opportunity to rekindle ties with their roots. "The song itself is about never growing up, and that's what UMass is all about, the whole Peter Pan thing."

In the meantime, the Sixers are in the midst of a nationwide tour that will have on the road through the end of February. They'll be stopping by their old stomping grounds on December 27th, where they will be playing at the Iron Horse in Northampton.

Faux four keeps 1964 alive for fans

By Rachel Dougherty
Collegian Staff

The Calvin Theater was alive with the spirit of 60s on Saturday night when 1964 the Tribute brought the sounds of the Beatles to the Northampton stage. Named the "best Beatles tribute band in the world" by Rolling Stones Magazine, 1964 the Tribute recaptured the experience of the early Beatles for the audience.

The performance was an imperfect but thoroughly enjoyable impersonation of the Beatles at their arrival in the States. The experience of the band members contributed to the quality of their imitation without detracting from the illusion of their performance. There were, however, a few noticeable differences in watching the twenty-year-old Beatles and their middle-aged counterparts.

It would, for example, be difficult to say that four 50-year old men in tight pants and mop-cut wigs capture the sex appeal of the Beatles in 1964. They had the mannerisms of the Beatles-Lennon's high-chested guitar style and weird wide-stanced leg bob, Ringo's goofy head-shake. They had the clothes, the moves, the Liverpudian accents. But when they asked the audience to take a gander at George's (Tom Work's) butt, the reaction was more amused chuckling than ecstatic cat-calling.

Vocally and instrumentally, however, Mark Benson, Gary Grimes, Tom Work and Terry Manfredi are as close to the original Beatles as imitation bands come. Benson was especially good as Lenin; his vocals on "If I Fell" and "I Feel Fine" were standouts of the evening. Grimes' voice was a bit tinny at times and prone to screeching on some of the higher numbers. It was his impersonation of McCartney, more than the quality of his vocals, that drew the audience into the illusion of 1964. From body language to witty banter, 1964 embodied of the touring atmosphere of the Beatles arrival in America.

The banter ran a little more corny than charismatic, but it appealed to what was generally an older audience at the Calvin Saturday night and instilled a deep sense of nostalgia in the performance. Watching 1964, it was easy to imagine what the Beatles might have looked like onstage together in their fifties, playing the old hits and joking with the audience about the old days.

Harder to imagine was that the old woman in the next row who fell asleep during intermission could've been throwing her bra at the real Paul, John, George and Ringo 40 years ago. Thankfully, in a theater where the average audience member was either over 40 years old or accompanied by an adult, everyone kept their bras on. The only point at which things got a little rowdy was during 1964's rendition of Twist and Shout, a clear crowd-pleaser.

For the most part, however, the performance was a classy tribute to the early days of the Beatles leading up to their 1964 world tour. 1964 the Tribute is distinct from other Beatles tribute bands in that it focuses on songs from the Beatles' early albums, with songs from Please Please Me, With the Beatles, A Hard Day's Night, and Beatles for Sale. Pop-infused love songs like "I want to Hold Your Hand," "All My Loving," 'If I Fell' and 'Can't Buy Me Love' dominated the evening. It was the sounds of the Beatles pre-acid: more pop and less of the psychedelic rock of Abbey Road and Sgt. Pepper.

1964 the Tribute has been performing since 1982 – as was announced during the show, the tribute band recently celebrated its 26th 'birthday'. The Ohio-based 1964 has performed at concert halls, universities, shows and fairs across the country, and been voted "Contemporary Music Artists of the Year" by the National Association for Campus Activities and "Campus Entertainers of the Year" by the Canadian Association for Campus Activities and it has even been to Carnegie Hall nine times.

Although they aim for authenticity in recreating the experience of the Beatles, 1964 the Tribute differs from the original band in a few minor respects, specifically in terms of sound quality and set length. Improvements in sound quality can be attributed mostly to the larger and better speakers available today – audiences at the original Beatles' concerts often complained of being unable to hear the music. 1964 also plays 45 minute sets as opposed to the Beatles' traditional 30 minute sets, and the tribute band was more than willing to perform an encore of Long Tall Sally. The Beatles never played encores.

Ultimately, the night wasn't so much about imitating the Beatles as about recapturing the feeling of the early Beatles for the older audience members and giving younger viewers a chance to see what the Beatles could've been like live.

This much can be said about Benson, Grimes, Work, and Manfredi: they take a sad song and make it better.

Raekwon and Sean Prince drop legendary beats in Northampton

By Steven Baum and Yoel Drachman
Collegian Correspondents

What happened in the Pearl Street Night Club in Northampton last Saturday night was the makings of legends.

In a venue smaller than the basketball court at UMass's new recreation center, two artists of legendary and epic proportions loomed larger than life over a crowd of true hip-hop fans. It was an event with intimate feeling; a feeling felt only when fans witness their heroes performing songs that have become anthems of an underground culture. For a few hours, gods of the rap game fed off the energy and raw emotion from the crowd, powerfully performing hip-hop classics, old and new. It was night of ecstasy and awesomeness for real fans of hip-hop. It was magical.

The opening act of the night, Hendersin, arrived on stage to meager applause, an appropriate response considering the set that followed. Performing songs from an apparently new mix tape, Hendersin's words could barely be understood as he rapped into the microphone. His sound was more (hip)-POP than hip-hop, sounding like almost every song looped on "hot" radio stations these days.

Halfway through the less-than-impressive set of unknown tunes, Hendersin took a break from his routine, exclaiming, "I love to freestyle. Somebody gimme a topic!" After hearing suggestions ranging from Nikes to geometry, Hendersin settled on the topic of ex-girlfriends. He struggled through a few lines of underwhelming rhymes before launching into what clearly seemed like a memorized verse. With the free-styling segment of his set completed, Henderson continued on with his songs before exiting the stage to more meager applause from the less-than-impressed crowd.

Then the real show began. Enter the first legend of the night: Sean Price.

As soon as Sean P took the stage, the entire crowd was lifted into one unifying, unwavering bounce that did not cease until Price was out of sight an hour later. He opened his set with "Operation Lockdown," the first single off his debut album "Nocturnal" by Heltah Skeltah. Price's verse was just as hard as the original was 14 years ago. P kept his energy up throughout the entire performance, rarely pausing to breathe, let alone communicate anything but his art with the crowd. Perhaps an ode to the time and situation of Price's early recordings, this show was strictly about his music; no gimmicks or marketing ploys, just real beats and lyrics. Price continued on, playing songs from his two solo albums. Using very few hooks and virtually no choruses, P simply spit verse after verse as if he couldn't stop. Even when the beats cut off, Price kept going, busting off a verse to no music as he walked off the stage to resounding cheers.

One anxious, nervous, long half-hour later, the headline act of the night finally emerged: Raekwon. The crowd erupted. Feeding off the incredible energy emitted from the audience, Rae proceeded to tear the house down like only he can do.

Raekwon wasted no time in dropping a classic song on his fans, as he began with the immortal "C.R.E.A.M." to which he wrote the first verse back in 1993. The harsh depiction of the realities growing up in the ghetto backed to a beautiful piano sample sticks with you no matter where you come from. The feelings that shine through the music are universal. An infinite well of classic songs to choose from, Rae had exactly two problems with his performance: that everybody who helped collaborate to write these songs was not present, and that the set could not have been long enough.

Highlights of the concert included the Wu-collaboration "Ice Cream," "Criminology," and "Rainy Dayz" from Cuban Linx I, all of which sport the classic Wu-Tang beats of the RZA. Also, an underrated classic "Can It Be All So simple," from "Enter the Wu Tang," made a much-needed appearance. After closing with the perfectly simple, yet brilliant two-note beat of "Incarcerated Scarfaces," just as quickly as he had gotten on stage, Rae was gone.

COURTESY MYSPACE.COM

Last Saturday night, Raekwon, Sean Prince and Hendersin performed at the Pearl Street Night Club in Northampton. Raekwon and Sean P were nothing less than memorable.

The crowd, from the beginning to the end of the show, seemed to move and bounce constantly, but Raekwon barely ever moved an inch. The message of his performance, and of the Wu-Tang way, however, was clear. "For all you who are down with the real, underground hip-hop," Rae would utter in between songs, "this is for you. For all the true underground hip-hop heads, let's keep it underground." That's exactly what he did: he gave a true, underground performance for the true underground hip-hop head.

As he exited the stage, fans rushed to the stage to slap hands with a living legend. With that, the night was over, the gods gone from their stage, and their performances engrained in the minds of the awed audience fortunate enough to witness legendary show.

'Christmas Carol' an early season hit

The brilliant mind behind "The Polar Express," Robert Zemeckis has teamed up with Disney to make yet another movie based on the famous Charles Dickens novel, "A Christmas Carol." This latest version has comedian actor Jim Carey in the lead role as Ebenezer Scrooge. Reviews have been mixed, but the new take on the classic story is definitely worth a watch

By Kate MacDonald
Collegian Staff

The old story starts off, "T'was the night before Christmas, when all through the house, not a creature was stirring, not even a mouse." For Ebenezer Scrooge, this sentiment could not be further from the truth!

Everyone, young and old, knows the story behind Robert Zemeckis' new 3-D adaptation of Charles Dickens' "A Christmas Carol" A mean, money hungry, old man Scrooge, is visited by four ghosts on Christmas Eve. His old partner Jacob Marley comes to warn him about what his night will hold, and he's followed soon after by the three ghosts of Christmas: past, present and yet to come.

Each ghost has a moral message for Scrooge, voiced by the hilarious Jim Carrey. Though Scrooge, through advanced 3-D technology, actually looks like an aged Carrey, the well-known funnyman also plays the parts of each Christmas ghost, a testament to his skills, as each character sounds vastly different from the next. The ghost of Christmas past reminds him of the fun Scrooge used to have in the English countryside, a story which turns sour as the miser becomes more involved with money and less taken by his own fiancée. Next, a bulbous ghost of Christmas present shows him the family life of his poor associate Bob Cratchit, whose son Tim is dying due, in part, to their lack of money. He also shows Scrooge his middle-class nephew whom Scrooge has rebuked, but who has found happiness and love without great wealth.

Finally, and most terrifyingly, the ghost of Christmas yet to come appears as a sort of grim reaper, and shows Ebenezer his future if he does not change his money grubbing ways. Though at an old age already, will Scrooge have the time, or even the heart and desire, to change his ways now?

This story has been adapted in so many different ways; it has been an opera twice, featured in many television shows, and adapted countless times by film directors ranging from a traditional setting to "Mickey's Christmas Carol" of 1983. It's been shown in multiple languages worldwide. That being said, Zemeckis' version is one of the best adaptations out there, most definitely the best modern one showing this approaching Christmas season.

Zemeckis' success can be attributed to the use of 3-D technology, which the director has used before, most notably in his 2004 "The Polar Express". Even though not all U.S. movie theaters support the technology needed to show a movie in 3-D, the versions being shown in 2-D are still visually sound. This new type of animation shows its characters and settings in immaculate detail and gives humanized gestures and movements to even the most pointless of background characters. Any audience member will find themselves forgetting that this is, in fact, just an animated film.

Though the movie has received mostly mixed or average reviews, it took number one at the box office last weekend, its opening weekend. The story, unlike many other adaptation plots, stays very true to the original novella, with Carrey touting it as a "classical version of 'A Christmas Carol'."

Its only main problem is the fact that it, as an animated flick, is being advertised as a children's movie. Make no mistake, there are many elements in "A Christmas Carol" not for the faint of heart. There will be parts that will make you jump out of your seat, and others that will make your heart race with fear. The grim reaper's black stallions take to London's streets, street urchins become monster-like, and a gruesome ghost's body parts fall apart. In short, parents should not bring very young children to this movie. They think they'll leave the movie learning the true meaning of Christmas, but in reality they'll leave the theater spooked and ready for a good week or so of bed-wetting.

Older kids and adults alike will definitely appreciate the visual effects, which include flying around London and restoring dilapidated mansions to their glory. Anyone already excited for Christmas will find solace in this new version of "A Christmas Carol." It almost makes ABC Family's countdown (which began this week) to their Christmas countdown, "25 Days of Christmas" seem a little less ridiculous. Not quite, but almost.

UMass closes season in Boston

By Pete Vasquez
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts rowing team will return to Boston for the Foot of the Charles Regatta on Saturday as its fall season comes to a close. This time, UMass won't be competing against the elite rowers in the world.

The Minutewomen will feature their strongest Freshmen 8 along with their Varsity 4 on a course very similar to the one they rowed in mid-October for the Head of the Charles, when they went head-to-head against Olympic national teams. The length of this race is very similar to the Head of the Charles, if not a little shorter. The Foot of the Charles, which solely features collegiate rowers, will begin at MIT's boathouse and end just past the boathouse of Harvard.

Much like last weekend's race at Dartmouth, this is primarily a novice race. UMass assistant coach Alex Binkowski, who handles the novice squad, hopes to have three Novice 8 boats compete in the Charles, if a recent flu outbreak doesn't decrease that number to two. Yet regardless of how many boats make it onto the water, the Minutewomen are primed and ready for their last race of the season.

"We're as prepared as we're going to be," Binkowski said. "Each boat will have their own game plan. The first boat is going to be aggressive and attack. The pressure is not on the second and third 8's as much. Most of the novice year is about experience but I'll look at the first 8's results, comparing them with our standard rivals."

As for the two Varsity 4 crews, UMass coach Jim Dietz says that his focus is a little different for this race.

"It's just an end of the season race, low key," Dietz said. "Some of the [rowers] are really competitive and want to get out there every week."

The Minutewomen head to Boston for the Foot of the Charles Regatta on Saturday at the end of fall season. The Minutewomen will feature their strongest Freshmen 8 and their Varsity 4 in this weekend's race.

The varsity participants for this race have for the most part volunteered to travel to Boston. They are there to get additional work in, as well as, compete.

UMass will not send its best sets of four, along with its usual lineup, but will instead incorporate the buddy-boats system, where the women pick their own groups to row together.

Three of the Minutewomen won't travel with the team, but will instead participate in an identification camp in Princeton, N.J. Elizabeth Euiler, Chelsea Wakeham and Emily Boucher will race in a 4.5k singles race as they each pursue a spot on the U.S. national team.

"They're hoping to perform as best they can," Binkowski said. "It's an opportunity for them to see how they stack up against the best in the country."

The Minutewomen may carry extra motivation this weekend to represent their coaches well. Dietz will be inducted into the National Rowing Hall Of Fame, along with 17 other inductees, according to a recent announcement. Having coached the Minutewomen for 13 years, as well as being the only rowing coach in school history, Dietz has 11 Atlantic 10 Championships under his belt. He is also a member of seven World Championship teams.

After this weekend's events, the Minutewomen will begin a new training program for the spring season in hopes of bringing another conference championship back to UMass.

UM prepares for Vermont

By Daniel Gigliotti
Collegian Staff

With rain and wind predicted to consume the pitch on Saturday, the Massachusetts rugby team prepares to weather the storm that is Vermont and move one step closer to the New England Championship, and a birth in the national tournament.

The No. 25 Minutemen (9-1), who are the top seed in the NEC tournament, are now winners of five straight matches having persevered through the New England Rugby Football Union tournament and won handily against Southern Connecticut last Saturday, 27-0, in their quarterfinal match.

A win against the fifth-seeded Catamounts would pit UMass in a championship battle against little known Stony Brook or No. 1 Middlebury, the team it triumphed over to grab the NERFU Championship.

The Minutemen were on the right end of a lopsided match, last weekend, in which they scored four second-half tries to rout the eighth-seeded Owls (7-2).

Vermont is likely to present tougher competition to the Minutemen than Southern Connecticut did. Vermont averages a hefty 37.2 points per match this season while giving up 11.1, yet have seen its numbers fall since the playoffs, averaging 20 points and giving up an average of seven in four games (3-1).

Although its offensive numbers dropped recently, Vermont's tenacious attack has remained formidable. The Catamount's two losses this season came at the hands of conference rival Middlebury, including an opening day loss to the Panthers on Sept. 19 and another in the NERFU semifinals on Oct. 31, but not without resistance.

"They had Middlebury up against their own goal-line for most of their match," UMass coach Al Baker said.

Both games were decided by six points and played on Middlebury's home turf. The two losses are the only blemishes on Vermont's record this season. The Catamounts managed to bounce back nicely following defeat as they routed Boston University, 47-5, on Nov. 1 to capture the fifth seed in the NEC tournament. It then topped Buffalo State, 46-21, in the quarterfinals on Saturday.

Vermont brings a sizable squad into Amherst on Saturday. Baker believes his team will match the Catamounts in stature and gain an advantage in its speed.

Last week, the Minutemen were a bit giddy on the onset of the match, forcing the action and making unsound plays that led to turnovers. Baker urges his ruggers to let the game come to them as they will look to find a weakness in Vermont's attack.

"We're going to continue to pressure Vermont with our forwards," Baker said. "[We want to] try and get their backline to commit to forwards' attack and create opportunities for the backs."

The Catamount's offensive assault tallied eight tries last Saturday. However, Baker is not worried about matching their scoring as UMass managed 32 points per game this season. Its attack is split evenly between its backs and forwards on 54 scoring tries this season.

If Baker and his team are nervous about anything, it is the adverse weather forecast. With a 90 percent chance of rain and a lot of wear and tear on their home-field in the past month, the Minutemen hope that their terrain will not be an impediment in the four matches they will host this weekend.

UMass will play two games on the weekend. If it loses, it will play on Sunday for a chance to make the national tournament this spring. With a win, the Minutemen will take on the winner of Stony Brook and Middlebury for the Northeast Championship.

UMass handled Middlebury on Nov. 1 for the NERFU championship, 34-3, and is prepared to face a revamped Panther attack.

"I'm sure Middlebury wants another shot at us and will prepare better," Baker said.

UM alum will enjoy playing in Israel

Tony Gaffney might not be a Los Angeles Laker, but that doesn't mean his career is over. Same goes for several other Massachusetts men's basketball players.

In fact, many of them play overseas and make a pretty good career for themselves. In the past few years, Italy and France have been some of the more popular places for former Minutemen. Recently, that pipeline from Amherst is leading to Israel.

It started last year with Dante Milligan and continues this year with Gaffney and Stephane Lasme.

Milligan played for the Israeli league (known as the Basketball Super League) with Kiryat Ata before getting waived due to the team's financial problems. Lasme will play for BSL champion Maccabi Tel Aviv and Gaffney will bring his game to Hapoel Galil Gilboa.

I was fortunate enough to cover that league when I went there last semester to study abroad and intern for an Israeli newspaper so I have an idea of what they're getting into.

First of all, Israel is one of the safest places in the world to play basketball even though the news sometimes makes it seem otherwise. Several European countries have riots breakout in the middle of the game while the American players worry about being mugged.

Adam Miller

Israel has security at every major public venue and crime is very low compared to most foreign countries, so the chance of anything happening that would compromise an athlete's safety is minimal at best.

It is also a warm environment (both in weather and getting along with teammates) for American players, especially with the work ethic that Gaffney and Lasme have. Besides Maccabi, nearly every non-Israeli on the rosters are American and everyone speaks English so there's not a lot of culture shock to get used to.

Unlike many of the European leagues, there aren't a lot of Israelis competing for roster spots to begin with. Only three active players are actually good enough to play in Euroleague or the NBA (Omri Casspi, Lior Eliyahu and Yotam Halperin) and none of them are playing in their home country this year.

Most of the Americans were decent college basketball players and just missed making the NBA so the competition is at a pretty high level. Gaffney is joined by the BSL's top player, Jeremy Pargo (Gonzaga) and Brian Randle (Illinois), who has a similar gritty style of play the former Minuteman has.

Lasme has more than enough company to help him grow into a better player despite coming in at a time when Maccabi is rebuilding its roster. He is surrounded by players who know what it takes to be successful in Israel such as David Blumenthal, who played for Tel Aviv when it won the Euroleague Championship in 2004, and Doron Perkins, who arguably was one of the best point guards in Israel last season.

Even if not all the names are recognizable, they share a similar motivation to these former UMass players who help make the Israeli league as competitive as it is now.

That makes it very easy for players like Gaffney and Lasme to get playing time compared to Europe because native players receive preferential treatment over anyone from the U.S. This is why a solid NBA player like Josh Childress didn't put up great numbers for his first year in Greece.

Israel has also helped players succeed as NBA players, which is the ultimate goal for both Gaffney and Lasme. One of the recent success stories from Israel is Will Bynum.

The Georgia Tech point guard went undrafted out of Georgia Tech in 2005 and played a brief stint with the Golden State Warriors and signed with Maccabi the very next season. His performance in Israel got him a job with the Detroit Pistons and he currently averages 11 points per game coming off the bench.

Israel isn't the best place for everyone. The top would-be high school senior Jeremy Tyler chose to go to Israel for two years with the goal of going No. 1 in the 2011 NBA Draft instead of finishing high school and playing in college for a year.

He scored two points in his first three games playing for a team called Maccabi Haifa, but instead of taking the opportunity to mature overseas, he has been isolated by his coach and teammates for being too arrogant and lazy.

However, neither UMass player has any sort of resemblance to Tyler. Both played four years of college basketball, weren't highly recruited out of high school, but worked hard enough to receive NBA consideration.

There's not one Israeli who would complain about sitting on the bench behind a player like that.

UMass heads to Boston, looking for NCAA berth

By Jeffrey Engmann
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts cross country teams will head to Boston this weekend to compete in the NCAA Regional Qualifier. Both meets will feature some of the top teams in the northeast region, as each team will attempt to earn one of two automatic bids up for grabs this weekend that would solidify their spot in the NCAA championships.

The race on Saturday comes after a two-week layoff for both UMass teams, and men's coach Ken O'Brien felt that his team utilized it well.

"We've had 10 days to this point," O'Brien said. "It gave us a chance to shake the cobwebs and rest for a few days. And then I thought our team had a real good week of practice."

The Minutemen last competed Oct. 31, in the Atlantic 10 Championships, where hard running earned the team a second-place finish.

Last year, the Minutemen turned in a strong performance at the qualifiers as they placed seventh out of a field of 32 teams. Among those that made significant contributions in last year's race were seniors Jonathan Pierce and Andrew Mulvaney. Both were top five finishers for the Minutemen. Junior Kevin Johnson was among the top five as well.

Iona won last year's race, and will look to repeat this weekend.

Both UMass teams are already familiar with the course, as they ran in Boston (Franklin Park) on Oct. 10 when they participated in the New England Championships.

The Minutewomen are also looking to make some noise this weekend. They have been on a late-season surge, in large part due to the improving help of their runners, as well as the instrumental contributions from A-10 Freshman of the Year Courtney Baldwin. The team is coming off perhaps its best performance of the season, where it finished third in the A-10 Championships, the program's highest finish since 2000.

This weekend the Minutewomen will look to improve upon the 22nd place finish they earned in last year's race.

After the A-10 Championships, UMass coach Julie LaFreniere expressed satisfaction in knowing that her team battled through a course which was extremely muddy and damp. She noted that the course sucked a lot of energy out of her team and expected it to be easier for them to run in this weekend's race.

However, rainy weather appears to be following UMass. After a relatively sunny week, it is expected to rain both on Friday night, and the entire day on Saturday in Boston. Nevertheless, unless conditions are severe, the race will go on.

The Minutemen will start their meet at 2:30 p.m., and the women's race will take place at 3:30 p.m.

Minutewomen host BU in opener

By Mike Mastone
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's basketball team will attempt to start its season off on the right foot this Sunday as the team plays host to Boston University in their 2009-10 season opener.

The Minutewomen have been hit hard at the guard position due to graduation and injuries, and are without two of their leading scorers from last season. With a team full of roles yet to be defined, UMass coach Marnie Dacko is starting the season without a starting lineup set in stone. The eight-year coach has decided to enter the season opener with a nine-player rotation.

"We have an offense geared around five people scoring on the floor, with a lot of bench participation," Dacko said. "So when we're going (eight or nine) people deep there are a lot of people getting playing time, and we have to refine that. We're a very fit team, so we really want to keep the game up-tempo and move and share the basketball. And the bottom line is play solid defense."

Dacko also said the team worked hard to improve its defense over the preseason, citing it as a main weakness from a year ago. The Minutewomen allowed 67.8 points per game last season, the second-highest mark in the Atlantic 10. Only Saint Louis had a worse mark, allowing teams to score at a rate of 68.5 points per game.

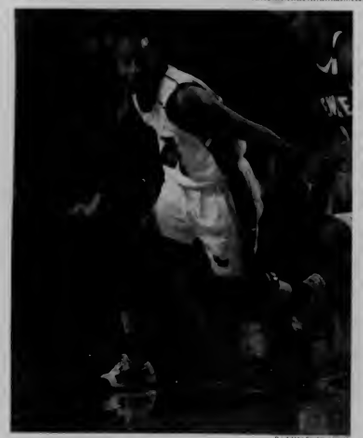
"I think the big thing is that we want to play defense," Dacko said. "No matter what BU runs against us, we want to get stops. And I think that is our focus point, getting stops and really rebounding the basketball and having that ignite our offense."

Like UMass, BU has been hit hard by graduation. The Terriers lost all four of their double-digit scorers from last season, most notably 2008-2009 America East Player of the Year Jessyka Burks-Wiley.

Their best returning scorers are senior Aly Hinton and sophomore Alex Young. As a junior, Hinton averaged 8.0 points per game and 4.9 rebounds per game, while Young finished her freshman campaign with 4.1 points per game in 30 appearances. Hinton can also be a force on the defensive end, as she finished tied for second on the team with 13 blocks last season.

"We're excited to be home at the Mullins Center," Dacko said. "We scrimmaged Sacred Heart here on Sunday, so we're looking to make improvements this week. [Boston University] is predicted as one of the top teams this season. They have a seasoned club and they're strong. I just think we have to take it a game at a time, but certainly it's nice to get one at home and an early win."

In last year's match up, Boston University beat UMass, 82-75, in Amherst and held the lead for all but 11 seconds. The Minutewomen took an 11-10 lead with 15:09 remaining in the first half, but the Terriers then tied the game at 13 and never looked back.



Stefanie Gerardot led UMass with 23 points and went 3-for-5 from 3-point range, while Diatiema Hill set a new career-high with 15 points in 30 minutes of action.

The Terriers open their season tonight at Kentucky, while Sunday's match up is the first of the season for UMass. Tipoff is set for 2 p.m. at the Mullins Center in Amherst.

Dacko wants more rebounding

By Steven Levine
Collegian Staff

Last year was considered one of the strongest years the Atlantic 10 has ever seen from its women's basketball teams. Massachusetts, however, did not factor much into that truth, as it finished 11th in the conference. With a new approach for 2009-10, UMass coach Marnie Dacko expects to surprise a lot of people.

Statistics show that the Minutewomen were outdone offensively by their competition last year, but not much can be said about their defensive efforts, either.

Last year, UMass' competition owned the rights to superior rebounding, stealing and blocking. However, Dacko saw great improvement on the defensive side of the ball this preseason, and is convinced that the offense will feed off of that.

"The bottom line is playing solid defense," Dacko said. "No matter what BU runs against us we want to get stops. Our focus point is getting stops, rebounding the basketball, and having that ignites our offense."

Rebounding is one category the Minutewomen kept pace with last year when their opposition averaged one more rebound per game. The loss of last year's leading rebounder, Teya Wright, may appear to hurt UMass' ability to grab rebounds, but new additions along with experienced big women could prove otherwise.

Incoming freshmen include guard Dee Montgomery, forward Shakia Robinson and center Jasmine Watson. The 6-foot-1 Robinson and the 6-foot-3 Watson will give the Minutewomen size in the frontcourt and Dacko hopes the two will help rebounds become a strong point in the stat sheet.

New offense features strong post

For the second time in as many years, UMass will enter the season under a new, up-tempo offensive system. Last year the Minutewomen began their season inexperienced with their offensive strategy. This year is different.

"We understand our offense much better, we're much further along at this point in time [than we were last year]," Dacko said.

The offense will look to distribute the ball to all five positions on the court in order to get balanced scoring. Dacko believes that bench participation will be important, as well as high fitness levels for her players.

"Right now we're a very fit team," she said. "We want to keep the games up-tempo and move the basketball around."

One of the most important aspects of the offense this year will revolve around the post, where Dacko believes her team is greatly improved. Nicole Jones, a 6-foot-2 center, will play a larger role in the post this year and should see significant increases in her minutes and points. The additions of Robinson and Watson will also play a big impact in the post position, as their strength and size should be hard to defend.

Kristina Danella was one of the few bright spots for the Minutewomen last year, as the forward was second in the team in points and named to the A-10 All-Rookie Team. Her prolific scoring and impact on the court is making her a young leader for the Minutewomen.

The loss of star guards Sakera Young and Stefanie Gerardot to graduation has the Minutewomen stretched fairly thin at the one and two spots. Of the 11 players on the roster, six are slotted as guards. It is clear that a lot of mixing and matching will be going on to start the season, as Dacko will search for the right backcourt to complement the frontcourt.

Minutemen host UNH at home

Maxwell Spahr/Collegian

By Jay Asser
Collegian Staff

Another chapter of the rivalry between the Massachusetts hockey team and New Hampshire will be written this weekend when the two programs meet for the 100th and 101st time at the Mullins Center.

The Wildcats have dominated the all-time series, holding a 75-17-7 record against the No. 14 Minutemen dating back to Feb. 13, 1926.

"It's been historically a terrific program," UMass coach Don Cahoon said about UNH. "They've been as consistent and proven as anyone in college hockey and they've done everything but win a national championship."

The Minutemen are coming off a sweep of Niagara in a home-and-home series where they won 4-1 and 4-2 in consecutive nights. Facing the Wildcats (2-5-2, 2-1-1 Hockey East), UMass will look to improve on both its 6-1-0 overall record and its 3-1-0 Hockey East record.

UNH, meanwhile, has struggled out of the gates this season, dropping its first two contests of the year and losing three of its last four.

The Wildcats, however, have not had the easiest schedule as they've faced tough opponents in No. 1 Miami (Ohio) twice, and conference foes Boston College and UMass Lowell.

Though winless against out of conference teams, UNH has fared well for the most part in the Hockey East with victories against Northeastern and Maine.

Cahoon knows that the Wildcats' record isn't indicative of their team and feels that with its back against the wall, UNH will come out fighting.

"You have to look at where their losses are coming from. Any of those [results] could happen to any of the good programs in the country," he said. "I expect you're going to get a very formidable opponent, someone that's extremely prepared, kind of anxious and playing with a sense of urgency because of their record."

Unlike the past, the Minutemen and Wildcats will play for the first time in one venue on back-to-back nights. Cahoon and UNH coach Dick Umile organized it, knowing that the travel to and forth to the two schools is difficult. Both coaches were reluctant to continue a home-and-home series and instead would like to be better situated in one location for both games. Next year, the Wildcats will play host while the Minutemen will travel to the Whittemore Center.

Despite the two home games, Cahoon doesn't feel UMass holds much of an advantage.

"It's nice to play at home, you would like to think it gives you an edge, an extra skater with the crowd, but the truth of the matter is that the game is played between the glass and I don't know how much of an advantage it really is," Cahoon said.

The Minutemen will try to break through with a win against the Wildcats after posting a 0-5-2 record in the last seven meetings. Though the three contests last season all went to overtime, UMass couldn't pull out a victory. Two of the games ended in draws, while UNH took the lone win.

As close as the games were last year, Cahoon knows that they could have gone either way for either team.

"Sometimes it's a bit of puck luck. All three games we could have won, and they could have won all three games," he said. "We have to do a little bit more than they do. We have to a better job of making it difficult on their goaltending and do a better job of defending and winning some crucial battles at crucial times in the game. That can create an edge in itself."

Mass Attack offense effective on power play

By Nick O'Malley
Collegian Staff

With a scoring average of 3.86 goals per game, the Massachusetts hockey team boasts the top scoring average in the Hockey East and the fifth best mark in the nation. The bulk of the success, though, comes from UMass' success on the power play.

The Minutemen have been lethal with the man advantage so far this season, converting 30 percent of their power plays into goals, a mark that's good for sixth best in the country.

The offensive outburst thus far has brought fantastic results. After sweeping Niagara last weekend, UMass stands with a record of 6-1, 3-1 in Hockey East, and the No. 14 ranking in this week's national rankings.

UMass coach Don Cahoon said his team has had so much success on the power play this season, "because we have good players."

Cahoon offered praise for his power play unit: James Marcou, Casey Wellman, T.J. Syner, Martin Nolet and Justin Braun. With Syner out for last weekend and this upcoming series, Cahoon has had to plug in sophomore Danny Hobbs into Syner's spot at left wing.

The results, though, were unchanged during last week's series, which produced eight goals, one of which came on the power play. For the season, the production of the top group has been unprecedented. Of the top six spots in the conference in power-play scoring, four belong to Minutemen.

"I've never seen a good team not have good players," Cahoon said. "I've seen a lot of teams play up to their ability, but you're only going to be a very good team if you have very good players."

UMass' "Maroon" line of Marcou, Wellman and, with Syner injured, Hobbs has been particularly devastating. Marcou, the Hockey East Player of the Month for October, is tops in the conference and tied for sixth in scoring nationally with three goals and 10 assists on the season. Behind him, in a tie for third in Hockey East and tied with 10 others for 18th in scoring nationally is linemate Casey Wellman, who has four goals and seven assists.

Matt Irwin, meanwhile, has been the most prolific defenseman on the power play for UMass. The sophomore has taken advantage of his deadly slapshot to accumulate a team-high five goals on the season, four of which have come on the power play. Nolet and Braun, meanwhile, haven't found the back of the net as often as Irwin, but have been key in moving the puck up and at the blue line, tallying six assists between them on the power play.

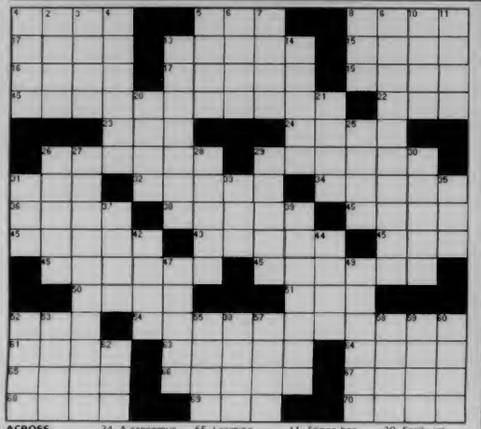
Battling bumps and bruises

While losing Syner is a major loss for the Minutemen, the return of junior Michael Lecomte in last week's series and junior Chase Langeraap for this weekend is a good sign for a UMass lineup that had been shuffled around in recent games.

Lecomte scored two goals in his first game back from injury while Langeraap looks to finally start producing after playing in only two games so far this season.

Still out for UMass is Rocco Carzo. The freshman was off to a hot start before getting injured. In his first five games, he has two goals and three assists.

Cahoon doesn't foresee many big lineup changes with players coming off of injury. Replacing Syner at the left wing spot will be Hobbs, who had a solid performance last weekend against Niagara.



Cahoon has originally slated junior Marc Concannon for the spot after a strong week of practice. But, after early struggles, Cahoon gave the spot to Hobbs, who has performed well so far. Langeraap is expected to return to his old spot in the line with Lecomte and Will Ortiz.

UM program aims to aid returning veterans

Veterans office vows resources for students

By Nina Heikkinen
Collegian Staff

This semester, student veterans at the University of Massachusetts have a new resource on campus to help them navigate their return to college life after military service.

In response to the requests of student veterans, a new office of Veterans Affairs has opened in the Whitmore Administrative building that is better equipped to serve the needs of a growing number of soldiers who are deciding to return to school after active duty in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Coordinator for the program Judy Gagnon described the office as a combination resource, referral and drop-in center for UMass veterans, with an emphasis on building and supporting the veteran community on campus.

Veteran Affairs works closely with local veteran affairs offices and offers referrals to counseling services, Gagnon said.

A certifying agent is also available to provide information and approve benefits that veterans are eligible for under the GI Bill, she added.

In order to help ease the transition back into civilian life, Veteran Affairs has developed a new one-credit seminar course, OASIS, for the spring semester.

The course, which is taught by a veteran, is designed to facilitate peer mentoring among veterans.

The GI Bill, which went into effect last August, provides education benefits for veterans with active service after 9/11.

"We work a lot with non-profits, VAs, any kind of questions they have if we don't have the answers to them, we'll find them," Gagnon said.

Currently, around 350 UMass students are receiving education benefits under the GI Bill, according to the University's GI Bill certifying agent Jeff Axton.

About 50 of those students are receiving referred benefits from a parent or spouse who had served in the military.

Gagnon said that there are already significantly more veterans at UMass than last year, and that number is expected to increase by as much as 30 percent each year as more soldiers return from active duty in Iraq and Afghanistan.

According to the U.S. Department of Veteran Affairs website, 4,942 benefit payments have been processed to date nationwide under the new bill.

Not only has the GI Bill increased the demand for Veteran Services on campus, it has also highlighted the need to increase awareness among students and faculty about the veteran presence on campus, Gagnon said.

"I actually got arguments from people saying there weren't any vets on campus, now I think there is a real acceptance [of veterans]," Gagnon said.

She also added that her office hosted a social at the University Club for faculty and staff last Thursday Nov. 12, in order to raise awareness about and Mass. State Representative Stephen Kulik joined the UMass Faculty Senate Nov. 12 for its regularly scheduled meeting to dicuss the University's budget and ways in which to seek alternative sources of revenue.

UMass Faculty Senate dicusses student financial aid, budget

By Matthew M. Robare
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts faculty senate held its 689th regular meeting Thursday, Nov. 12 and began with a visit by State Representative Stephen Kulik.

Kulik, vice-chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, was on the UMass campus for last spring's meeting, a time which he described as "really, really grim."

"I always take away some valuable insights and comments from this," Kulik said in his opening remarks.

Kulik began the senate meeting by reviewing the events of the legislative session of the current year, starting with Salvatore DiMasi resigning as Speaker and being succeeded by Robert DeLeo.

DeLeo, Kulik said, came in with an aggressive agenda mainly focused on ethics, pension and transportation reform, as well as efforts "to make sure we got a balanced budget in on time" for fiscal year 2010.

According to Kulik, balancing the faculty's agenda has thus far been very difficult.

He said that, between the House of Representatives finishing the budget and the Senate taking it up, revenue estimates by the state fell by about $1 billion.

That left a projected short fall of about $4 billion, Kulik said.

However, they were able to get the budget balanced with the aid of stimulus money from the federal government and the state's rainy day fund.

"We built up [the rainy day fund] in the good years of the economy to about $2.2 billion," Kulik said.

"We also did increase revenue by increasing the rate and expanding the scope of the state sales tax," Kulik said, referring to the fact that alcohol is now subject to the sales tax.

The General Court had a balanced budget by July 1.

However, state revenue decreased through the summer and they had to make $600 million in cuts to local aid and other social programs.

"It seemed like a good number to go on," Kulik said. "And it's looking like it was right."

"They solved our problem in fiscal 10," he added.

In fact, the state ended October with a $22 million surplus.

Kulik believes that is unlikely for state revenues to decrease more than they already have.

"I think we can be pretty confident we've hit the bottom of the barrel," he said.

Cinema hosts live talk with noted writer King

By Michelle Williams
Collegian Staff

Last Tuesday night, Amherst Cinema broadcasted the live feed of New York Times writer Janet Maslin's interview of Stephen King to a local audience.

The event began with a 30-minute introductory video of previous interviews the New York Times Style magazine has conducted of celebrities and famous personalities.

At 7 p.m., Gwen Philbrook of the Times welcomed the audience to the Times Talks LIVE, which was held at The Times Center in New York City in a sold out viewing room, and broadcast at arthouse cinemas and coffee shops around the country.

After the introduction, King and Maslin were welcomed on stage to rounds of applause from the audience.

Maslin opened the interview with a joke about how much the book weighed and King responded by advising her to not "drop it on your foot."

Maslin also spoke about the difficulties of leaving her home while reading King's novels, stating that she cannot put them down.

King's latest book, "Into the Dome," is a work that has been written and re-written since the 1970s.

A thriller set in a small Maine town, the work features more than 100 characters that interact with a supernatural force.

The town has a dome formed around it, which birds as well as military planes crashing into, while to the town people it merely seems that these incidents are happening for no reason.

Despite President Brack Obama being in office in the time period the book is set in, the plot touches on issues from the Bush-Cheney administration, as well as other issues dating back to King's first attempt at the novel three decades ago.

Throughout the interview with Maslin, King made jokes about his books, life, his previous history with drugs and alcohol, and married life.

The interview also touched on the issue of the battle between new technology and print edition books, discussing the introduction of the Kindle, Amazon's handheld screen that allows readers to download books onto a lightweight device rather than carrying around books for traveling.

Though many of his readers would like to download his new novel, they will be unable to download the Kindle version until Dec. 31, although the print increase sensitivity towards student veterans.

Although both Axton and Gagnon said that they had recognized improvement in the perception of veterans on campus, they still have student veterans coming into their offices talking about how they've been ignored by fellow students after revealing that they had served in Iraq or in Afghanistan.

"Some people don't want others to know that they are veterans because of the response that they get," Axton said.

According to Gagnon, there are already positive signs that the campus community is becoming more supportive of its veterans.

"There is a real sense of pride finally, which is very difficult on a very liberal campus," Gagnon said.

"People don't understand the difference between war and the warriors... [Now] we're treating these veterans [from Afghanistan and Iraq] a lot like World War II vets."

"We want to be a veteran friendly campus. That is my goal," she added.

Senate votes on new sources of revenue

But looking towards the future, Kulik said that the state still has a great deal of financial challenges to overcome, with the fiscal year 2011 presenting the most immediate challenges for legislators.

"We think it will be every bit as challenging, if not more so than fiscal '10 because we had the stimulus," Kulik said.

According to Kulik, without the federal money, Massachusetts will be have to make do with $1 billion less in fiscal year 2011 than fiscal year 2010.

Since the state cannot count on money from Washington, he said the state needs to generate new sources of revenue.

Kulik added that since the money for the budget comes from taxation, Massachusetts needs more people earning higher incomes and spending more.

In short, Massachusetts needs jobs.

"The best way to grow jobs in Massachusetts is to invest in education," Kulik said.

In addition, Kulik said that Massachusetts needs to be competitive with the rest of the country over the cost of living, which he also added is among the highest in the nation.

But to invest in education, reduce the cost of living and continue to pay for the social services many people remain dependent upon the financial security such services require, "We have to spend money we don't have," Kulik said.

The state can no longer use its rainy day fund in the future, Kulik said, adding that the funds are only available for the time being in emergency situations.

"If we dip below $500 million in our rainy day fund our bond rating will go down and our cost of borrowing will go up," Kulik said.

One alternative according to Kulik would be through a revival of expanding legal gambling.

Kulik said that the Senate is ready to allow casinos and that Speaker DeLeo supports expanded gambling.

"I know that we are on a course to take up a serious expanded gambling bill early in the next legislative session," Kulik said.

However, he said that he is skeptical of casinos being a viable solution in the short term because of the lack of funding due to the bad economy.

Kulik suggested slot machines as a possible short term solution.

He also ruled out raising the income tax rate because of the unpopularity of the taxes issue with the voters.

A number of years ago, a referendum required the legislature to lower the income tax rate to 5 percent.

Currently it is 5.3 percent.

"There's a give and take with referendum politics," Kulik said.

After Kulik finished his remarks, the Senate returned to routine business.

The University's representatives reported that they are 92 percent ahead in funding from last year and that UMass has received $39 million in stimulus money.

During the meeting, the senate discussed financial aid for middle-class students, with the consensus being that students from high-income families do not need it and students from low-income families are already receiving adequate amounts.

Also on the meeting's agenda was plans for a "classroom building" to provide state of the art classrooms to replace cramped and crowded classrooms in older buildings.

The senators had also discussed shortening add-drop period because it can interfere with classes, and put two advising motions on the agenda for the next meeting set to take place in December.

The Faculty Senate also voted last Thursday to change the name of Commonwealth College to Commonwealth Honors College, create a new physics class and designate it as a Physical Sciences General Education class, and several other routine and procedural matters.

All motions carried with no opposition.

Soldier skips being deployed

Army specialist stays with child and faces misconduct charges

BY CHRIS METINKO
OAKLAND TRIBUNE

OAKLAND, Calif. — A 21-year-old Oakland, Calif., Army specialist who skipped out on her deployment date to Afghanistan has been ordered to remain on her base in Georgia for a review of "alleged misconduct," while her civilian attorney claims the soldier had no choice, with nowhere to keep her young baby.

Alexis Hutchinson was expected to deploy to Afghanistan with the rest of her unit on Nov. 5.

However, according to her attorney Rai Sue Sussman, after plans to place her 10-month-old son, Kamani, fell through, the Army insisted she still deploy.

Hutchinson, who joined the Army in 2007, was stationed at Hunter Army Airfield in Georgia in early 2008 and gave birth in January.

Just before her scheduled deployment, she went AWOL for less than 24 hours and returned voluntarily, her lawyer said.

"The day before she was forced to deploy, they told her you have a choice to make, but your duty is to get on that plane," Sussman said.

"She didn't have anyone to take care of her child. She thought they'd put her on a plane and take her child away."

Sussman said Hutchinson had intended to leave her son with her mother, Angelique Hughes, in Oakland.

However, her mother soon realized she was unable to take care of Kamani, while also taking care of her special-needs daughter, her ailing mother and her ailing sister.

In late October, Sussman said the Army told Hutchinson they would give her more time to find suitable arrangements for her child, but then earlier this month told her she would not get the extended time after all and would have to deploy.

Sussman said when Hutchinson returned to the airfield she was arrested by the military on Nov. 6, and the Army placed her son in child protective services.

However, Hutchinson's mother has since flown to Georgia to pick up Kamani and brought him back to Oakland.

Sussman claims Hutchinson currently is confined to the airfield in Georgia, where she faces up to a year in jail.

However, an Army spokesman denies Hutchinson is under any confinement and has instead been ordered to stay on the installation until her commander can review her situation.

"Just days prior to her scheduled deployment, Specialist Hutchinson's commander received information that indicated that Specialist Hutchinson had engaged in misconduct," Fort Stewart and Hunter Army Airfield spokesman Kevin Larson said in a statement.

"Due to the fact that Specialist Hutchinson has a small child, her deployment was delayed so that the command could ensure Specialist Hutchinson's child was cared for and so that she could meet with legal counsel."

Larson added Hutchinson's commander is re-examining whether or not she will be able to deploy because her case could present a hardship.

In a release put out by Sussman, Hutchinson is quoted as saying: "It is outrageous that they would deploy a single mother without a complete and current family care plan. I would like to find someone I trust who can take care of my son, but I cannot force my family to do this. They are dealing with their own health issues."

Hutchinson is not a conscientious objector seeking to avoid deployment, her lawyer said.

Smith harnesses solar energy

BY BOBBY HITT
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The roof of Smith College's campus center will soon be producing its own energy.

Solar panels are to be mounted atop the campus center in the upcoming weeks, according to a press release from Smith released Nov. 6.

Community Energy Incorporated will be giving the college an initial investment of $240,000 for the solar panels and installation, as well as operating and maintaining the panels. In return, Smith will be paying a locked rate for 20 years for the energy Community Energy provides.

"Solar uses no fuel, therefore no greenhouse gases are produced," said Jay Carlis, Vice President of sales and marketing at Community Energy.

"There are two other benefits for Smith," said Carlis, "the locked rate hedges against future fuel spikes and the upfront investment from Community Energy gives the University access to clean energy without taking money from their already tight budget."

Carlis however would not make public the rate given to Smith.

Community Energy has had past relationships with Smith, selling them renewable energy certificates. Community Energy approached Smith with the idea to build the solar panels.

"We operate and maintain [the solar panels]," said Carlis, "It is our responsibility to make sure the panels are producing at an optimal level, this is the only way we get paid."

One hundred thirty solar panels will be placed on the southwest side of the roof, above the Campus Center Café and the Carroll Room. The construction can be watched on a live webcam from the Smith College website.

The solar panels will be gathered and installed by Borrego Solar Systems, Inc.

JOHN HWA/COLLEGIAN

Smith College will be mounting 130 solar energy panels on top of its campus center in the upcoming weeks allowing the college to produce its own clean energy.

Borrego Solar Systems operates in both the public and private sector, and works to create grid-connected solar electric systems, according to the company's website.

The company has installed solar panels on apartments in California as well as several schools including University of California at Berkeley.

Borrego Solar systems also boasts being Massachusetts' largest solar provider and has been in operation since 1980.

The system will reduce carbon emissions by 238 metric tons over the next 20 years, according to Smith's press release.

When asked whether the type of collaboration between Community Energy, Borrego Solar Systems and Smith College was possible at the University of Massachusetts, Carlis stated, "Absolutely, assuming UMass has room on roofs or available land that would support solar panels." Critics of Solar energy point out that the production of solar panels creates carbon gas emissions.

"Huge amounts of fossil fuel are used in the manufacture of the [solar cells]," according to a report by Treehugger.com, a site dedicated to environmental awareness.

"The waste metals not used in production also present their own disposal problems," the article stated.

The Treehugger.com article also pointed out that toxic glues and materials are used in the installation of the solar panels.

Proponents of solar energy point to the fact given by the Treehugger.com article that solar energy is still in its infancy and more effective ways of disposing the waste can be found creating even more green jobs.

The cost of solar panels is increasingly going down as the efficiency of the solar panels is rising.

Last Jan. 20, German researchers built a solar cell that could harness 41.1 percent of the solar energy shining on the cell, according to GreenTechnica.com, a site dedicated to the green technology.

The process of turning solar energy into electricity is known as the photovoltaic process. Silicon based solar cells absorb the sun's light.

The solar energy excites the electrons in the solar cell and electricity is produced, according to a simplified explanation by national-renewable-energy-laboratory-learning.gov, a site dedicated to education on green energy sources.

Solar accounts for less than 1 percent of the world's electricity generation, according to a CNN report.

Smith College did not give comment on the solar panels in time for press.

While admitting to having a Kindle himself, King explained that he prefers print editions of books.

For the last 30 minutes, King took questions from audience members.

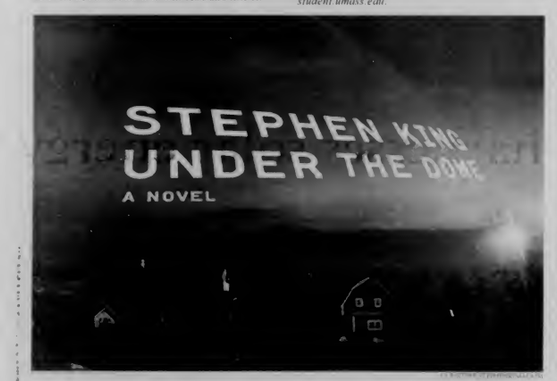
Most wondered if another graphic novel from the "Dark Tower" series would be published, which King assured them he was currently working on, though with no set publishing date.

Others asked for advice for upcoming writers.

He recommended that they send their works to a variety of different authors and publishers, stating that one never knows who will read and like it.

The most basic advice for writers, King said, is to "write about what you know."

The final question came from an 8-year-old boy, who asked what inspired the author to write "Eyes of the Dragon."



King responded that when his daughter was 11-years-old, she asked him, "Would you write something that isn't too scary that I could read?"

King responded, "I'll try," and based the novel on her favorite topics of dragons and fantasylands.

At 8:30 p.m., the audience left the theater with a general air of fulfillment. One woman remarked that the quality of the interview was surprisingly good.

Amherst Cinema plans to screen future TimesTalks LIVE events if they continue after the pilot season.

Michelle Williams can be reached at mnwilliam@student.umass.edu.

During the event, King discussed his latest work "Into the Dome," a story set in a small Maine town which King said he had been working on for about 30 years.

Witness alleges payoffs in student court case

BY GEORGIA GARVEY
CHICAGO TRIBUNE

CHICAGO — Two witnesses in an investigation by Northwestern University journalism students told investigators they were paid, prosecutors alleged Tuesday.

The witnesses, Tony Drakes and Michael Lane, told investigators with the state's attorney's office that they were given money in the hopes that their statements that would help free Anthony McKinney, convicted of the shotgun-slaying of a guard in 1982, prosecutors said in court filings Tuesday.

"This evidence shows that Tony Drakes gave his video statement upon the understanding that he would receive cash if he gave the answers that inculpated himself and that Drakes promptly used the money to purchase crack cocaine," the filing reads.

Professor David Protess of the university's Medill School of Journalism called the latest filing by the state "so filled with factual errors that if my students had done this kind of reporting or investigating, I would have given them an F."

Protess, director of the Innocence Project, acknowledged cab fare was paid but denied it was in exchange for Drakes' statement implicating himself in the killing. In Lane's case, Protess said he could not discuss any off-the-record interviews, even to refute their existence.

The document also argues the students acted as investigators, not reporters, and as such aren't afforded protection from turning over their notes or off-the-record interviews.

The court filings Tuesday were part of a series of hearings aimed at determining whether or not Northwestern will have to give the Cook County state's attorney's office material like students' grades and off-the-record interviews. The students' efforts have won a new day in court for McKinney of Harvey, Ill., and prosecutors say they are seeking the information in preparation for that event.

The Innocence Project in 2003 took on the case of McKinney, convicted of killing a guard in suburban Harvey. The students say they uncovered evidence — including Drakes' statements and corroborating evidence — that show McKinney has been falsely imprisoned for 31 years.

Last month, the state's attorney subpoenaed the students' grades, notes and recordings of witness interviews, the class syllabus and e-mails they sent to each other and to Protess.

Northwestern has turned over some documents, but is fighting the effort to get grades and grading criteria, student evaluations, syllabuses, e-mails, unpublished memos and interviews not conducted on the record, or where witnesses weren't willing to be recorded.

In the latest filings, prosecutors allege that Drakes told them that, after a 2004 interview with the students, someone on the investigative team paid a cab driver $60 to take Drakes from the interview site, a park in Swansea, Ill., to a gas station two miles away.

That amount was more than the fare and tip, and the leftover cash — $40 — was given to Drakes; he used it to buy crack cocaine at a nearby crack house, the filing states.

Then-student Evan Benn, now a reporter and editor for the St. Louis Post-Dispatch newspaper, said he personally handed $60 in cash to the driver, an amount determined by an estimated fare the driver gave for Drakes' planned trip.

"We gave the money directly to the cab driver, told him not to give any of the money to (Drakes), and we got a receipt for that," said Benn. "It was all well-documented."

The state contends that there are enough questions with students' work that all of their material is required for investigators to make a fair determination of guilt or innocence. "In order to evaluate all of the evidence in context," the filing reads, "this court needs to have all relevant evidence — including evidence that may pertain to the team's bias, motive and interest — and not just the evidence that the school deems relevant."

Sally Daly, spokeswoman for State's Attorney Anita Alvarez, said the filing doesn't completely tarnish the students' findings, but it calls into question the reliability of many of their witnesses.

"Whether that proves guilt or innocence, it's important that we look at all of it," Daly said. "That's the purpose of the criminal discovery process."

Protess admits that the private investigator working with students had no journalism training, but he said he's had conversations with the man about why paying witnesses would be unacceptable.

"I also review all of his expense reports, and I would red-flag that in a heartbeat," he said.

According to Tuesday's filing, Drakes told the state's attorney's office that the students knew he was looking for money, and he knew they wanted help with McKinney's case.

After the investigator paid the cabbie, the driver recorded the transaction in his log, Tuesday's filing states. Possibly suspicious, he wrote: "Detective gave me 60...told me to give him 40, gave me 60... gave him change." The "him" refers to Drakes.

According to the filing, the driver's log notes the fare for the two-mile trip to the gas station — normally about $6 — was $20. "The driver did not claim his $14 tip; he was worried it was drug money," the filing states.

The Innocence Project claims to have helped free 11 wrongly convicted people in the last 10 years.

The cases included the Ford Heights Four, exonerated of the 1978 murders of a suburban couple. Another case centered on Anthony Porter, who came within 50 hours of execution in 1998 before he won a reprieve.

Examination of the Porter case by an investigative reporting class taught by Protess helped trigger the Innocence Project's creation.

About a year ago, the Innocence Project published evidence that may exonerate McKinney, who was 18 at the time of the murder.

Police questioned McKinney after they found him running near the crime scene. The young man said he was trying to escape gang members and investigators initially released him. But a teenage witness came forward, saying he saw McKinney shoot the guard, Donald Lundahl, in south suburban Harvey.

Students interviewed that witness, who recanted his statements and told them police had beaten the testimony out of him. They also found two admitted gang members who say they were, in fact, chasing McKinney on the night of the killing in retribution for damaging of one of their cars.

In addition, students conducted a videotaped interview with a man who claimed to have been present during the murder who said McKinney was not there.

After amassing that evidence and more, students turned it over to the Center on Wrongful Convictions in Northwestern's law school, which in turn filed a petition on McKinney's behalf in Cook County Circuit Court.

Cook County State's Attorney Anita Alvarez has previously defended subpoenaing those records, arguing that if students wanted "to put (themselves) into the role of an investigator, then you need to turn over whatever your notes are."

Officials with the state's attorney's office also said there could be a bias on the part of students seeking better grades by finding more witnesses.

Northwestern and its attorneys respond by saying the investigation should be treated as one conducted by journalists. They said the county already has all on-the-record information, including interviews and copies of audio and video tapes.

A series of overturned convictions in Illinois prompted then-Illinois Gov. George Ryan to enact a moratorium on executions in 2000 and grant clemency to all death-row inmates three years later. Judge Diane Cannon accepted the prosecutors' filing and scheduled the next hearing in the case for Jan. 11.

Pelosi just perfect

Alex Perry

In the spirit of the historic transparency and bipartisanship that the current administration has given us, I wanted to spend some time focusing on how we got to this point as a country, by attributing our successes to all of the great work done by Nancy Pelosi as Speaker of the House. Her work has been so great that it will no doubt ensure Democrats retaining their majorities in Congress in 2010.

Since the day Pelosi became Speaker of the House in 2006, she has accomplished many notable things in addition to being the first woman to hold the position. One such accomplishment I am sure will never be matched by any conservative, is the record approval ratings she has guided Congress to. On multiple occasions under Pelosi's leadership, she has managed to get the approval rating of congress to 18 percent, both in May of 2008 and August 2007 according to Gallup.

For most politicians, accomplishing these kinds of historic approval ratings would be enough, but not for Nancy Pelosi. On the day of her acceptance speech as Speaker, before she even knew she would lead an historic Congress, she set mile high goals for herself and her congressional counterparts. I feel it doesn't get talked about enough and I would like to examine just how successful Pelosi has been as Speaker using her own lofty standards.

One of the most important things Pelosi thought to say during her acceptance speech in 2006 was the following, "I accept this gavel in the spirit of partnership, not partisanship, and I look forward to working with you Mr. Boehner and the Republicans in the Congress on behalf of the American people." She clearly set out to accomplish "partnership" with Republicans and she has quietly accomplished this goal.

Needless to say, both parties have come together as one under Pelosi and had it not been for her leadership that vote would never have been possible.

Take House Minority Leader John Boehner's veiw of her speech from September 28, 2008 when she tried to gain support for a vote on the Wall Street rescue plan: "I do believe that we could have gotten there today, had it not been for the partisan speech that the Speaker gave on the floor of the House." What has all the bipartisanship from Pelosi led to? Look no further then the recent health care reform passed by the House supported by a whopping one Republican. Needless to say, both parties have come together as one under Pelosi and had it not been for her leadership, that vote would never have been possible.

But Pelosi's leadership is not defined by bipartisanship alone. Her successes reach far beyond that. She also demanded fiscal responsibility from Congress after the fiscal recklessness of Bush and his fellow Republicans. She said this in her acceptance speech, which I believe she has stuck to 100 percent since the day she became Speaker: "After years of historic deficits, this 110th Congress will commit itself to a higher standard: pay as you go, no new deficit spending. Our new America will provide unlimited opportunity for future generations, not burden them with mountains of debt."

Clearly you can see Pelosi and her fellow Democrats knew the historic deficits of Bush were far too big for our future generations to handle. She knew spending money we don't have was an unsustainable policy. That is of course why she made it one of their top priorities to balance the budget.

When voters think about their decisions heading into the upcoming elections of 2010 and 2012, the fact that Pelosi has overseen Congress pass legislation that has led to the largest deficit of all time should be ignored. Voters should also ignore the fact that the deficit is now so big that it is larger then all the deficits of past administrations combined. These facts should be ignored because this clearly isn't Pelosi's fault at all. She set goals for herself and her Congress, and she has worked her hardest to meet all of them.

As anyone can see, my disdain for Pelosi in the past has clearly been unwarranted. My attacks on her work as Speaker have always been without merit. She wanted Congress to work together and she has accomplished it. She rightfully attacked Bush for deficit spending and she has worked daily to shrink it. Congress' record approval ratings under her leadership only reinforce that point. It is uninformed idiots like me who still attack her, even knowing all of these feats, that don't get that this is the direction the country wants. This is a moderate country leaning left. Pelosi understands that, and her leadership is going to ensure majorities in 2010 and 2012 for Democrats.

Just cover your mouth, please

Alyssa Creamer

Quit coughing on me.

I'm so serious. Within the past month, it seems as though a very lofty percentage of our campus community has come down with some kind of sickness. And regardless of whether it is of the seasonal or swine variety, all of it needs to end.

Don't look at my column like that. Believe it or not, mommy wasn't lying all those years.

There are a lot of measures students can take to avoid getting sick, or if a student is sick, to speed up the recovery process for all our sakes.

Here is my first proposition. Today, Monday, Nov. 16, there will be seasonal flu shots being given in the University of Massachusetts' Campus Center auditorium by Maxim Health Systems. Shots are being administered from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. and no appointment is necessary. Perhaps the only snag would be that it costs 30 dollars, but many students' health insurance companies will cover it.

Don't like needles? No one cares. Suck it up and use it as an excuse to make that boy you like hold your hand. A shot is very brief pain in comparison to the agony of waking up with a face full of flu for a week. Plus, this is the third clinic Maxim has held at UMass this semester, and no one has died yet from the treatment. You'll be okay.

My second proposition is that students start looking at their diets. According to Medicinenet.com, it has been scientifically accepted that Vitamin C, which can be found in most fruits and vegetables, boosts immune system function and can help lessen the harshness of illness.

So today, after you eat an orange or eight while you sit patiently in the campus center auditorium waiting to get your walk-in flu shot, stop by every other bathroom in your sight and wash your hands. At the very least, use one of the dozens of anti-bacterial soap dispensers on your way from class to class. Use common sense before meals. If you're putting food in your mouth, you probably want to have clean hands so that you don't also put the flu in your mouth. And if the flu is around, fluids are always a good idea.

Disease is lurking on doorknobs and desks, and I'm of the opinion that it floats idly in the air until an unsuspecting student walks through and it enters his or her orifices.

Don't like needles? No one cares. Suck it up and use it as an excuse to make that boy you like hold your hand.

I'm really not sure if germs are capable of floating, but it doesn't matter. Sickly people are spreading their sick everywhere. Use soap to protect yourself.

If this attempt at preventing illness from hitting you means nothing because, oh yeah, you're already sick, then hear me out on this. Stay the heck away from everyone until you're better.

On Oct. 27, Dr. Jean Kim, the Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs and Campus Life, sent out a memo to UMass students stating, "In order to maintain a healthy campus during this challenging flu season, we are urging you to take care of yourself, and to protect other members of the campus community by staying home if you are sick."

The University is making it easy for you to stay home, too. Acknowledging that students are here to learn and desire grades reflective of their efforts, the University has asked professors to create leniency in attendance policies to accommodate students who are staying home sick. Students are not even required to provide a note from a health care professional citing they are too sick to attend classes, but rather, professors are expected to believe students out of good faith.

Additionally, dining services has been allowing students to take wicked sweet packages of food to their sick friends, to both help the sickly get healthier with a nutritious care package and prevent that person from infecting others in the dining halls.

If you're a big ole' Mr. Gullible, then you probably believe that if a certain percentage of our campus gets the flu, the University gets shut down. The University has no intentions of waiting for some hot spike in the sickly to shut down the semester. It is far more likely, given that we live in New England that a snowstorm or even a heat wave shut the school down, than of an entire body of students getting a collective "physical health day." Besides, as suggested above, the University is pretty much giving students free "get well soon without penalty" days.

The point is, in the past three weeks, I've been coughed on about a hundred times. For a few days during each of these three weeks, I have either had a fever or a cold or some combination of the two, which screams I had the flu. For those of us with weaker immune systems, I am speaking out. I'm not playing the survival of the fittest game, because I already know I'll lose. I want other people to play the, "I'm not an inconsiderate jerk who runs around coughing and sneezing my nastiness into innocent faces," game.

It doesn't matter if you're a stranger or my best friend: If you're sick, you're getting temporarily shunned. Get well soon.

Republicans need to learn their lessons

The results of the off-year elections could only be described in the most charitable sense as a bloodbath. Republicans had the trifecta in Virginia, claiming the position of governor, lieutenant governor, and attorney general, simultaneously winning the governorship of New Jersey, a state so blue that Obama carried it by 15 points during the 2008 election.

John Greenberg

And in the 23rd congressional district of New York, Doug Hoffman lost to Democrat Bill Owens by roughly 5 percentage points which coincidentally is just about the same percentage of votes Republican candidate Dede Scozzafava recieved. But there is more to this race than initially meets the eye.

Hoffman's story was remarkable. Rejected by the Republican establishment when seeking the nomination, Hoffman refused to relent. Running under the banner of the Conservative Party, Hoffman had a meteoric rise in two months, drawing star endorsements, a flood of grassroots donations and single-handedly causing the implosion of the Scozzafava campaign.

Hoffman's message was clear: The Republican Party had made a mistake by nominating an ACORN-endorsed tax-raising candidate with more in common with House Speaker Nancy Pelosi than House Minority Leader John Boehner. In the weeks that followed, Hoffman continued his attack; Scozzafava was not a conservative, and thus should not be supported as such.

Scozzafava's decline in the polls was swift and merciless. Her support flooded to Hoffman, leaving her trailing both candidates by double digits. At the last minute, she suspended her campaign, although her name still appeared on the ballot.

But the damage had already been done. The Republican Party had given Dede Scozzafava almost $1 million for her campaign, and zero to Doug Hoffman. Hoffman's attention had been focused almost solely on Scozzafava, while the Democrat Bill Owens remained largely above the fray, an unnoticed and almost unimportant player in the very real fight for the heart and soul of the Republican Party.

However, it was what happened during Scozzafava's suspension that came as a real shock. After days of deliberation, Scozzafava emerged from her quarters and endorsed Owens. Conservatives were baffled.

Hoffman had a meteoric rise in two months, drawing star endorsements, a flood of grassroots donations, and single-handedly causing the implosion of the Scozzafava campaign

Hoffman had won his case. But it was too late. The campaign was almost over and the party had expended its time, energy and money exposing a charlatan within. The real opponent in the race had undergone practically no scrutiny, had not been the target of a focused and coherent campaign and hadn't been defined in the minds of the voters.

What happened next was predictable. Scozzafava played the spoiler and did her ideological compatriots proud. She handed Bill Owens the victory. In a race that was Hoffman's to win, the diagnosis of how he lost is easy to decipher due to two main factors: money and focus.

Instead of supporting a candidate who would lock up the conservative vote, draw independents and provide a clear and stark contrast to the opposing Democrat, the Republican Party establishment gave Democrat-like candidate Scozzafava nearly a million dollars. Putting that money in Hoffman's hands would have resulted in at least a couple additional percentage points due to name recognition and messaging.

Instead of uniting behind the clearly qualified candidate, the Republican Party establishment set up a scenario where Hoffman had to spend time illustrating Scozzafava's phoniness instead of displaying the clear contrast between him and Owens. This was the biggest mistake they made. Hoffman was forced to waste money, time and ads on a candidate that never had a chance of winning instead of clearly delineating the differences between him and the liberal. This factor alone was worth three or four percentage points.

The lesson derived from this seemingly insignificant race is clear. The Republican Party has to return to its roots if it wishes to have any chance at victory again. A solid conservative will win again and again when supported and endorsed by the party. Voters want to see options; they want to see differences among the candidates, not left and far-left. So give them what they want; a conservative and a liberal to choose from. Haven't we learned the lesson from the 2008 election?

When faced with a committed liberal and a wishy-washy "moderate," the people chose somebody who at least knew what he believed in. Selecting a qualified committed conservative will guarantee the conservative vote, draw independents, and present a clear contrast for voters to choose from. The Republican Party had better learn from this experiment, because if they ignore the lesson of NY-23 they face perennial extinction and irrelevancy.

Offbeat Doughty charts a wild course

Former frontman lets his wit and penchant for poetry hold sway with Iron Horse audiences

By Rachel Dougherty
Collegian Staff

"Busting up a Starbucks" on the way to a Mike Doughty show is something every fan should do at least once. Fortunately, there is a Starbucks just one street away from the Iron Horse in Northampton, where Doughty played The Question Jar Show. Doughty, former front-man of the 90s alternative band Soul Coughing, played with fellow musician Andrew "Scrap" Livingston to a full house on Thursday night.

There's something completely real and unpretentious about The Question Jar Show. Watching Doughty and his friend Livingston onstage was like watching the guys from your favorite high school garage band – 30 years and seven albums later. There was no opening band, nor any big introduction. Doughty walked onstage, said hello and began playing "Tremendous Bruuettes" (a song that originally featured Dave Matthews, by the way).

The show focused on acoustic songs from Doughty's new album, "Sad Man Happy Man," and stripped down versions of songs from his solo albums "Haughty Melodic" and "Golden Delicious." There were also a few songs from Soul Coughing. Accompanied by Doughty on acoustic guitar and "Scrap" on cello and electric guitar, the songs felt very raw and highlighted the weird stream-of-consciousness poetry that is Doughty's music.

What's great about Doughty is that he doesn't seem to take his fandom, or himself, too seriously. When asked by an audience member whether he would play at a birthday or bar mitzah if they paid him, Doughty replied, "Yeah. What else am I gonna do, sit at home and watch TV? I play for my friends all the time and they don't give me shit."

The Question Jar Show gave Doughty a chance to showcase the offbeat humor and verbal wit that characterizes his music. At the beginning of each show, audience members are asked to write questions on slips of paper and put them into a big glass jar on the stage. At intervals during the show, Doughty and Scrap pull questions from the jar and use them as prompts for improvised stage banter. Questions ranged from "first kiss" (Doughty: "it happened") to what is the average person's nipple size.

"A nickel," replied Doughty, laughing. "Men's nipples, I'm thinking. Why am I thinking about men's nipples?"

The Question Jar Show largely featured songs from "Sad Man Happy Man." Released on Oct. 6 of this year, the album represents a return to the acoustic arrangements exhibited in Doughty's early work with Soul Coughing. Songs like "Lorna Zauberberg" and "(I keep on) Rising Up" were written for small clubs like the Iron Horse, and the crowd appropriately responded, with one attendee shouting out in reference to the album – "we're all buying to the new one."

"Excellent, you speak for the people," Doughty, said.

The Question Show was also a chance to hear some of Doughty's more commercial songs in their acoustic forms. Stripped of the heavy instrumentation and experimental voice layering, songs like "I Hear the Bells" and "Looking at the World from the Bottom of a Well" felt very raw and poetic, like spoken-word set to jazzy rock. It was easy to picture what Doughty, a former poetry major at New York's New School, must have looked like in his early days playing college music halls with a young Ani DiFranco.

Both "I Hear the Bells" and "Looking at the World from the Bottom of a Well" have been featured on major American television shows such as "Grey's Anatomy," "Bones" and "Veronica Mars."

Some of the best received songs of the night were from the 1996 album "El Oso," Doughty's last album with Soul Coughing. "Soft Serve" and "Circles" were beautifully performed to the delight of the slightly older Northampton crowd.

The only downside to the acoustic set was that the songs got a little repetitive as the night went on. Most Doughty songs seem to start with the same three guitar chords, something that seems masked on his albums. What didn't get old was Doughty's ironic self-awareness, which offset his music perfectly.

Toward the end of the show Doughty turned to the audience and announced, "We are about to play the fake last song. We will then pause, and turn in our chairs so our backs are facing the audience. You can applaud or not applaud. Either way, a minute later we'll turn back around with surprised looks on our faces and play two more songs."

The audience laughed, but when it came time for the real last song, everyone in the crowd was hoping it was another fake.

Rachel Dougherty can be reached at rdougher@student.umass.edu.

Musician Mike Doughty postulated on such topics as his first kiss and the average size of a human nipple during his performance Thursday night at Northampton's Iron Horse Music Hall.

'Coco' before the glitz

Iconic trendsetter gets the star treatment in biopic that delves deep into her troubled roots

By Lisa Linsley
Collegian Correspondent

We are all familiar with the Chanel logo, the iconic image of the two C's intertwined. Department stores internationally sell the famous Chanel #5, while the authentic handbags are sold at a price range that extends up to $3,500. As a brand, Chanel is inarguably an elite fashion label, and its famed designer, the late Coco Chanel, is a fashion icon whom many modern designers wish to emulate.

"Coco before Chanel" – or "Coco avant Chanel" since the movie is in French with subtitles – is a film of Gabrielle Bonheur Chanel's modest life before she became France's famous Mademoiselle. Written and directed by Anne Fontaine, the movie stars Audrey Tautou, who plays Coco Chanel. While during her 60-year-long career, she seemed to embody sophistication, class and affluence, Chanel's roots and her path to success is obscured by the fame she later achieved.

Fontaine's film documented Chanel's experiences growing up in an orphanage with her sister, Adrienne Chanel (played by Marie Gillain), because their father had left their family. Years afterward – due to the fact that her father never returned for her – she and her sister emerged from the orphanage, both intent on becoming self-sufficient. After finding jobs as seamstresses for performers and singers, they began to perform songs at a local bar. Specifically, they performed Qui qu'a vu Coco (Have You Seen Coco) which is how Chanel earned her nickname.

Chanel actually aspired to be an actress, although her talent as a seamstress was recognized from the beginning. Chanel crossed paths with French socialite Etienne Balsan (Benoit Poelvoorde) and quickly thereafter became his live-in mistress. Through their association, she met many wealthy women who compliment her on her hat-making skills.

During a time in France when every woman was dressed from head to toe in loud feathers, laces and restricting corsets, Chanel wore wearing black pants or simple solid color dresses. She did this at first due to living in poverty, but continued because she didn't enjoy France's current style. She also became a vociferous critic, claiming that the hats were too big and feathery, the makeup too thick and bold and the corsets too restricting. In one scene, she told an upper-class woman to lose the feathers in her hat and to forget the corsetry.

Aside from compliments on Chanel's straw hats and scenes of her sewing – as well as a happy-ending when she put on a fashion show of the clothing she has created – much of "Coco before Chanel" focused on the Mademoiselle as a female in a male-dominated world. Her choice to abstain from marriage and to favor her career was viewed by contemporaries as controversial. However, during this time, issues of love and marriage were handled with triviality. Chanel found herself treated like nothing more than a sex object by Etienne before falling in love with Arthur "Boy" Capel (Alessandro Nivola).

Because Chanel never married, she was viewed as a feminist for her time. Throughout the film she claimed she had no interest in marrying anyone. While she had opportunities to marry, that would have solved her money issues, she opted never to do so. She later famously opined that, "There have been several Duchesses of Westminster. There is only one Chanel."

Chanel also revolutionized the feminine ideals of her day, which seems fitting given her overall rebellion nature. This was gauged early on, when she stole fancy dresses after being fired from her job. This rebellion was indicative in her designs. The style in France appropriately demonstrated the lack of power women had at the time. Their corsets were as restricting as their husbands and their feathers and makeup covered their bodies. Chanel started out using mostly menswear to create her styles.

Chanel famously said, "Simplicity is the keynote to all true elegance." She left her styles simple, comfortable and revealing. She left the woman in the clothing the main focus, rather than the clothes.

"Coco before Chanel" helps foster a better understanding of the value of Chanel's viewpoints during a time in France where most women were not radical or rebellious. But more evidently, "Coco Before Chanel" strips the legend away from the icon, revealing a woman of depth, soul and above all – keen fashion sense.

Fresh and green off the farm

Although it is a cool and rainy November morning, local farmer John Spineti is still at his stand at the Amherst Farmer's Market tending to the many people looking to purchase some of his renowned potatoes. With rows of potatoes at the table in front of him, he happily assists any and all customers, and it is obvious that he knows what he's been talking about – he's been growing fruits and vegetables since 1940.

Spineti, a former professor at the University of Massachusetts and a local community college with a doctorate in chemical engineering, has taught classes on chemical engineering, computer science, chemistry and math while simultaneously farming during the summers. These days, though, he is focusing his all efforts on his lifelong passion for farming.

Spineti grows almost any vegetable one could want, including potatoes, tomatoes, eggplant, peas, radishes, corn and edible soybeans (edamame). He also grows fruits, including pears and raspberries, among many others. Emerging from a family of farmers, he has well over 60 years worth of farming experience. Mostly known to locals for growing "beans, eggplant and all sorts of peas and berries," as he explains, he estimates that about 90 percent of what he is harvesting currently is potatoes, so they are his main focus at the moment.

He doesn't focus much of his time on winter crops. "I can still harvest eggplant and peppers at this time [late fall until early winter.] And potatoes can last for months after they are harvested. Growing potatoes extends the season. I can get them until December," he says.

Potato season, he clarifies, is late June until November, but carries into December due to their ability to last for quite some time after being gathered. "You need varieties," he says, motioning toward the purple, gold, fingerling and other various types of potatoes neatly placed before him in small green crates.

Spineti is a man ahead of his time, as his farming has remained organic since he began. He has never used pesticides or herbicides on his crops and has it would seem predated the organic movement by years.

He views pesticides and herbicides as harmful to all aspects of the farming process.

"It's suicide for the farmer and long-term suicide for the person eating the crops," he says after mentioning how something must be fundamentally harmful if a farmer must wear a facemask to use it on their crops. He explains how the liver is the accumulating organ for all pesticides and how, throughout his lifetime, he has seen three fellow orchardists die from liver cancer.

"Organic" has become a keyword for many consumers as of late, but Spineti appears to be much more modest in his constructs of what food should be and should not be without overly publicizing it. He is a staunch believer in organic farming but does not plaster it all over his stand to attract more customers, as some farmers tend to do. He simply farms as he sees fit for the sustainability and health of himself, his fellow farmers, consumers and the environment – a noble act, indeed.

His favorite potato dish? Spineti likes to keep it simple, with potatoes roasted with olive oil and garlic. For knowing so much about them, it is comforting to know that his favorite way to enjoy this food is in a very simplified manner of cooking it, allowing the taste of what he has worked so hard on throughout his life to truly be appreciated after a long day's work.

Danella, defense lifts UMass

By Neil Carroll
Collegian Staff

In the first game of the 2009-2010 campaign for the Massachusetts women's basketball team, sophomore Kristina Danella hit three free throws with 17 seconds left in regulation in order to send the game into overtime and give the Minutewomen a chance to win against Boston University.

"I was pretty nervous, I'm not going to lie," Danella said. "But that's the spot I want to be in. I want to be on the foul line, and I wanted the chance to tie it for the team at that point."

Danella, the leading scorer for the Minutewomen with 21 points, pump faked a three and sacrificed a clear 3-point attempt by jumping into her defender while shooting, in order to draw a foul. Last season as a freshman for the Minutewomen, she tied a school record by hitting a team-leading 58 3-pointers.

The sophomore had made a 3-pointer earlier in Sunday's game, but decided that she had a better chance to spur UMass to victory at the foul line.

"The free throws were huge," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said of her forward. "She came up on the line and iced three, and that gave the team confidence to go into overtime knowing that we could win the game."

Throughout the game, Danella was guarded tightly by the BU defense but was still able to get around her defenders and into the lane. She got to the foul line 14 times in the game, but it was not only her offense that stood out.

"She did pass up some perimeter jumpers in exchange for trying to penetrate into the bucket," Dacko said. "But she had some key rebounds down the stretch."

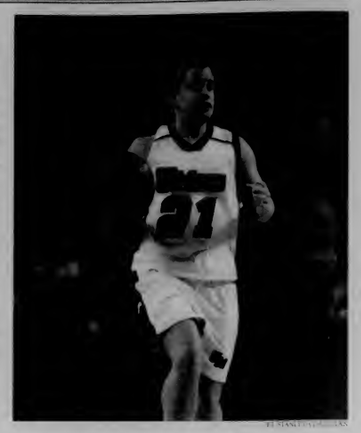
Danella, who averaged six rebounds per game last year, had eight boards in the home win.

Defense does it all

Although it was Danella's three free throws that tied the game late for the Minutewomen on Sunday against the Terriers, even the leading scorer for UMass pointed out that it was the team's defense and rebounding that won the game.

"We just needed stops on defense," said Danella. "In the first half and early into the second half we were struggling, but once we got stops on defense it carried over to the offensive side."

The Minutewomen were able to limit the Terrier's Ally Hinton to 13 points in 43 minutes through a rotation of three forwards on defense. Nicole Jones, along with help from freshmen Jasmine Watson and Shakia Robinson, pestered BU's frontcourt.



Jones finished the game with three blocks, four steals and nine rebounds to add to her 13 points. Meanwhile, Robinson pulled down six rebounds in the game and Watson had three emphatic blocks in just 15 minutes of playing time that set the tone defensively for UMass.

"I think that we had to make the adjustments defensively to try and stop them because we were giving up too many easy looks," Dacko said. "When we came out, they were going by, and when we came off of them they were hitting 3's. So I think that it was just that we grinded it out and stayed with it and I'm just really proud of the way the kids finished the game."

The Minutewomen defense continuously jumped entry passes intended for BU forwards Hinton and Kerry Cashman, forcing the Terriers to shoot from outside. UMass's Jones Robinson and Watson also worked well by communicating with each other on defense.

For the game, the UMass defense forced 23 turnovers from the Terriers, and also held BU to making only 1-of-8 shots in the overtime period.

a pass tipped at the line of scrimmage and picked off by JMU's Jakarie Jackson on UMass' following offensive possession.

On the third play of UMass' third offensive possession, Nelson again fumbled the ball, but the defense didn't have a chance to stop the Dukes as Jamaris Sanders, who forced and recovered the fumble, returned the ball 38 yards for a touchdown and a 10-0 lead.

"They were definitely trying to grab at the ball but I know I can protect the ball," Nelson said.

The Minutemen scored on their next drive on a 16-yard run by Jon Hernandez at the start of the second quarter. The score cut the Dukes lead to three until JMU's redshirt freshman quarterback, Justin Thorpe, took a quarterback keeper in from 21 yards out to bring the lead back to 10. Thorpe finished the game 8-of-13 for 120 yards passing and with 89 rushing yards on 20 carries.

Nelson (115 yards, one touchdown on 18 carries) redeemed himself three minutes, 25 seconds left in the third quarter, with a six-yard run into the end zone to bring UMass within three again at 17-14. The touchdown came off of a forced fumble by Tyler Holmes that was recovered by Eric Dickson on UMass' 23-yard line. Havens then engineered a 12-play, 77-yard drive that resulted in Nelson's score.

"I knew that my teammates were depending on me so I just wanted to come back in the game and try to go as hard as I can," Nelson said.

Neither defense would break for the remainder of the game, especially UMass,' which shutout the JMU offense after the 4:03 mark in the second quarter.

The Minutemen found themselves in decent field position with just under six minutes remaining in the game after a 30-yard punt by the Dukes' Matt Goff gave UMass the ball at the JMU 46-yard line. The Dukes defense would force a three-and-out. Morris, facing a fourth-and-three elected to punt the ball back to James Madison and hope his three timeouts remaining and his defense could give the offense another chance.

"We thought about it. It was about fourth-and-four and we decided to punt it and pin them in deep with the three timeouts, the defense playing well," Morris said of the decision to punt. "The idea was to pin them in deep and we did that."

The defense did get the ball back to the offense, but later than Morris had hoped as JMU ran off 2:24 from the clock before punting the ball back to UMass. The Minutemen were unable to move into Armando Cuko's field-goal range after starting the drive at their own 28-yard line with 1:20 left on the clock.

Senior running back Tony Nelson didn't start the final home game of his career on the right foot. Nelson, who fumbled on the first offensive play from scrimmage and again later in the first quarter, found himself once again surrendering carries to redshirt sophomore Jon Hernandez.

In the second half, though, Nelson returned to form, finishing the day with 18 rushes for 115 yards. Such numbers were par for the course on a rain-soaked Saturday afternoon that ended with three players gaining over 100 yards rushing and virtually no offense through the air.

Unfortunately for the Massachusetts football team (5-5, 3-4 Colonial Athletic Association), two of those players were James Madison quarterback Justin Thorpe and running back Scott Noble as the Dukes' (5-5, 3-4 CAA) ground game could not be stopped en route to a 17-14 loss by UMass.

Heavy rains were already pounding onto the turf at McGuirk Alumni Stadium by kickoff as each team's running game was called to carry their respective offenses.

UMass averaged more per rush (4.7) than JMU (4.1) on the day, but were hampered by early turnovers and failed to produce a sustained drive. The Minutemen rushed 34 times for 159 yards rushing. Meanwhile, the Dukes consistently pounded the ball for the entire game, running it 52 times for 212 yards.

The rainy conditions put a stopper on any attempts to establish a consistent passing game. With the first quarter seeing only two completed passes, quarterbacks Kyle Havens and Thorpe combined for 18 completions and 208 passing yards.

In the end, all of the factors surrounding Saturday's game played into the Dukes' hands. JMU, which leads the conference in rushing attempts, utilizes three different running backs and Thorpe, who is primarily a running threat, to pound the ball. On the season, the Dukes have averaged 44 rushes per game, compared to 17.6 passing attempts per game.

UMass, meanwhile, is in the middle of the pack in the CAA in terms of rushing, averaging 37 rushes per game.

In addition to experience with run heavy offense, the Dukes have also spent more time playing in the rain.

"All season we've been playing in the rain, so we're kind of used to it," Thorpe said. "Unlike most teams, we practice outside in full equipment all week, so it really prepares us for these games and it shows."

While the Minutemen were limited in terms of their ability to utilize the passing game, UMass coach Kevin Morris said that his team wasn't hampered by having to lean on the run, even when playing much of the game with a deficit.

"Well we weren't that far behind. The running game kept us right in it, we were running the ball well at those points in time," Morris said.

Dukes coach Mickey Matthews seconded Morris' thoughts on UMass running attack, giving credit to Nelson.

"I knew we'd struggle to tackle [Nelson]," Matthews said. "He's a back of a back. He's the best back in the league and we struggle to tackle him because he's a good player."

Playing from behind

While JMU never had a significant edge in terms of offensive performance, UMass failed to produce a clean drive early on in the game due to turnovers, forcing the Minutemen to spend almost the entirety of the game playing from behind.

According to Morris, his team's loss was not a result of a lack of production in the rainy conditions, but the team's early turnover issues.

"Tony rushed for over 100 [yards] so I don't think the conditions were so much of a factor as much as it was just inconsistent play," Morris said.

Nelson's fumble on the first play from scrimmage was just the beginning of UMass' turnover woes. On the ensuing drive, Kyle Havens' pass was tipped at the line of scrimmage and intercepted by the Dukes' Jackane Jackson. Then, on the third drive for the Minutemen, Nelson was stripped once again. Jamaris Sanders forced and recovered the fumble and ran 38 yards for the score, putting UMass in a 10-0 hole.

"It's a typical CAA football game. If you turn the ball over, you're going to struggle winning," Morris said.

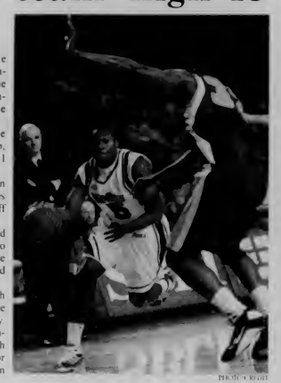
UMass' big men, Sean Carter (four points, five rebounds 26 minutes) and Hashim Bailey (eight minutes, zero points), could not help Harris out on the offensive against UCF. Kellogg used an 11-man rotation to try and wear down the Knights and to generate scoring chances.



"I was hoping we would wear them down a little bit," Kellogg said. "The point guard did a great job, really controlled the game and dominated the play. I was impressed with how they played everybody."

Along with Vinson and Riley, forward Sampson Carter got his first collegiate start, playing 16 minutes and scoring three points, while Javorn Farrell came off the bench and added nine points and five rebounds.

"I was pleased with their effort and their energy and attitude," Kellogg said. "I'm not sure they did enough to put us in a position to win. I'm going to try to get these guys better. We are trying to build for this year and build it for the next two, three, four years from now."

It was important for the freshmen to play in such a big game, as UCF drew nearly 9,000 people for the school's second largest home crowd in school history. Marcus Jordan, Michael Jordan's son, played 11 minutes in his first collegiate game, scoring no points with two rebounds. side, the Minutemen worked hard from the beginning of the extra period until Boehm was able to find the back of the net as well.

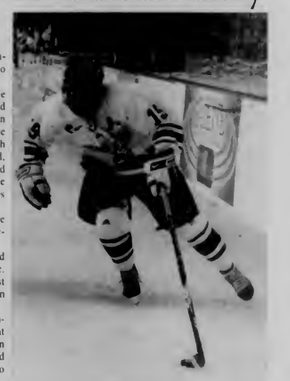
UMass had two early scoring chances in the first period after UNH's Damon Kipp was called for charging 53 seconds into the match and then again for hooking 6:26 into the period, but were unable to capitalize on either opportunity. But with less than four minutes remaining in the first period, Michael Lecomte rifled in a goal off a rebound from an Ortiz to put the Minutemen up 1-0. The goal was Lecomte's third goal in as many games since returning from a back injury.



Just over two minutes later, UMass would make it 2-0 after Hobbs found Justin Braun for his second goal of the game.

The Wildcats would tie it at two in the second period after goals by Steve Moses and LeBlanc. Moses would get UNH on the scoreboard first when he got the first shot past UMass' Dainton 10:27 into the period.

Leblanc would do the same after strong penalty kill after a Michael Marcou boarding call that resulted in a two-minute penalty. After Dainton made three saves on the penalty kill, Leblanc fired a shot that found its way past UMass' goaltender to even up the game.

UMass returns to the ice next Thursday when they travel to Vermont for another Hockey East matchup.

It was no different over the weekend as the Minutemen were outscored 4-2 in the second period despite outshooting the Wildcats, 32-22.

"We worked our butt off and had nothing but a tie for the period to show for it," Cahoon said after Saturday's loss. "I think there was a real sense of urgency and the guys did a good job of changing the momentum of the game. With all that taking place, it still ended up an even period because we gave up two goals."

Clean skating

The weekend also featured some relatively penalty-free hockey with only a minimal amount of penalties whistled.

Though UMass averages five penalties per game and forces opponents into seven penalties, the penalty box remained vacant for the most part against UNH.

"Well because we've gotten off to such a good start on the power play, teams have gone out of their way to stay out of the penalty kill with us," Cahoon said.

The two teams combined for a total of seven penalties over the weekend and could not capitalize on the limited power-play opportunities.

"I haven't been in a series in 15 years where there's only been seven penalties called," Cahoon said. "That's not a knock on the referees, that's just the way the games were played."

Moving forward, lack of penalties won't help the Minutemen as they boast one of the top power-play units in the Hockey East.

UMass will look to get back on track with a win when it heads on a three-game road trip beginning Thursday against Yale.

into our next game."

The turning point of the game was when BU's freshman guard, Caitlynn Moran, fouled out. Going into overtime, Moran had 20 points, most of which served to stifle any UMass comeback. She also already had four fouls, though, and the Minutewomen knew that one more would put her on the bench.

"I told Danuema [Hill] to go at her because she was hurting us," Benton said. "Once she fouled out, we knew that was the game for us."

Sophomore center Nicole Jones nearly registered a double-double for the Minutewomen, finishing with 13 points and nine rebounds. The biggest impact she provided, however, was in the blocks and steals categories, where she added three and four, respectively.

"I need to stay positive and keep myself up so my teammates can feed off my energy," Jones said. "This is a great start for the rest of the season. Hopefully it will set a good tempo [for the games to come]."

One concern Dacko had coming into the game was how her team would defend BU's bigger players in the paint. Terrier forward Aly Hinton, a dominant force in the paint as well as from beyond the arc, was kept to a relatively low 13 points.

"She's a 3-point threat and she displaces us inside," Dacko said of Hinton. "We're lean and long but we don't have the girth. That was a fear coming in was how we were going to defend her."

Fortunately for UMass, BU could not take advantage of various opportunities to put the game out of reach. Instead, the Minutewomen kept the game within striking distance and grinded their way into overtime.

"I'm happy for our players. They played so hard together [in practice], they were tired of seeing each other and they couldn't wait for the first game," Dacko said.

UM falls to UCF in '09–'10 season opener

By David Brinch

Four of the five freshmen made their collegiate debuts against Central Florida Friday night, but Ricky Harris' team-leading 15 points were not enough, as the Massachusetts basketball team lost its first season-opener since 2002, 84-67.

The Minutemen attempted a school-record 38 3-pointers in the game, including 25 in the first half and 13 in the second half, and only made 12 of them. UMass could not string offensive opportunities together, going just 33 percent from the floor while the Knights shot 55 percent on the game.

"Coming in [to halftime], I didn't realize we had taken 25 3-pointers in the first half," UMass coach Derek Kellogg said after the game. "I don't think I had really been with a team that had taken 25 in a whole game before. So we decided at halftime to stress to take [the ball] to the hole. Early on, we did a better job (in the second half). But, I guess we took 13 more in the second half. So we took 38 3's, that's a lot of 3's. I think we have to do a better job of getting to the free-throw line and getting into the defense."

Along with Harris, who scored in double-figures for the 69th time in his career (15 points on 5-of-15 shooting), freshman Freddie Riley came off the bench and added 12 points, including four 3-pointers in 17 minutes. Redshirt junior forward Anthony Gurley had 14 points off the bench, while freshman Terrell Vinson had a team-high seven rebounds in his first collegiate game before fouling out.

The Knights''s defense shut down the Minutemen for most of the game, including Harris, who was held to 5-of-15 shooting and 4-of-11 from 3-point range, allowing just 20 points in the paint throughout the game while creating second chances and points in transition. UCF was led by Issac Sosa, who went 9-of-11 from the floor for 26 points and point guard A.J. Rompza (13 points, five assists).

"They played traditional defense where they were trying to keep us in front and they did a good job of keeping the big guy in the middle of the lane," Kellogg said. "I think they did a nice job defensively, even though I thought our looks were somewhat decent."

Butler tallies 3 for Wildcats in 2 games

By Jay Asser
Collegian Staff

New Hampshire's Bobby Butler once again victimized the Massachusetts hockey team as the Wildcats split a relatively penalty-free weekend of play with the Minutemen.

Butler came into the weekend as a notorious UMass-killer for his career. In the final tilt of a home-and-home series last season, he scored the game-winning goal in overtime to lift then-No. 13 UNH over the Minutemen. Back in 2007, Butler poured in a goal in double overtime in the first semifinal game of the Hockey East Tournament to eliminate UMass.

"Great players like that, especially in this league, you just have to slow them down," UMass' Will Ortiz said of Butler after Saturday's game.

The No. 14 Minutemen (8-2-0, 3-2-0 Hockey East), however, were not able to contain Butler over the weekend as he continued to add to his impressive resumé against UMass.

In a heartbreaking 4-3 loss in overtime for UNH on Friday, the senior scored his seventh goal of the season on a loose puck to give the Wildcats (3-6-2, 3-2-1 HEA) their first lead of the game.

On Saturday, Butler had another strong showing as he led UNH to a 4-2 victory, getting rid of the bad taste left by the previous game. He netted two goals in the contest and kicked off the scoring 16 minutes, 29 seconds into the game.

The three goals over the weekend for Butler marked the sixth, seventh and eighth scores of his career against UMass.

"He's playing very well for us right now," UNH coach Dick Umile said of Butler. "He's one of our captains and he's leading by example. He's a goal scorer, we knew that coming in and he's got stronger and learned how to play at the defensive end."

Ortiz leading offense

For the Minutemen, Ortiz himself played well over the weekend as he scored his third goal of the season in Saturday's loss while chipping in an assist on Friday. The senior has seven assists and three multi-point games this year, making him one of the offensive leaders of a high-powered attack.

UMass coach Don Cahoon feels like the dynamic winger has really come into his own this season.

"I think he's playing with a renewed energy," Cahoon said of Ortiz. "He brings an enthusiasm, an energy, and now that he's shooting the puck so well it gives us an added offensive dimension."

Second-period woes

Despite the success the Minutemen have had this season, their one Achilles' Heel might be the second period.

Against Hockey East opponents, UMass has given up eight goals in the second frame while only scoring four, its only negative scoring

The Massachusetts hockey team could not duplicate its come-from-behind, 4-3, win from Friday as it fell to New Hampshire, 4-2, Saturday night.

Behind 33 saves by UNH's Brian Foster, the Wildcats held the No. 14 Minutemen to just two goals in the second period to split the weekend series in Amherst.

"I actually thought in many ways that our team played better tonight then they did last night," UMass coach Don Cahoon said after Saturday's loss. "The problem being that we gave up a couple of goals that were just bad positional play on our part."

The Wildcats (3-6-2, 3-2-1 Hockey East) took a 1-0 lead in the first period of Saturday's contest off a Bobby Butler goal before UMass (7-2-0, 4-2-0 HEA) tied it in the second period. Four minutes, 37 seconds into the period, Will Ortiz notched his third goal of the season when he received a pass from Justin Braun.

UMass celebrates after David Boehm scored in overtime against UNH on Friday to give the Minutemen a 4–3 win.

"I ended up in the right spot at the right time, right in the slot," Ortiz said of his goal in Saturday's loss. "I saw a hole on Foster's right shoulder, I didn't hesitate and I just took a shot and I believe it just went underneath his arm and through the net."

The tie only lasted 44 seconds as Peter LeBlanc put the Wildcats up by one again, off of an assist by Blake Kessel. Butler added his third goal in the series and ninth on the season 13:47 into the second period.

With 2:19 left in the period, UMass got the first power play opportunity of the game when UNH had too many players on the ice. The advantage was cancelled out 26 seconds later when Casey Wellman was called for a slashing penalty, but UMass still managed to find the net. James Marcou found an open Martin Nolet, who fired a slap shot past the Wildcats' Brian Foster to cut the lead back to one ath the 18:25 mark.

The Minutemen dominated the second period in shots, 20-4, yet ended the period with the same one goal deficit they entered the period with after both squads scored two goals.

"Its frustrating," Ortiz said of the second period. "You work so hard to do what you do and capitalize on the game plan, and sometimes the puck just doesn't bounce our way and that's what happened."

UMass' hopes of another comeback disappeared when Mike Sislo added to the Wildcats' lead 11:59 into the final period. LeBlanc found Sislo for his seventh assist of the season and Sislo's fourth goal on the year, to help put the game further out of reach for the Minutemen.

Paul Dainton finished the game with 14 saves, a low total due to the low amount of shots the Wildcats took. UMass outshout UNH 35-18 in Saturday's game.

The Minutemen lost a 2-0 lead Friday against UNH, but behind Wellman and David Boehm the Minutemen rallied in the final seconds and played strong in overtime to steal a 4-3 victory.

With 11 seconds remaining in the game and UMass' goaltender pulled, Wellman found the back of the net to tie the game at three and Boehm ended the contest with the Minutemen's fourth goal of the game 2:05 into overtime.

UNH had taken the lead early in the third period off of a Butler goal, his seventh of the season, after falling behind 2-0 in the first period. But after Cahoon called a timeout to regroup UMass with under a minute left in regulation, Wellman received a pass from Danny Hobbs.

Early turnovers prove costly, end season 4–1 at McGuirk

Saturday's 17-14 loss by the Massachusetts football team at the hands of James Madison came by a similar means as many of UMass' earlier losses, just in an unusual location.

At McGuirk Stadium, where the Minutemen were 4-0 prior to Saturday, UMass faced turnover issues in the on-and-off heavy rains throughout the game that led to 10 points by James Madison. UMass has faced turnover issues in its last couple of road games, leading to losses to Richmond and Maine, but have generally protected the ball at home.

"It's certainly a disappointing loss. I'm not very excited about that loss," UMass coach Kevin Morris said after the game. "The turnover right out of the gate where we gave them points and we weren't able to overcome those turnovers to win the ballgame."

On the Minutemen's first three possessions of the game they ran a total of six plays and had three turnovers, which turned into 10 early points for the Dukes. On their first offensive play, Nelson took a handoff from Kyle Havens and ran to the right side before Jon Williams knocked the ball loose and JMU's Scotty McGee recovered it on UMass 6-yard line.

UMass' defense held strong after the turnover, forcing the Dukes to settle for a 20-yard field goal and a 3-0 lead. The defense was strong again, forcing a punt after Kyle Havens had

Minutewomen defeat Terriers in overtime

Danella leads team in season-opener victory

By Steve Levine

Coach Marnie Dacko believed her team would surprise a lot of people this season. So far, she's right.

On Sunday, the Massachusetts women's basketball team welcomed Boston University to the Mullins Center for UMass' season opener. The Terriers, who finished last season 25-8, were dispatched by the Minutewomen in overtime, 79-73.

UMass found itself behind on the scoreboard throughout most of the game, but came back to tie the game at the very end of regulation, sending the game into overtime.

Down by three with 17 seconds left on the clock, sophomore forward Kristina Danella took an off-balanced shot from beyond the arc. Fortunately for the Minutewomen, Danella was fouled on the play, and headed to the line for three free throws and a chance to tie the game.

"I wasn't shooting too well from the line throughout the game," Danella said. "I was definitely trying to take it one at a time [at that point]."

Danella hit all three. With the shot-clock turned off, BU failed to take the lead after two high-percentage shots in the paint did not fall.

"Danella stepping up and making those three free throws gave us the momentum. Our players were fired up going into overtime," Dacko said.

Consequently, the Minutewomen came out firing on all cylinders in overtime, where they took advantage of various BU turnovers and hit shots both from the field and the line. The overtime period represented the only time in the game where UMass dictated play, outscoring BU, 12-6, en route to its first victory.

Throughout the game, UMass consistently clawed back from seven points down to three points down, but could not seem to close the small margin until the last few ticks.

"We didn't play particularly well," senior guard Kim Benton said. "We stuck together though, got it to go to overtime, and won. It really built on our confidence so we're ready to go going

SGA begins review of online elections

Student Judiciary holds hearing regarding legality of newest online voting incarnation

By Nick Bush
Collegian Staff

The second referendum question in the fall 2009 Student Government Association election regarding moving voting online has generated more questions than answers so far. After an undoubtedly contentious history, the SGA finds itself again debating whether or not to throw out its most recent push for election reform, with the Student Judiciary poised to possibly rule against online voting's newest incarnation.

After an attempt at enacting online voting as a senate measure last spring failed, SGA Commuter senator Derek Khanna turned towards what became referendum question two in this year's fall elections, which supported changing a current "antiquated" paper ballot system to support online voting.

The Daily Collegian reported in early October that the wording of the original petition signed by students supporting differed slightly from that on the question two ballot question seen by voters on election day. This discrepancy in the text was enough to lead to the Coordinating Council to decline to ratify question two when it ratified the rest of the election results on Oct. 6. However, the SGA ultimately passed a separate version of the online voting measure in late October, along with an addendum produced by senator Khanna.

Many in the SGA took issue with the addendum, which they allege will make major changes to the SGA – without what they consider the normal course of debate for such actions. Senators Andy Berg, Azeen Khanmalek, Rudy Mahotiere and Melissa Urban filed an official petition for the Student Judiciary, chaired by Robert Weed, to hold a hearing on the addendum and its possible unconstitutionality.

"Several senators in the SGA have serious concerns with what was passed," said Khanmalek, one of the petitioners for the judicial hearing. "Our disagreement has nothing to do with the idea of supporting or not supporting online voting; we simply want to address what we believe is manipulation in the passage of the question. The only form of restitution is to disqualify question two, and sit back down to decide legitimately how to hold online elections."

The Student Judiciary began its hearing on the matter on Sunday, Nov. 15, and after a six-hour session, the meeting was adjourned until Wednesday night. A ruling is expected to be released in the upcoming weeks.

"My concern is primarily that the addendum will modify significantly the way the SGA functions, without this being in the referendum question itself," said Berg. "For one, it deregulates campaign finance reform, opening the door for people to come in and spend personal fortunes to ensure election. Had that, or the other parts of the addendum, been clear, there would have been a significant chance that the referendum would not have passed."

Khanna disagreed with the idea that the addendum fell out the range of the short question regarding online voting originally asked of students on their ballots this fall, noting that moving to an online environment requires making some adjustments to the by-laws. While admitting that subjective decisions were made in that process, Khanna insists that he has worked with the SGA processes in place, and made sure that UMass and the Elections Commission signed off on the addendum and said it was valid.

"I find the motion to the judiciary to be unproductive," said Khanna. "If the petitioners have legitimate problems with the by-law changes, they can sponsor a motion to change the bylaws themselves, and they should do so at any time. I have worked with Brandon Tower on some suggestions to make this a better bill. We owe to UMass an online voting system and direct districts – this year, not in 2011 ... Between the confusion of the old Vice Chancellor [of Student Affairs], and the new Vice Chancellor [Jean Kim], online voting went through the cracks. When finally we presented our signatures to Kim, she said that the SGA must have online elections, but that she was not prepared to change the by-laws."

Many in the SGA seemed upset that the addendum was not made fully available after it was received by the Elections Commission in early September. According to Student Judiciary documents obtained by the Daily Collegian, Chancellor of Elections Chris Faulkner admitted to being unable to find the official copy of the document

UMass MFA program ranked fourth overall

By Michelle Williams

The Masters of Fine Arts Program for Poets and Writers at the University of Massachusetts has been ranked one of the best in the country, according to the most recent edition of Poets & Writers Magazine.

In the November/ December issue of the magazine, the 50 best MFA programs were ranked out of the 140 full-residency programs nationwide. The MFA program of UMass was tied with University of Texas, Austin, for 4th place, ranking below University of Iowa, Iowa City, University of Michigan, Ann Arbor and University of Virginia, Charlottesville.

Such rankings placed UMass above Ivy League schools including Brown University, Cornell University and Columbia University.

Schools were compared in seven categories: poetry, fiction, nonfiction, total funding, annual funding, selectivity and post-graduate placement.

The most important element of how the programs were ranked, according to the author Seth Abramson, was the information received from a poll taken of more than 500 prospective and current MFA applicants between October 2008 and April 2009.

The survey was conducted from two online resources for MFA applicants, MFA Weblog and Suburban Ecstasies, a website authored by Abramson to help rank the MFA programs.

COURTESY UMASS.EDU

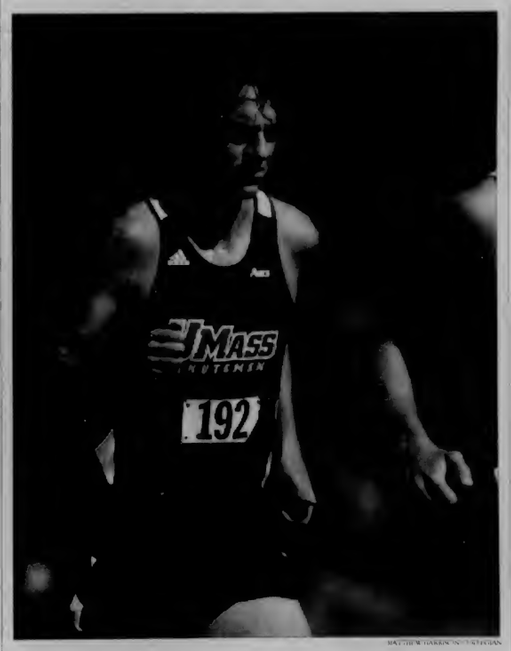
Joseph Bartolomeo, chair of the UMass English Department, praised Poets & Writers Magazine's decision to highly-rank the MFA program.

Other data the survey included the number of students admitted into the programs yearly, financial aid, program lengths, teaching loads and the emphasis of the program on fiction or poetry.

In a University statement, Joseph Bartolomeo, the chair of the UMass English Department said, "The high ranking is wonderful news but not surprising." He added, "It confirms what we already know: the extraordinary talent and dedication of our MFA faculty and students is of great pride to the department and the University."

In 1963, Joseph Langland founded the Masters of Fine Arts Program for Poets and Writers. Currently, it is one of the smallest departments with only seven faculty members, though it is considered a part of the English Department.

In the 2009-2010 academic year, fewer than 80 students were admitted to the program.



The MFA program is constructed around intensive writing workshops, private conferences, seminars, independent study and internships.

With the completion of the required 60 credits, students are required to complete and present a book-length manuscript. This program is typically completed in three years.

Resident poets and writers in the program hold many awards including a Pulitzer Prize given to James Tate in 1992 for his UMass cross country runner Kevin Johnson fought through adverse weather conditions to finish 43rd out of 244 runners in the NCAA Regional Qualifier at Franklin Park this past Saturday.

A rainy day in Boston was not the ideal forecast for a multi-kilometer run.

The Massachusetts cross country teams attended the NCAA Regional Qualifier at Franklin Park this past Saturday, with the men placing 11th out of 36 teams and the women 20th out of 35 entries.

"We were deep in mud with a lot of rain," said men's coach Ken O'Brien. "You always expect adverse weather conditions at the end of the year, and we had just that."

Despite a rugged 10-kilometer course – with better footing, according to O'Brien, than the Atlantic 10 Championships two weeks ago in St. Louis – junior Kevin Johnson put in a worthy effort. He finished with a time of 32 minutes, 47 seconds, good for 43rd out of the 244 runners.

Hope for us all

Eric Magazu

One of the biggest philosophical issues, which divides most forms of political ideology, is the way we view human nature. Human nature is more fundamental to all areas of life than we might realize at first glance. By reassessing our views on this subject, we will begin to get a better picture of some of the assumptions we have been making thus far.

I believe that there are three essential positions to take on human nature. The first two are quite common and the first is probably the predominant view.

The first is that human nature is something that can be modified with the right environment and the proper education. This view believes that people can be taught that certain behavior is the preferred way of acting and then continue to live in this state.

When all of our chips are down and we have no other hope, and someone steps in and saves us from our plight, is that not redemption?

Most people active in politics probably view things this way. Activists are trying to change things and tend to be quite optimistic. The view that human nature can be changed inspires people to create laws to suit the ideal way of life that a particular person envisions.

The second view is that human nature is at its core unchangeable. This view asserts that human beings throughout all time and all places act essentially the same. Rather than even attempting to change the way people live, we should analyze human behavior and make laws that know human beings for what we are. The view that human nature is immutable will inspire the creation of laws to restrain these human impulses in order that they may be channeled into something productive for the common good.

The first view will be found among many across the political spectrum, but perhaps will be more concentrated on the leftward end. The second view will tend to be focused more on the rightward end of the political spectrum.

It does seem that the second view is more negative than the first view and that we really ought to be more idealistic. Are human beings really so selfish we cannot aspire to something higher? Why do we want to create laws simply to restrain our evil nature when we can work to create a society based on our good nature? The first view is more positive by suggesting that people have both good and evil inclinations. We can then ask ourselves how we can tap into the good inclination of each and every person.

Those holding the second view will look upon this and believe that it has the potential to lead towards tyranny. Inevitability the people will not respond with their good inclination, and the government will have to become increasingly intrusive in order to create the veneer of such a "Great Society." People holding the second view might look to the example of the "New Soviet Man," an early project of the former USSR, in order to ridicule the advocates of the first view.

Those holding the first view will look upon the second view and strongly argue that the second view can lead towards tyranny because it is an archaic view that assumes the worst of humanity. They will argue that the government will have to restrict all of the undesirable traits of man, thus resulting in a loss of our liberty and freedom. Can it really be true that man only has an evil inclination? Is the pursuit of self-interest really the end of humanity?

This is where there is some room for a third view of human nature. In this view we recognize that humans are self-interested, but that with some sort of faith that leads to a pursuit of virtue there can be some rectification to this nature.

What kind of faith is needed to lead to a genuine pursuit of virtue? Most religious systems try to address this through a process of enlightenment, but these religious systems, like the political systems discussed earlier, revert back to the first view, that man can transformed through environment and education.

A genuine third view might assert that faith has to come from some other source. If we cannot change ourselves, can another party change us? I think this may just be the idea of having a redeemer. When all of our chips are down and we have no other hope, and someone steps in and saves us from our plight, is that not redemption? Even more than love, redemption is the most powerful force to which we are attracted. It means that there is a chance for each one of us to start all over again with the slate wiped clean. It means a lot to know that there will always be someone there to answer us on the day we call.

Perhaps this is a very American idea that started many years ago with the first pilgrims. If we really want to change the way things operate in our social and political systems, maybe, just maybe, we ought to be looking to find ourselves a redeemer.

Last Sunday the University of Massachusetts hosted a debate between the candidates aspiring to fill Ted Kennedy's vacant Senate seat. As a registered Massachusetts voter, I decided to go hear the candidates speak so that I could make an informed decision in next month's special election primary, expecting to be wooed by one of the political veterans in the room, such as Michael Capuano, the current Congressman from Massachusetts' 8th district. But to my surprise, I found myself very impressed by the little-known Boston social entrepreneur in the room: Alan Khazei.

Though I had heard the name and was aware that he was running in the primary, I had never given much attention to Khazei's candidacy. But in a debate filled with the usual evasive political rhetoric and vague answers, Alan Khazei provided detailed and concise explanations of his stance on a wide swath of issues and his plans for fixing some of the biggest challenges currently facing Massachusetts and our country as a whole.

So who is Alan Khazei? He's a 48-year-old citizen activist currently serving as the CEO of Be the Change, Inc., an organization he founded in 2007 with the mission of building national coalitions of non-profit organizations and citizens to work on social issues such as education and poverty. Prior to that, Khazei co-founded and was the CEO of the very successful City Year, a pioneering national service program that offers 17-24 year olds the opportunity to participate in a year of civic engagement and service. City Year has become so successful that it employs roughly 1,400 workers at 19 different locations including 18 in the U.S. and one in South America. Because of his service and activism over the past two decades, Khazei was named one of "America's 25 Best Leaders" by US News and World Report in 2006, and has earned numerous awards including the Reebok Human Rights Award.

The factor that makes Khazei different than the other Democrats running for the seat is that he has refused to take any money from Political Action Committees and lobbyists.

The impact of Khazei's work is much more significant than you would expect – his City Year program was used by Bill Clinton as the model for AmeriCorps, the national public service program boasting over 600,000 participants. Then, when AmeriCorps was almost derailed by widespread Republican criticism in 2003, Khazei helped to organize the "Save AmeriCorps" campaign that persuaded Congress to continue funding the program. Most recently, Khazei worked with Ted Kennedy on a major expansion of the AmeriCorps program that the Obama administration enacted earlier this year.

In terms of the issues, Khazei is your typical Massachusetts liberal: he's pro-choice, pro-gay marriage, opposed to the war in Iraq and favors a public option in the health care bill. And while he is not a career politician like his opponents, Khazei backs up each of his positions with clear explanations and solid plans for how he can influence some of the problems facing our nation as a Senator. Aside from being very knowledgeable, Khazei distinguishes himself from the rest of the Democratic contenders in a couple of very significant ways.

For one thing, Khazei is passionate about the issue of education reform. He explains, education is "the key to our economic recovery and the backbone of our international security." Out of the four democratic candidates for the Senate, only Khazei shares the Obama administration's view that the education system needs to be majorly reformed. Coakley and Capuano are both against lifting the cap on the number of charter schools allowed in a given state. Why is this significant? Because charter schools boast an average 80 percent graduation rate in America's most troubled neighborhoods – nearly double the average. Being that education was one of the great causes of Ted Kennedy's life, it seems only fitting that his seat be filled by someone with a similar set of ideals and beliefs.

The factor that makes Khazei different that the other Democrats running for the seat is that he has refused to take any money from Political Action Committees and lobbyists. This is a pretty compelling quality for a candidate to have because it means that as a Senator, Khazei would not be indebted to any big corporations or be sympathetic to any special interests; he'd be able to act solely in the best interests of the Commonwealth and the country in general. As he said in the November 8 debate, "I'm not taking their money; I'll be able to take them on."

Right now, Khazei is trailing in the Senate race, with only 4 percent to Coakley's 37 percent according to the most recent Western New England College Polling Institute poll, but don't count him out yet because there's a lot of time left until the December 8 primary. He's also been making a big push recently to get himself heard. Given his solid track record of getting things done, his strong stance on the issues dear to Kennedy and his pledge not to accept money from special interest groups, Khazei has the potential to gain a lot of support in the coming weeks. I'll certainly be voting for him next month, and I hope that some of you will, too.

Come together for Thanksgiving

Matt Kushi

On Thursday of next week we will be celebrating Thanksgiving.

Traditionally, it is the day to give thanks as the Pilgrims did way back in 1621. For college students, it means a short break before the final climb to finals week. For others, it means that winter is fast approaching. For some, the coming of Thanksgiving means that Black Friday is here.

To those unfamiliar with American culture, Black Friday may sound like a holy day. Not quite. Here in America we have this little unofficial name for the day after Thanksgiving, and it hasn't got the slightest bit to do with religion.

On this day after Thanksgiving, people tend to come out in droves to go shopping because the stores put many of their products on sale.

What exactly happens on the Friday morning following this day of thanks? Imagine the Running of the Bulls. Only there are no bulls, just people. All of these people attempt to charge into a store at the same time. The result is chaos.

What happens is that there are products on sale all over. People try to save money and make a purchase for a good price. The idea is sound. Buy something when it is on sale. If you're an economist, this may look good too. You get the market place going really good with all of this business. It is capitalism at its best.

However, the timing is off and the manner in which this all occurs is off. First, I will tackle the latter issue. I decided to see how Black Friday operated a few years back. I got there nice and early and waited for the doors to open. It was chaos in motion.

That said, we cannot and must not lose perspective of the time preceding Black Friday. The holiday is not this unofficial Black Friday but Thanksgiving.

The scene inside that store was like a pack of wolves in a chicken coop. People were rushing left and right, paying no mind to anyone but themselves. It was truly "survival of the fittest". Arguments on who grabbed what item first, arguments on who got to that check-out aisle first, rude "get out of the ways!" from people pushing shopping carts like their lives depended on it.

I didn't buy anything that morning. While being out at that hour of the morning didn't bother me, about the only thing I really enjoyed about that morning was watching the sun rise.

Then, there is the issue of timing for Black Friday. The fact that made the above experience almost comical was the timing. To think that these same people who were ready to do their best Rocky impression on the person that had cut in front of them were people that had been giving thanks not 24 hours prior.

This is not going to change, though. In our America society, change is very slow to come about. It is even slower to be accepted.

So, Black Friday will remain as is.

With that thought in mind, I think we need a little reminder on what is important. To put some things in perspective, how dumb does it look and sound when you see the number of people were injured or killed on Black Friday? Does it strike anyone as bizarre that we have a casualty report for a day of shopping? Does it strike anyone as ironic that after a day of putting things in perspective, we reverse routes and go crazy over something that is relatively small?

Alright, if we are going to have a big shopping day, so be it. Let this be capitalism at work. That said, we can not and must not lose perspective of the time preceding Black Friday. The holiday is not this unofficial Black Friday, but Thanksgiving.

We are looking back and giving thanks that we are still able to celebrate the things in life that we have. What are the most important things that we have? No, not material objects. A person does not need that new TV. It is a nice thing to have but it is not an essential basic human need.

What we have is each other. You and me. When you are that dinner table with your family, look around. We are surrounded by family members that are capable of loving us unconditionally. We are surrounded by friends that support us.

We are thankful for the fact that we are able to have a Thanksgiving dinner. Not all people, even within the boundaries of our own country, have the luxury of saying that.

When one thinks about it, this really puts into perspective all that we really do have and all that we can do to make it so that those that cannot enjoy these luxuries may be able to someday.

So while, you are out shopping on Black Friday, enjoy yourselves. However, at the end of the day, don't forget what luxuries you enjoy that enabled you to even make the trip to that store. Remember what the real holiday is: Thanksgiving.

Five Reasons Why
You should read Sarah Palin's new book

1) Her ghostwriter is really good

2) lots of pictures to color

3) Half of it is about Todd Palin's goatee, anyway

4) the family centerfold

5) it's like a soap opera but with no emotions

No hurdles in language quest

Haley Navarro
Collegian Staff

Whether the reader is thinking about or actually attempting to raise a child bilingually, Barbara Zurer Pearson has written an accessible and informative how-to guide for raising a child to speak more than one language.

In "Raising a Bilingual Child: A step-by-step guide for parents," Pearson breaks down the process in each chapter, not only explaining each technique academically, but also in a way that is easy to digest.

Some of her concepts are also accompanied with diagrams that better demonstrate the point she is trying to make.

Each chapter of "Raising a Bilingual Child" begins with an overview of what is to be discussed, so the parent can easily flip to a focal point for review. There is also an introduction with explanations about the reasons to raise a child bilingually. Although Pearson mentions in the introduction that she was not raised bilingual herself, she claims that the root of her interest lies in the times she spent in Paris. She also expands on her interests from a research perspective.

Working as a research associate at the University of Miami, and later at the University of Massachusetts, Pearson has spent 20 years studying the linguistics of bilingualism, and wrote the book with the intention that it would also become a vital tool for American families to use. "Raising a Bilingual Child" even reads more like literature, with the separation of each idea or concept within each chapter.

The themes and concepts put forth within its pages can easily be understood by those who are bilingual and are attempting to raise their children bilingual, or those who are monolingual trying to better their children.

It's obvious that Pearson did her homework. She consulted over 100 families to answer questions, so instead of having an all-scientific book, there are actual testimonies to back up her points.

A whole chapter of her book is even dedicated to case studies and testimonials of people who have successfully raised their children bilingual. Easy-to-understand tables are used to display the families' strengths and weaknesses, as well as in-depth backgrounds of the families' histories with each language spoken.

A parent can read all the concepts necessary to raise their child bilingually, but it culminates in this chapter when they see exactly how it plays out. Factors that are evaluated in each case study are as follows: input (meaning if parents speak the language in question), extended family, community, print materials, travel options, attitudes and experiences and level of commitment.

This gives parents a solid guideline to follow as they try to immerse their children into a bilingual environment.

In addition to real-life testimonies and research, Pearson has included a chapter on the science of bilingualism and the way bilinguals think. She demonstrates clearly the science of the brain — where language functions and how it relates and connects to the other areas of the brain. Since this chapter is mostly scientific, one would assume that it would be hard to understand, but Pearson again utilizes tables to make her point.

The tables are easy to read and understand, as well as visually stimulating. Ultimately, it's a preferable way of digesting the content of the book.

From the science and research involved, to the real-life experiences of families raising their children to be bilingual, "Raising a Bilingual Child" succeeds in pleasing a vast array of readers.

On the strength of her years of research, Pearson has written an informative guide on the inner workings of bilingualism, and also has created a body of work that is as much dynamic as it is enjoyable.

Whether this reader is a linguistics expert, a parent or a researcher, "Raising a Bilingual Child" surpasses expectations.

"Zombie" and the oft-lauded hit "Linger" were just two of the songs performed live by The Cranberries Friday night at The Orpheum in Boston, Mass. The Limerick, Ireland natives are currently on their 20th anniversary tour.

No 'need to argue' here

Ireland's Cranberries take center stage at Boston's Orpheum for 20th anniversary, dazzle with old hits and raucous energy

By Kate MacDonald
Collegian Staff

Rocking music, a raucous crowd and drunken fans being arrested in the middle of the venue means just another night at an Irish band's concert. Fans experienced all this and more at The Orpheum Friday night when The Cranberries took the stage during the second show of their 20th year anniversary tour. Hailing from Limerick, Ireland, the band sprinkled their set with many crowd-pleasing songs as well as some new hits.

Before they could take their turn on the stage, newcomer Griffin House walked out alone, accompanied by nothing but his acoustic guitar. His performance was nothing to brag about.

Made up of men and women of varying age and denomination, the audience chattered throughout the entire gig. The pitch only rose slightly when House, in an effort to make up for the lack of a beat or bass line, strummed his guitar aggressively and screeched his way through a song about the similarities between the Iraqi War and World War II. His voice paid a greater price for his screeching, and broke intermittently throughout the remainder of his set.

Some of the songs weren't bad, but would have been much better if accompanied by a band. One of Griffin House's better tunes, "If You Want To," was even reminiscent of U2's cover of "Everlasting Love." However, during this song, an anonymous woman muttered to the woman next to her, "No one is paying attention to him at all." A quick scan of the audience confirmed the woman's remarks, as a few rows over a group of teens could be seen taking pictures of themselves rather than of the musician onstage. After a failed attempt at a chorus sing-a-long, House left the stage, trailing in his shamed wake.

During intermission, the crowd easily doubled in size. Audience members attempted to stretch their legs, because the tiny seats of the theater which clearly attempted to look like The Wang, but came off as a 1930s movie theater – certainly didn't give enough room to move. It was then that a 50-something year old man dressed in Irish garb, who had been knocking back beers and pumping his fist like a frat boy, was escorted out by the police. After arguing with them for a bit, he was led out by two officers who clearly found the experience amusing.

When Dolores O'Riordan, lead singer of The Cranberries, pranced out on the stage, she began to dance and didn't stop much during the set. She had great presence with the crowd, referring to Boston, a city known for its Irish ties, as their "Home away from home." There was a huge crowd response when she gave a shout out to the Bruins, as well as when she threw multiple picks into the audience.

O'Riordan is simply a great performer. Concert goer Jason Hayes said, "I think she has a uniqueness to her that's quite appealing. You don't necessarily have to like the music, but you'll like the performance." Those ready to write off her solo venture found that the songs sounded very similar to the songs featured at the concert, most of which were from their first or second albums. "Everybody Else Is Doing It, So Why Can't We" and "No Need To Argue."

The crowd roared over the music generated from the band when certain songs, most notably "Just My Imagination" and "Daffodil Lament," began to play. New tunes "Switch Off The Light" and "The Journey" were equally well received. O'Riordan's lilting, ethereal-like voice carried the band into what is arguably their best known song, "Linger," setting the crowd into an almost trance-like state. O'Riordan was taken aback by the crowd's reaction, shaking her head but letting the audience sing many parts.

However, the best performance of the night was "Zombie," about the Troubles of Northern Ireland, which lasted throughout 1960s and concluded in 1998 with the Belfast Agreement. The version, as compared with other live renditions, including the one from their MTV "I nplugged" special, was astounding. Everyone was up on their feet, waving their hands in unison, yelling and singing.

Hayes laughed before their last song "Dreams," saying that, "That last song was so good. It made the night for me." I acted by the energy generated by the crowd, Dolores O'Riordan shouted out to the throng, "You guys are kicking a bit of ass tonight." Anyone in the audience could have easily said the same thing about The Cranberries.

Palmer 'Dolls' it up

Ex-Dresden Doll caters to fans, revisits old melodies in burlesque punk perfor ance

By Angela Stasiowski
Collegian Staff

Amanda Palmer brought her sophisticated burlesque punk to Pearl Street last Friday, serenading the packed Ballroom with tunes from her debut solo release, "Who Killed Amanda Palmer."

As the former singer and pianist for punk cabaret outfit the Dresden Dolls, Palmer is no stranger to the limelight. Her multifaceted performance on Friday covered all the bases, from literature to fine art, without compromising on quality.

Opening the evening were The Nervous Cabaret, a group of up-and-comers from Brooklyn who came highly recommended by several of Palmer's friends.

The quirky collective had the look and sound of an unstable mind, but kept it together with brass melodies and wandering bass lines. The enigmatic singer, Elyas Khan, was a man of few words but boasted the tuneful wailings of a siren song, all at once bizarre and captivating.

The Nervous Cabaret played duel roles, acting as both opener and supporting band, remaining on stage for much of Palmer's act.

Adorned in her typical barely-there fashion, a confident Ms. Palmer strutted on stage in a procession of trumpets and trombones that originated from the back of the theater.

Palmer immediately dove into some older Dresden Dolls material, appeasing new and old fans alike. The pure drama of "Missed Me" was executed expertly, alternating between Palmer's husky whisper and twisted music-box melody of her piano. Her staccato performance has room to swell in the concert hall, ending in a theatrical climax that can put the studio recording to shame.

She proceeded in the set with material from "Who Killed Amanda Palmer," beginning with the single, "Astronaut." The passionate piano ballad had previously been tossed around in Dresden Dolls shows, but her solo performance breathed new life into the tune.

Palmer dismissed the band from her repetoire after the first few songs and elected to do a reading from the book accompaniment to her album. Written by recent beau Neil G the book is filled with grim fairy tales tha ture none other than Palmer herself.

After the reading, Palmer went on to perform some of her more earnest ballads. Unfortunately, some old-fashioned Friday the 13th got the better of her, and she mistakenly started the song "Ampersand" in the wrong key. While audience members shouted out the proper notes, she recovered with a laugh and continued on to gracefully complete the tune.

There was no shortage of covers Friday evening either, with Palmer most notably trying her hand at "The House of the Rising Sun." Famously performed by the Animals, Palmer made the song her own with the bass support of the Nervous Cabaret.

Audience members went wild for "Oasis," Palmer's tune that was recently banned in the U.K. Based roughly around her personal experiences, the song covers everything from rape to abortion, all the while galloping along with bouncy piano and beachy harmonies.

The song is one of many examples of producer Ben Folds' influence on the record. In the absence of Folds, Palmer encourages the audience to provide the harmonic "oohs and ahs," which were graciously echoed throughout the hall.

As part of her brief encore, Palmer crawled up to a platform at the back of the audience and performed "Makin' Whoopee" on the ukulele, claiming Gaiman had taught her the track on a recent road trip.

The song was originally made famous by Eddie Cantor and warns young couples of the imminent unhappiness that marriage brings to a relationship. She joked that the song was dedicated to Gaiman but not because of its lyrical content.

For a grand finale, Palmer mounted the main stage once again to perform "Coin-Operated Boy," a celebrated Dresden Dolls tune. Complete with marionette-like theatrics, the vixen of cabaret finished the evening with the same power and class with which it began.

A painting which had been completed during the set was auctioned at the end of the night and audience members were encouraged to purchase Gaiman's book from the merchandise booth, since the novelist was present to sign copies.

Clearly, Palmer has mastered the art of performance and her expertise is mirrored in all aspects of presentation. Her interactions with the audience were sincere, all the while maintaining her fierce individuality as an entertainer and her passion for the stage. There is just something enchanting about an artist who truly loves her craft.

Amanda Palmer has long embodied the punk rock movement, but added sophisticated flare to her repertoire Friday night with her heart-wrenching renditions of such ballads as "Astronaut" and "Missed Me."

Correction:

Due to an editing error in the Collegian's last Friday edition, musician John Lennon's name, in the article "Fans for a Fan Favorite," was misspelled. Similarly, in the article "Rackwon and Sean P. drop legendary beats in SoHo," Sean Prince's name was also spelled incorrectly. The Collegian regrets these mistakes.

Minutemen handed second loss of season

By Herb Scribner
Collegian Staff

While the Massachusetts men's club hockey team was able to show Central Connecticut State how to play hockey, Western Connecticut State handed the Minutemen their second loss of the season.

"When you put the hottest players out on the ice all the time, it's bound to dry up," UMass coach Robert Talloni commented on the team's second loss.

The Minutemen's (13-1-0) second loss of the season came at the hands of Western Connecticut, when they played Sunday night in Danbury, Conn. The Colonials (7-6-0) limited UMass' powerful offense to score a single goal.

For a Minutemen offense that scored 71 goals prior to the contest against Western Connecticut, this was uncharacteristic. The recent dominant offense for the Minutemen failed to show up, as the lone goal was scored by defender Dan Cusano. The goal came off of an assist from forward Adam Spunt, who has played limited time in four games this season.

A bit of controversy also sprung up from the game against the Colonials, involving the officials. According to Talloni, there was a lack of communication between the referees, the captains and himself.

"Things developed during the game and needs to be addressed by the Referees Association," Talloni said. "We had some trouble with the referring crew that needs to be addressed on paper."

While Talloni explained that he sent a list of issues to the head of the Referees Association, he could not comment on what the issues were until he heard back.

Despite the issues, Talloni does not blame Western Connecticut.

"Western Connecticut did a great job; my hat is off to them," he said. "They did what they had to do."

Two nights before UMass suffered its second loss of the season (first away loss), the Minutemen played at home against Central Connecticut State.

While a closely-contested game may have been expected after the last meeting between the two teams (ending 8-6), UMass took it to another level as they handed the Blue Devils (5-5-0) an 8-3 loss.

Duquesne led from start to finish and set a school record by shooting 80 percent from beyond the arc on their way to a 100-69 victory over Niagara on Sunday. Alex Geesler led the Dukes with 20 points while Rachel Frederick, Samantha Pollino and Kelly Britcher each added 14.

Duquesne scored 58 points in the second half of the game, the most it has scored in a half since 1990. The Dukes shot 61 percent from the field in the half, as well as 12-for-12 from the free throw line.

The previous Duquesne record for three point percentage was 75 percent when it shot 9-for-12 against James Madison on November 27, 2002.

The Dukes also held the Purple Eagles without a field goal until the 14 minute, 42 second mark in the first half.

Rachel Colion led Niagara with 14 points in defeat, while Liz Hooks added 13.

Minutemen handed second loss of season

By Herb Scribner
Collegian Staff

While the Massachusetts men's club hockey team was able to show Central Connecticut State how to play hockey, Western Connecticut State handed the Minutemen their second loss of the season.

"When you put the hottest players out on the ice all the time, it's bound to dry up," UMass coach Robert Talloni commented on the team's second loss.

The Minutemen's (13-1-0) second loss of the season came at the hands of Western Connecticut, when they played Sunday night in Danbury, Conn. The Colonials (7-6-0) limited UMass' powerful offense to score a single goal.

For a Minutemen offense that scored 71 goals prior to the contest against Western Connecticut, this was uncharacteristic. The recent dominant offense for the Minutemen failed to show up, as the lone goal was scored by defender Dan Cusano. The goal came off of an assist from forward Adam Spunt, who has played limited time in four games this season.

A bit of controversy also sprung up from the game against the Colonials, involving the officials. According to Talloni, there was a lack of communication between the referees, the captains and himself.

"Things developed during the game and needs to be addressed by the Referees Association," Talloni said. "We had some trouble with the referring crew that needs to be addressed on paper."

While Talloni explained that he sent a list of issues to the head of the Referees Association, he could not comment on what the issues were until he heard back.

Despite the issues, Talloni does not blame Western Connecticut.

"Western Connecticut did a great job; my hat is off to them," he said. "They did what they had to do."

Two nights before UMass suffered its second loss of the season (first away loss), the Minutemen played at home against Central Connecticut State.

While a closely-contested game may have been expected after the last meeting between the two teams (ending 8-6), UMass took it to another level as they handed the Blue Devils (5-5-0) an 8-3 loss.

"Going in, I knew it was going to be a very tough game, and it was. But we got on them quick," Talloni said. "We had a couple of key players. Every line produced, and everything went well."

Forward Craig Cardone [illegible] through, scoring four goals in the match. Cradone has seven goals on the season, which is the third most on the team behind seniors Reed Powers and Alec Goolsby.

"Every time [Cardone] touches the puck, everything seems to be working for him," Talloni said. "He plays the way other players dream about. He had some beautiful moves, including two breakaways at the goalie.

"After his first three goals, people were looking for hats to throw out on the ice because he scored a hat-trick, but to our surprise he scored one more. It was a fantastic effort on his part," he said.

Talloni also explained that Cardone's impressive scoring was assisted by the defensive players who passed the puck up to him for [illegible]

DUKES USE THREE BALL TO TOP NIAGRA

Duquesne led from start to finish and set a school record by shooting 80 percent from beyond the arc on their way to a 100-69 victory over Niagara on Sunday. Alex Gensler led the Dukes with 20 points while Rachel Frederick, Samantha Pollino and Kelly Britcher each added 14.

Duquesne scored 58 points in the second half of the game, the most it has scored in a half since 1990. The Dukes shot 61 percent from the field in the half, as well as 12-for-12 from the free throw line.

The previous Duquesne record for three point percentage was 75 percent when it shot 9-for-12 against James Madison on November 27, 2002.

The Dukes also held the Purple Eagles without a field goal until the 14 minute, 42 second mark in the first half.

Rachel Folion led Niagara with 14 points in defeat, while Liz Flooks added 13.

[illegible] BC led 2-1 after one period and 4-1 after two periods before adding three goals in the first 10 minutes of the third.

The Eagles scored on 3 of 5 power play opportunities while limiting the Catamounts to one power-play goal on seven chances.

In game two on Sunday, however, the Cats would not be denied. They led 2-1 after two periods and capitalized on an Eagle five-minute major penalty with a goal by junior Justin Mills in the final period. Senior Mike Spilsane finished with 30 saves, and Vermont held off a late charge to earn a 3-2 win and a series split.

The Catamounts move to 4-4-1 overall and 3-3-1 in Hockey East play, putting them just one game behind the Eagles, who drop to 4-3-1 overall and 3-3-1 in the conference.

Xavier wins in OT to kick off season

By Ben Lambert
Collegian Staff

The Xavier women's basketball team is ranked No. 11 in the country in the 2009-10 Associated Press Preseason Poll.

This is the highest that the Musketeers have ever been ranked, eclipsing their No. 12 mark in the 2000-01 season. Last year, Xavier went 25-7 overall and won the regular season title with a 13-1 mark in the Atlantic 10. The Musketeers will welcome back junior forward Amber Harris, who missed the entirety of last season due to injury.

Xavier also still has the 2008-09 A-10 Player of the Year in Ta'Shia Phillips, who led the team with 13.9 points per game and 12.1 rebounds. She also set back-to-back single season rebounding records over the last two years. Phillips is the sixth player in history to lead the league in rebounding for two years in a row.

A-10 Notebook

Both Harris and Phillips were named to the A-10 Preseason First Team and the Preseason Defensive team this year.

Xavier began its season by defeating Southern California, 81-71, in overtime this weekend. Philips posted a double-double with 14 points and 10 boards, while Harris added 19 points and 12 rebounds.

Flyers upset Spartans in home opener

Dayton knocked off No. 10 Michigan State, 77-74, in their 2009-10 home opener on Friday.

Senior Kendel Ross scored 14 points to lead the Flyers to their upset victory, including four free throws in the final 15.8 seconds. Kristen Daughtery added 17 points, while Justine Raterman contributed 13 points and 10 rebounds.

The Spartans helped Dayton by committing 29 personal fouls in the game, but the Flyers could only convert 17 of 33 foul shots.

The victory was Dayton's first ever against a top 10 team. It is the second time that head coach Jim Jabir has spurred the Flyers to victory over a nationally ranked opponent. Last year, Dayton beat No. 16 Xavier in the A-10 semifinals.

Courtney Schiffauer added 21 points in a losing effort for the Spartans. Michigan State had Xavier's Ta'Shia Phillips was named the 2008-09 A-10 Player of the Year last season. Against USC in the season opener, Phillips scored 14 points, shooting 5 of 9 from the field and 4 of 5 at the free throw line.

Minutewomen squad faces adverse weather

Pete Vasquez
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts rowing team's novice squad discovered this Saturday that the Charles River is not its most welcoming course.

A month after the varsity crew team contended with snowfall during the Head of the Charles, torrential downpours and 20 mph winds plagued the novice team. Both novice eights competed against other crews and had to stop rowing, adversely affecting their results.

The first boat finished in the 14th position while the second finished last of 26 teams. A competing boat that was trying to pass the second novice boat ended up pushing the boat into a bridge.

However, UMass assistant coach Alex Binkowski reassured that foul play was not committed. He explained that these incidents happen often on the Charles.

"I think [the novice team] experienced some of the normal trials and tribulations of racing on the Charles River," Binkowski said. "It's a very difficult course to steer and race on. It's very narrow, and there are five bridges to maneuver through."

Rather than dwelling on the results, the Minutewomen were able to put things in perspective. The second boat was full of people who eight weeks ago had never rowed before. No one in either boat had rowed in the Head of the Charles, and the only novice rower who had participated in last month's race was not present due to illness. Additionally, the first boat was missing its usual coxswain, who navigates the boat and had to use a substitute.

However, through all the obstacles, the focus of the Minutewomen remains the same.

"Our fall season is all about getting into shape and learning how to race," Binkowski said. "Our championship season is in the spring. That's where the focus is. The results will take care of themselves as long as we keep working hard between now and March."

Now that the team has capped off its fall season, it will switch to eight-hour a week practices. So long as the weather permits, the Minutewomen will be on the water in early morning training sessions in small boats, which include singles, doubles and quads.

Head coach Jim Dietz explained that smaller boats require more skill to maneuver."[The rowers] feel the water more and understand their application of power more, and there's more accountability," Dietz said. "People have to learn what that level of proficiency is – that level of effort they have to put in to get good."

Three Minutewomen returned from a camp in Princeton, N.J. over the weekend as they work towards becoming members of the U.S. National Team. Elizabeth Tuiler, Chelsea Wakeham and Emily Boucher all performed well, Dietz said. "I think all three of them have the potential [to be U.S. team members]," Dietz said. "And this is the way you find out. You go compete against the best. Success is more than your University's success. For me, success is putting people on the national team. That's the epitome of the sport."

In the 13 years that Dietz has led the program, he has put eight women on the National or Olympic teams. Dietz hopes to add another three to the list.

Chris Connolly of Boston University scores against Merrimack over the weekend to lead the Terriers to a 6-4 victory.

Terriers lose national rank despite victory

By Michael Wood
Collegian Correspondent

A four-goal explosion in the first period helped snap a four-game skid by the Boston University men's ice hockey team on Saturday evening.

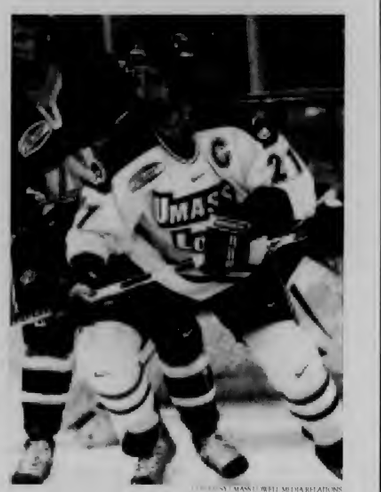
Hockey East Notebook

Home against Merrimack, and in position to lose five straight games, the No. 17 Terriers rose to the occasion and posted a 6-4 victory at Agganis Arena.

Sophomore Chris Connolly helped avenge a Friday loss to the Warriors by tallying two goals and an assist for BU. Sophomore goaltender Grant Rollheiser made his first start of the year after an injury-plagued first month, and recorded a career-high 25 saves, turning away 12 in the third period alone to help the Terriers hold on for the victory.

After ending the first period down 4-0, Merrimack rallied and made it a 5-4 contest midway through the third. Freshman Stephane Da Costa registered a goal and two assists, and junior Joe Cucci tallied another. The Warriors, however, simply couldn't overcome the play of Rollheiser.

BU improves to 3-6 on the year with a 2-5 record in Hockey East play, but dropped out of the Associated Press Top 25 national poll. Merrimack moved to 6-4 overall and 3-2 in Hockey East play with the loss.



River Hawks extend streak

No. 5 UMass Lowell took on Alabama-Huntsville Saturday, and came away with a 4-0 victory, putting its current win streak at three games.

The River Hawks scored first, waiting just over five minutes. After a costly turnover, captain Ben Holmstrom beat goaltender Camcron Talbot to put UMass Lowell on top.

Goaltender Carter Hutton posted his second shutout of

UMass takes third place after losing to UVM

By Daniel Gigliotti

Dark clouds loomed over the Massachusetts club rugby team on Saturday afternoon as it watched its lead evaporate in the final quarter of the match. But a silver lining was found on Sunday in a bid to the national championship tournament.

Fifth-seeded Vermont (9-2) waterlogged the top-seeded Minutemen (11-2), 15-10. The Catamounts scored 15 points in the final 15 minutes to amass a 10-point rally and move on to the New England Championship match on Sunday.

Despite the loss, UMass bounced back to win in its third-place match against Stony Brook, 21-0. Again, the Minutemen failed to score in the second half, but did not need the points as they stymied the 3-24 Wolves's offense.

On Saturday, UMass had everything going its way in the first half, powering to two tries while staying in firm control of the game. The only regret in the first 65 minutes was that they didn't score more points.

"We didn't establish a large enough lead," UMass coach Al Baker said. "There were a number of missed opportunities. We hit the posts twice on our conversions."

Two missed conversions by a usually reliable Dan Morgan may have been costly. Both kicks missed by the slightest of margins, grazing the uprights and landing unsuccessfully.

The impact of the kicks was less tangible and more cognitive. Instead of a 14 point lead, forcing the Catamounts into gaining three scores to win, the 10-point deficit was more inviting to them.

"They weren't confident until they got that score," Baker said. "If we had a bigger lead, it would have made them more disillusioned."

The Minutemen jumped out of the gate with two tries in the first half on a couple of physical, forward drives capped off by Mike Kenefick and Ryan Gillespie.

Vermont began moving the ball more successfully in the second half by giving their backs more touches. The soggy field conditions forced the ball to take some unexpected bounces that fooled UMass while the Catamounts used passing to keep the ball off of the sodden terrain.

The pitch was in poor condition on Saturday, resembling a marsh more than an actual field. With ruggers from both teams sporting brown uniforms as they were drenched with mud, Coach Baker thought the match had a classic feel to it.

"It was like watching an old-style football game," Baker said.

The field conditions on Sunday were decidedly better, and so was the play of the Minutemen. Nine minutes into the match, Shawn Brennan stepped in front of a Stony Brook pass, intercepting the ball and bringing it 70 yards downfield for the game's first try. Josh Reid, who handled the day's kicking duties, punched in the conversion to take a 7-0 lead.

Some 12 minutes later, a kick-ahead by Edaun Pickholz put UMass in a position near the opposing try-zone. Kenefick picked up the kick and relayed it to Josh Reid who dove over the goal line for a try. A Reid conversion extended the lead to 14-0.

On the last play of the first half, after strong rucking and mauling, the Minutemen forced themselves into the end-zone one more time. Kenefick converted a try followed by a Reid two-pointer to conclude the day's scoring.

The Catamounts pulled off another improbable rally on Sunday to beat Middlebury, 19-15, and capture the trophy. Along with Middlebury, the three teams earned spots in the national championship tournament next spring.

The national tournament will begin in April in Florida with 16 teams making the cut.

UMass will look forward to the Dec. 5 New England Rugby Football Union meetings in which it will be decided whether or not the former Division 1 school will move back up to those ranks next season.

Otto begins 24th year at UMass

Many fans might not know that Bonnie Otto is the woman behind the Minutemen. She's been the main secretary of the Massachusetts men's basketball team for over two decades.

Otto begins 24th year at UMass

By David Brinch
Collegian Staff

Twenty-four years and five head coaches later, Bonnie Otto's basketball knowledge has increased from when she first began working as the secretary for the Massachusetts basketball team.

"I didn't even know how many guys played on the court at one time, I knew nothing about basketball, and it took me a while for me to get interested in the sport," Otto says.

Otto was living in Turner Falls, Mass., and had another job working in a mail room for another company when her sister talked her into coming down to Amherst and applying to be the main secretary for the Minutemen. Otto made the trip, filled out an application and didn't really think much of it, until she got a call for an interview with then head coach, Ron Gerlufsen. The women's basketball coach, Barbra Stevens, also wanted Otto to be the secretary for the Minutewomen. She didn't know what she was getting herself into, but thought the interview went well. A few days later, Otto came back for a second interview, and Gerlufsen said if she wanted the job she could have it.

"Back in 1985 when I started here, basketball wasn't basketball like it is now at UMass. The team wasn't very successful, they never did anything the first few years that I was here and I really didn't think the job was that big of a deal, at first."

Then came John Calipari.

The Minutemen let Gurlufsen go at the end of the 1987-1988 season, after UMass finished with five losing seasons with him at the helm, and hired Calipari, an assistant coach from the University of Pittsburgh. Otto remembers the first time she met the second winningest coach in UMass basketball history.

"I met John in 1988, and I remember he looked so young. After he was hired, we had a little meeting. He told me that I was going to be so busy with just his calendar, I wouldn't know which way was up, and I didn't believe him, but it was true."

In his first season, the Minutemen didn't make much of an improvement, going 10-18 overall and 5-13 in the conference, finishing just one spot ahead in the final A-10 standings the year before.

But in 1989-1990, Calipari led the team to the National Invitational Tournament, the first postseason play for UMass since 1967. The Minutemen finished with a 17-14 record, the first winning record since 1977-1978. Over the next seven seasons, Calipari led the Minutemen to the Sweet 16, the second round of the NCAA Tournament twice, the Elite Eight and the memorable 1995-1996 Final Four season as well as No. 1 national rankings.

"I can remember back when John was here, it seemed like he was the most powerful person in the state, really, because he really was," Otto says, who hasn't talked to the new coach at the University of Kentucky in quite some time.

After Calipari left UMass for the NBA, Bruiser Flint took over the program for five seasons, followed by Steve Lappas. Both coaches had minimal success with the program, but not nearly the amount that Calipari brought to Amherst. However, Otto feels that personally, these were some of the most memorable times for her.

"I do miss the time of the '90s, we were like a family – the players, the coaches, me. We went to each others houses and we were all young."

When Travis Ford came in 2005, Otto felt another resurgence of the program, who enjoyed working for Ford for three seasons.

"He said once that sometimes it felt like I was his boss, instead of the other way around because after a while, you get to know what needs to be done around here."

After taking the job at Oklahoma State following the most wins in program history (25) and a trip to the NIT final, the coaching search was on again, with Otto working under her fourth coach in nine years.

That coach was Derek Kellogg.

Kellogg, a former point guard under Calipari and member of four straight regular season A-10 and Tournament Championship Minutemen teams, helped UMass reach the Elite Eight as a senior captain of the 1994-1995 team, and was named the 21st coach of the Minutemen in April of 2008.

Otto remembers Kellogg coming into the office a lot to talk to Calipari during his tenure at UMass, and admits that it is a little weird to have a former player as a boss now.

However, Otto feels that Kellogg is taking all the right steps to bring the program back to national prominence. And she's someone who would know, because she saw seeing the program at its worst and at its best.

"I think coach Kellogg is so involved in the community, and I see that a lot. He's doing a lot of what coach Calipari did when he first started here, trying to get the community and the student body involved in the program, and that's important. Everytime coach Kellogg gives a speech, I can hear coach Calipari."

While players, as well as seasons, come and go, Otto keeps in touch with former players like William Herndon, a captain on the 1991-1992 team that lead the Minutemen to the Sweet 16. She made cookies for Marcus Camby, travels with the team, sets up appointments and has a tradition in which she calls other coaches to wish them good luck before games.

"I still don't know the plays, they still don't mean anything to me, but at least now I know who plays what, what position and I can see the fouls when they happen now."

While her basketball knowledge might not be as strong as Kellogg's, Bonnie Otto has been a key component to the UMass basketball program, and will continue to be for years to come.

5 games to look for in upcoming season

Adam Miller

It has been awhile since the Massachusetts men's basketball team had a schedule as tough as the one it will have this year. UMass coach Derek Kellogg even goes as far as calling himself crazy at times for putting such a demanding schedule on such a young team.

But it's worth it for him if that's what it takes to get the best players to put on a Minuteman jersey and the Mullins Center sold out.

Looking at the schedule can be a little overwhelming when it comes to figuring out which games to mark on your calendar. That's why I'm here to list the top five games every UMass fan should care about during the 2009-10 season.

1. vs. Memphis, Dec. 19, Boston

The Tigers are nowhere near as good as they were last year, but they aren't bad either. The Minutemen will face better teams than Memphis, but this game is by far the most important.

The game is already scheduled to be on ESPN2 and the national spotlight will definitely overplay the awkwardness of this game. Former Memphis coach John Calipari originally scheduled this home-and-home state match-up to help his pupil bring UMass back to being a national program the way he did.

Instead, Calipari left the program for Kentucky and the Tigers are no longer a powerhouse, although still good enough to make the NCAA Tournament.

Aside from that, the Minutemen will play in TD Garden right at the start of winter break so many of the fans from Boston should have no problem making it out. If Kellogg has his way, there might even be some recruits watching.

2. vs. Michigan State/Florida, Nov. 28, Atlantic City, N.J.

Either UMass plays the No. 2 team in the country in the Associated Press poll or it plays a team that could easily make the Top 25 this year.

Regardless of what happens against Rutgers, the Minutemen will play their toughest opponent on this day and it will be at a truly neutral site. This will probably be the most important game in Kellogg's mind simply because UMass is guaranteed to play one of the top teams in the nation regardless of what happens the day before.

Ideally, Kellogg would like to pack his team's schedule full of neutral site games against top-tier opponents once it improves to a level where it can regularly compete against that caliber of teams.

For now, he will have to hope that the Minutemen can luck out against these types of opponents like they did last year when they beat Kansas by one point on the road.

3. vs. Xavier, Feb. 3, Amherst

This will be the best team to come to the Mullins Center all season, which automatically makes this one a draw. Xavier has a lot of potential to make the Top 25 this season and will probably do so at some point down the road.

The Musketeers were the highest seeded team from the Atlantic 10 during last year's NCAA Tournament and made it to the Sweet 16. Xavier probably won't be as strong as it was last season, but it is still in its own league with Dayton as far as the A-10 is concerned.

It will also be the half-way point of the A-10 schedule for UMass so Kellogg will have a pretty good idea of where his team's at by this point.

4. vs. Cornell, Nov. 18, Amherst

Cornell probably isn't what you think of when the list of good basketball schools comes to mind, but it's become one of the best mid-major programs in the country.

It made the NCAA Tournament last year as a 14-seed and has all five starters returning and also benefit from former Minuteman Max Groebe transferring to the Big Red. It won 21 games last year with a pretty competitive schedule so this game will certainly present a challenge for UMass.

It will also be the first home game for the Minutemen and that should draw a lot of attention to this game. I realize that this doesn't naturally have the appeal that the Boston College game has, but that game isn't in the main part of Boston and it's two days before Christmas.

I just don't see that getting the attention from UMass fans as much as Cornell will.

5. vs. Dayton, Feb. 27, Dayton, Ohio

This game is as tough as conference opponents get.

Dayton has been ranked as high as 19th and it has the roster to back it up. This meeting won't happen until almost the end of the season so it should be important as far as the A-10 Tournament goes and it will also help the Minutemen's RPI if they pull the win off.

The Flyers are good enough to go deep into the NCAA Tournament this year so it will be good preparation for whatever postseason situation UMass finds itself in this season.

It's exactly the kind of game Kellogg wants and he didn't even have to ask. Fortunately for the Minutemen, they don't have to worry about playing the best team in the A-10 for a long time.

In his second year at the helm, UMass coach Derek Kellogg brought in five solid recruits and two transfers in order to build the program back to national prominence.

Kellogg moving UM in correct direction

Jeffrey R. Larnard

When Derek Kellogg played for the Massachusetts men's basketball team, the team was much different than it is today.

Games were nationally televised, the Mullins Center was packed and the state was in love with the team.

Today, the attendance at a game could easily be counted in a matter of minutes, the team is not a powerhouse in the world of college basketball and there is very little national recognition for the team. But with a little more than a year under his belt, Kellogg has taken numerous steps in the right direction.

Kellogg wants to see things return to the way they used to be, and he has made that clear since the day he was named the head coach of the Minutemen. He also shows this desire in what he has done in just over a year of being at the helm.

"People at UMass want a national program, they want a team that's going to play against the best," Kellogg said. "I want to recruit the best players and we want to get national exposure and the only way you do that is by playing a national schedule."

First Kellogg has set up a schedule that gets UMass the national coverage it needs to become the team Kellogg wants. Last year, there was the opening game to ESPN's Midnight Madness against Memphis and an upset by the Minutemen on ESPN2 against the 2007-08 national champions, Kansas. UMass even played a game in Springfield, Mass., against Dayton to help encourage different parts of the state to follow the team.

This year, the schedule is no easier as Kellogg has given his young team an even tougher challenge. The Minutemen will face off with either Florida or Michigan State at the end of November in the Legends Classic tournament, Memphis on ESPN2 in Boston at the TD Garden, Davidson, Central Florida and Baylor. UMass plays again in Springfield, Mass., against La Salle in January as well to help spread the team's brand.

But Kellogg doesn't stop there in his pursuit to return the Minutemen to prominence. He is not just trying to get national recognition and hope for a few upset wins to help put UMass on the map; he's using the schedule as a recruiting tool, something he did very effectively this past year.

"The schedule is very difficult this year," Kellogg said. "I'm trying to recruit the kids who want to play at that level and the only way you do that is scheduling those types of games."

Kellogg brought in one of the top groups of freshman in the conference, if not in the country, proving his ability to recruit. He is also recruiting the players he wants that fit his system.

"I think we're a little more versatile because I have more guys who can play the way that I want to play," Kellogg said. "I think there's some merit that these guys are guys that I recruited and spent a lot of time with."

But Kellogg knows this is a process and UMass fans need to understand this too. You do not become a national powerhouse overnight or with one recruiting class. This is why many of UMass' big games this year are on the road. Next year those teams will travel to Amherst, and the freshman that are still learning Kellogg's system will be a year older with experience under their belts, and Kellogg will be hoping for more of the upsets like the teamit had against Kansas last year.

"It's a schedule that I want to continue to have so that when we get older and more mature, we can compete with those guys on the road, in a hostile environment and on television," Kellogg said.

Even more so, Kellogg knows this year may be tough especially at the beginning. The Minutemen are full of players who have yet to see time in a college basketball game, so there will be mistakes as the players get comfortable with the system. Kellogg just wants to see the players working hard.

"I'm going to have to put up with some turnovers in this offense early on because the guys are all new and we're trying to have them play faster than they've ever played before," Kellogg said. "But if they play hard, if they defend, if they go to the boards and if they have great attitudes, I'll live with that. I'll live with the consequences and the wins and losses."

The fact that Kellogg is willing to put up with mistakes and losses proves another thing: Kellogg has faith in this team and the players he assembled. He knows that if his players are putting in the time and effort, as well as always playing their hardest, the wins will come. He wouldn't put up with the mistakes and the losses if he thought otherwise.

There is a recipe that Kellogg is following, and right now he is gathering all of the ingredients. For UMass fans, they need to trust in what Kellogg is doing, and put up with the early losses just as Kellogg is doing, until all of the ingredients are mixed together and UMass has a basketball team that resembles those of Kellogg's playing days.

It may not come this year, or even the next, but under Kellogg, UMass will be a team the school, as well as the state, will fall in love with again.

UM administration considers charging new fee for building

By Matthew M. Robare
Collegian Staff

A $450 per-semester fee could be levied on undergraduates for a new classroom building if the University of Massachusetts administration accepts a motion from the Faculty Senate.

The new building would be located northeast of the campus pond, next to the Hasbrouck Laboratory.

A study done by the architectural firm Burt Hill suggests that in order to be on par with other major schools, UMass would need to spend $85 million on a new academic building. The firm compared classrooms and buildings at UMass to those at the other schools and found UMass facilities to be subpar in comparison.

"We need to renovate," said UMass Faculty Senate Secretary Ernest May. "We build all sorts of things, but the main purpose of the school is teaching, and we haven't addressed that."

May added that the useful life of a building is about 40 years, and in many cases, the buildings on campus are still used far beyond this expiration. Some buildings, most notably the University Apartments until just recently, are still in use despite having been condemned. May specifically mentioned South College as a building in need of renovation.

Originally the money for the new building was going to come from the state, but the "state has backed out on us," May said.

With the state facing large deficits for fiscal year 2011, it is unsurprising that they are unwilling and perhaps unable to fund a new building at UMass.

The University may need to raise part of the money in the form of more student fees.

May noted that there was a precedent, as students voted to fund the new Recreation Center through fees. May also stated that perhaps UMass administration would not go for the full $85 million building and instead choose a smaller, less well-equipped, but cheaper $40 million building, which would lower the required fee. May said that the question is whether students will be willing to pay a few hundred dollars more per semester in order to take classes in good rooms.

The proposed building would be, May said, "not exclusively classroom space." There would be some departmental space with a ratio of 60 percent classrooms to 40 percent offices. There would be auditoriums and regular classroom space.

May compared the Herter classrooms, with their desk chairs and limited space, to the classrooms commonly found in high schools, to what they want the classroom building to resemble, like the facilities in the Isenberg School of Management and the Integrated Sciences Building.

Several sites for the classroom building were considered, including the tennis courts near the Mullins Center, but the site near Hasbrouck Laboratory was chosen because of its centrality and ease of access for the largely pedestrian student populations of Sylvan, Orchard Hill and Central.

May was concerned about how the construction of the new classroom building will affect the already complex traffic and parking situations on North Pleasant Street.

"The campus needs parking structures," he said. May also said that flat, asphalt parking

University professor given service award for advocacy efforts

Dr. Mari Castañeda receives public service award.

Dr. Mari Castañeda, associate professor of communication at the University of Massachusetts, will be honored on Nov. 19 with the UMass President's Public Service Award.

Castañeda, who received her Ph.D in communication at the University of California, San Diego, in 2000, has worked extensively to create university and community partnerships that benefit the Latino/a population of Holyoke, Mass. Her work with the Community Outreach Partnership Center and as a faculty advisor for Student Bridges allowed Castañeda to advocate for improvement in education, economic development and housing in the Latino/a community in Holyoke, Mass.

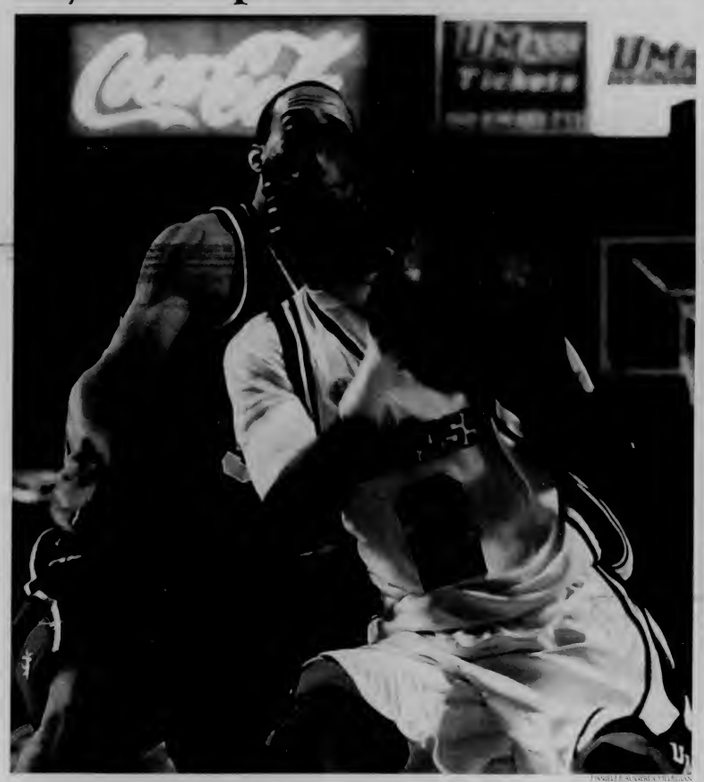
"I feel very honored [to receive this award]," said Castañeda. "Especially to be selected with an amazing group of UMass faculty, who are doing important work in the communities they're involved with."

This year's other honorees include professors David Terkla of UMass Boston, Matthew Roy of UMass Dartmouth, Kay Doyle of UMass Lowell and Linda Sagor of the UMass Medical School.

"As an educator working at a public university, it's very important for me to connect with communities outside the campus," said Castañeda. "Especially since UMass Amherst is a resource for all residents of the Commonwealth."

Castañeda also spoke on her experience being a Latina helping out the Latino/a community of Holyoke, Mass., and her work as a graduate student in which she worked for various student agencies that dealt with border issues and cross-national partnerships.

"My connections are not limited to Latino/a organizations or residents, but it so happens that my expertise and contributions are most valuable to those communities because of my scholarship and community engagement experience I have from when I used to live in Southern California," said Castañeda.



"But yes, as a professor that identifies as a Chicana/Latina, my involvement with Latino/a communities in Holyoke has been very fulfilling since my presence demonstrates that higher education is possible for Latinas," said Castañeda. "[Latina/os] currently constitute a small percentage of college students, and an even smaller percentage of college faculty, despite the Latino/a demographic across the U.S. being very large."

According to the Student Bridges website, the Student Bridges program is "a student-initiated outreach program that connects UMass students with local community-based organizations and schools through tutoring/mentoring partnerships, college awareness activities and policy advocacy." Student Bridges primarily partners with schools and programs in the Holyoke and Springfield, Mass., areas.

"She is pretty much amazing," said Ben Thompson, a junior philosophy and Spanish major, who is also the undergraduate programmatic coordi-

Ivy champs come to Mullins

Sophomore David Gibbs drives to the lane in a game last year. After losing Chris Lowe to graduation, the Minutemen will rely on Gibbs at point guard to be one of the team's leaders as they start the 2009-10 season against Cornell tonight.

By Adam Miller
Collegian Staff

Having a good basketball team is generally the last thing that comes to mind when considering Ivy League schools.

That stereotype is exactly why Massachusetts men's basketball coach Derek Kellogg feels uneasy about playing Cornell in the home opener tonight. Although the Big Red (1-0) doesn't have the reputation of Memphis or Michigan State, Kellogg still believes that the game against Cornell will be almost as tough.

Cornell returns all five of its starters and has a team made up of nine seniors.

This team isn't just experienced, but talented too, despite being from the Ivy League. Cornell earned the 14th seed in the 2008 and 2009 NCAA Tournaments. Its recent success earned it an Associated Press Top 25 vote in the preseason poll, and then beat Alabama, 71-67, in its first game of the season on the road.

"If you watch them, they don't really have a lot of things they don't do well," Kellogg said. "They're a solid defensive team and offensively, they play like they have six seniors. The more tape I've watched on them, the better I think they are. It's one of the better Ivy League teams that you'll see in a long time."

The Big Red was the unanimous favorite to win the Ivy League again this year, led by three All-Ivy selections as well as the Ivy Rookie and Defensive Players of the Year. Its top threat will be senior Ryan Wittman, who scored 23 points against the Crimson Tide and averaged 18.2 points per game last year.

Another player who figures to give UMass (0-1) a lot of trouble is seven-footer Jeff Foote (although Kellogg believes he's 7-1). The senior scored 17 points and added seven rebounds in the win against Alabama.

He presents a mismatch for the Minutemen, whose center Sean Carter is at least three inches shorter than Foote.

Kellogg knows that the experience Cornell has will present problems for UMass, which just came off an 84-67 loss to Central Florida on Nov. 13.

One of the biggest problems that Kellogg sees with his team playing the Big Red is that he's still trying to teach the Minutemen how to play smarter. He pointed to the quick shots against the Golden Knights

2010 class gift voting results to be revealed

By Sam Butterfield
Collegian Staff

The senior class will host senior night on Wednesday starting at 9 p.m. in the Graduate Lounge.

The 21-plus event will reveal the gift from the class of 2010 to the University of Massachusetts, which students had the opportunity to vote on from Oct. 26 until yesterday in the lobbies of the W.E.B. Du Bois Library and Marcus Hall. As of press time, the Senior Campaign Committee said it received some 1,700 votes.

Senior night will feature beer, music and free class of 2010 t-shirts for the first 100 seniors who arrive.

There will be a raffle with the chance to win a UMass sweatshirt, and students will also have the opportunity to share their fondest memory of their time at the University for the class of 2010 video diary.

The three options for the class gift include a potential multimedia and music center at the library, which the Campaign's website describes as "designed to foster collaboration," and a "state-of-the-art multimedia facility." The proposed center would be complete with workstations and production studios where students, faculty and staff will be able to create websites with multimedia components, including animation, videos and graphics to enhance projects, create their own soundtracks and borrow multimedia equipment, among other things.

The center will be located on the north side of the third floor of the library, and, if the class chooses to support the center, will be adorned with a plaque commemorating the class of 2010's contribution.

Another option is a proposed class of 2010 study abroad scholarship. The International Programs Office has agreed to match whatever amount the class of 2010 would provide for a study abroad scholarship that, according to the Campaign's site, would pay for round-trip airfare or awards of between $1,000 and $2,000 that would cover the difference between studying abroad and paying tuition and fees at UMass for a semester.

A third option is a Revolving Green Fund. The fund would help finance energy conservation and reduction initiatives around campus over time. The fund would be created by an initial stipend, and then a committee of students, faculty and staff would be chosen to oversee the fund and determine what projects will benefit from it. The fund aims to reduce the school's overall expenditures through finding ways to lower energy expenses and, through those savings, finance lots are inefficient and environmentally unfriendly, but noted that parking spaces are very expensive.

He pointed out that the University of Washington has a policy of adding two floors of underground parking whenever they build a new building, and that when faced with a similar traffic snarl at Harvard, they turned a street into a tunnel so the students could walk normally but the cars were shuffled underground.

However, he does not see such solutions as workable at UMass because of the expense and the fact that the town of Amherst, not the University, owns North Pleasant Street.

The UMass Faculty Senate meets on Dec. 15, and a motion to advise the University to build the new classroom facility will be on the agenda.

May said that the Faculty Senate is already willing to sponsor a poll in the spring semester to gauge student support for new fees for the building.

PHENOM to hold teach-in on budget

By Christa Romano
Collegian Staff

Students, staff and faculty at the University of Massachusetts will hold a teach-in this Thursday, Nov. 19, to discuss the context of the current budget crisis of public higher education in Massachusetts.

According to a release, The Public Higher Education Network of Massachusetts [PHENOM] encourages all to attend this teach-in in order to support and strengthen the organization's efforts to win back funding for higher education. The teach-in, titled "Budget Crisis: UMass at the Tipping Point," will take place from 12-1 p.m. in the Cape Cod Lounge of the UMass Student Union.

"For the first time ever, UMass students now contribute more to the campus budget than the state does?" said Outreach and Education Coordinator of the Student Government Association Sam Dreyfus in a release sent out on Nov. 17. "Can we even still call this public higher education?"

UMass, as well as other state and community colleges in Massachusetts, have lost $62 million in state funding since the Gov. Deval Patrick announced mid-year cuts on Oct. 29, 2009. While this funding is currently being replaced by federal fiscal stimulus funds, PHENOM anticipates the need to advocate for both state and additional federal resources for next year and beyond.

"UMass at the Tipping Point" will include personal statements from each speaker, several of whom are students at UMass, explaining how the budget cut is personally impacting him or her, coming from the perspectives of students, staff and faculty. Moderators will be present to put the stories in context and explain how the current budget trends are potentially leaving the campus administration with few and undesirable choices.

"One of our goals is to demonstrate that we are all in the same boat. Faculty and staff don't benefit from fee increases, and students are harmed when staff and faculty are on the chopping block," said Louise Antony, a professor in the philosophy department and member of the statewide board of PHENOM, in the same release sent out on Nov. 17.

nator for Student Bridges. "It is great to have a faculty member, such as Mari, spend so much time mentoring us."

Castañeda will be stepping down from the position of faculty advisor for Student Bridges this year, at which point she will assess her next project involving the Holyoke and Springfield, Mass., communities.

Dr. Castañeda described how her family and experience growing up in a "low-income environment" shaped her choice of career and community advocacy.

"Although I grew up in a low-income environment, my family emphasized learning and were very supportive of my educational pursuits," said Castañeda.

"At an early age, I loved and enjoyed school," said Castañeda. "I pursued every opportunity that would enhance my education. When I was a kid and found out that I could spend the rest of my life in academic study by working as professor, I knew right then and there that this is what I wanted to do as a career."

"And the fact that it would also allow me the space to intersect research and praxis was even better news," said Castañeda. Throughout her early life, Castañeda was influenced by people involved in higher education, including college students that visited her high school.

"In addition to my mom, my aunts are perhaps some of the greatest influences in my life. My Tia Letty and Tia Rosy were both college students when I was growing up, and seeing the impact of their university courses on their lives was really inspiring for me," said Castañeda. According to Castañeda, her aunts were both Fulbright Scholars."My teachers also made connections with local colleges in the area where I grew up. Having college students in the classroom, tutoring students and discussing college also opened a world of possibility that I knew existed, but I hadn't really discussed with someone close to my age," said Castañeda.

"To those college students [who came to my high school], I would say 'thank you for taking time out of your busy schedule to mentor and tutor kids that were often written off because of their socioeconomic class and ethnicity. Your generosity and non-judgment will forever be appreciated,'" said Castañeda.

Dr. Shirley Mietlicki-Floyd, former grant investigator of the Community Outreach Partnership Center [COPC], expressed her agreement with the decision to give Castañeda the Public Service Award.

"Professor Castañeda was a person not only interested in the needs and concerns of the local Holyoke residents but an advocate for them," said Mietlicki-Floyd.

"Through our COPC project, [Castañeda] was beneficial in building the capacity of community residents, of facilitating an exchange of college and community people between Puerto Rico and Holyoke and in helping residents express their culture and heritage through a calendar," said Mietlicki-Floyd. "She was always very willing to offer her time, expertise and varied experiences to the COPC project and the community as well."

Castañeda also discussed in an interview over e-mail her experience with her students who continue to seek to contribute to their own communities.

"I think it's important for UMass students to have experiences where they are connecting with off-campus communities, whether those communities are different than them or not," said Castañeda.

"Based on my experience as a college professor, 90 percent of my former students have repeatedly shared with me that their community engagement experiences were some of the best memories they have about UMass," said Castañeda.

The savings produced by projects within the fund will continue to be put back into the green fund until the initial investment in the fund is repaid, allowing the fund to continue to grow and produce more savings.

The Senior Campaign Committee started in 1917. According to the Campaign's mission statement, it began "as a way for graduating students to say thank you for the experiences and opportunities that UMass Amherst provided them, by presenting a gift to the University."

According to Stephanie Flaherty, head of the Senior Campaign Committee, this year's goal is for the class to pledge $40,000 towards whichever package it chooses. The class of 2009 pledged more than $37,000 to its gift, a juice bar and lounge in the new Recreation Center.

lots are inefficient and environmentally unfriendly, but noted that parking spaces are very expensive.

He pointed out that the University of Washington has a policy of adding two floors of underground parking whenever they build a new building, and that when faced with a similar traffic snarl at Harvard, they turned a street into a tunnel so the students could walk normally but the cars were shuffled underground.

However, he does not see such solutions as workable at UMass because of the expense and the fact that the town of Amherst, not the University, owns North Pleasant Street.

The UMass Faculty Senate meets on Dec. 15, and a motion to advise the University to build the new classroom facility will be on the agenda.

May said that the Faculty Senate is already willing to sponsor a poll in the spring semester to gauge student support for new fees for the building.

PHENOM to hold teach-in on budget

By Christa Romano
Collegian Staff

Students, staff and faculty at the University of Massachusetts will hold a teach-in this Thursday, Nov. 19, to discuss the context of the current budget crisis of public higher education in Massachusetts.

According to a release, The Public Higher Education Network of Massachusetts [PHENOM] encourages all to attend this teach-in in order to support and strengthen the organization's efforts to win back funding for higher education. The teach-in, titled "Budget Crisis: UMass at the Tipping Point," will take place from 12-1 p.m. in the Cape Cod Lounge of the UMass Student Union.

"For the first time ever, UMass students now contribute more to the campus budget than the state does?" said Outreach and Education Coordinator of the Student Government Association Sam Dreyfus in a release sent out on Nov. 17. "Can we even still call this public higher education?"

UMass, as well as other state and community colleges in Massachusetts, have lost $62 million in state funding since the Gov. Deval Patrick announced mid-year cuts on Oct. 29, 2009. While this funding is currently being replaced by federal fiscal stimulus funds, PHENOM anticipates the need to advocate for both state and additional federal resources for next year and beyond.

"UMass at the Tipping Point" will include personal statements from each speaker, several of whom are students at UMass, explaining how the budget cut is personally impacting him or her, coming from the perspectives of students, staff and faculty. Moderators will be present to put the stories in context and explain how the current budget trends are potentially leaving the campus administration with few and undesirable choices.

"One of our goals is to demonstrate that we are all in the same boat. Faculty and staff don't benefit from fee increases, and students are harmed when staff and faculty are on the chopping block," said Louise Antony, a professor in the philosophy department and member of the statewide board of PHENOM, in the same release sent out on Nov. 17.

UM professor receives honor

nator for Student Bridges. "It is great to have a faculty member, such as Mari, spend so much time mentoring us."

Castañeda will be stepping down from the position of faculty advisor for Student Bridges this year, at which point she will assess her next project involving the Holyoke and Springfield, Mass., communities.

Dr. Castañeda described how her family and experience growing up in a "low-income environment" shaped her choice of career and community advocacy.

"Although I grew up in a low-income environment, my family emphasized learning and were very supportive of my educational pursuits," said Castañeda.

"At an early age, I loved and enjoyed school," said Castañeda. "I pursued every opportunity that would enhance my education. When I was a kid and found out that I could spend the rest of my life in academic study by working as professor, I knew right then and there that this is what I wanted to do as a career."

"And the fact that it would also allow me the space to intersect research and praxis was even better news," said Castañeda.Throughout her early life, Castañeda was influenced by people involved in higher education, including college students that visited her high school.

"In addition to my mom, my aunts are perhaps some of the greatest influences in my life. My Tia Letty and Tia Rosy were both college students when I was growing up, and seeing the impact of their university courses on their lives was really inspiring for me," said Castañeda. According to Castañeda, her aunts were both Fulbright Scholars."My teachers also made connections with local colleges in the area where I grew up. Having college students in the classroom, tutoring students and discussing college also opened a world of possibility that I knew existed, but I hadn't really discussed with someone close to my age," said Castañeda.

"To those college students [who came to my high school], I would say 'thank you for taking time out of your busy schedule to mentor and tutor kids that were often written off because of their socioeconomic class and ethnicity. Your generosity and non-judgment will forever be appreciated,'" said Castañeda.

Dr. Shirley Mietlicki-Floyd, former grant investigator of the Community Outreach Partnership Center [COPC], expressed her agreement with the decision to give Castañeda the Public Service Award.

"Professor Castañeda was a person not only interested in the needs and concerns of the local Holyoke residents but an advocate for them," said Mietlicki-Floyd.

Fort Hood and Islam

Subhan Tariq

I remember sitting at a table filled with people when I got a text from CNN. It read, "CNN Breaking News: At least seven people killed and 12 wounded in a mass shooting at Fort Hood, Texas, a Pentagon official says." At that moment, I remember reading the text message and saying, "Please God, let it not be a Muslim." Lo and behold, only a few hours later, I would have my response via another CNN Breaking News text. This time, "Alleged Fort Hood gunman U.S. Army Maj. Nidal Malik Hasan is alive and in custody." At the end of it all, 13 were left dead, 29 injured and millions were scarred.

The Onion is an online parody news source which did a brief story on the Fort Hood shootings a week after they happened. In it, they describe the reactions of Muslims as saying "Hey, great, eight years of progress right down the shitter – and you just had to scream 'Allahu Akbar' while you did it, didn't you? May as well have put on a turban and rode a [expletive] camel right through the army base, you dick. Thanks for making the foreseeable future a living hell for normal, peace-loving Muslims in this country. Really appreciate it!" Even though the Onion is supposed to be a parody site, I felt exactly this way. It is amazing how close parody imitates reality.

Major Hasan, you are an absolute fool. What were you possibly thinking when you attacked those at the Fort? What made you want to take their lives, and what did you possibly think would happen to you? Did you really think you would be able to get away? If you didn't want to live or didn't want to get deployed, do something different – that isn't a reason to not only ruin your own life but also the lives of peace-loving Muslims in the United States.

All of the progress that Muslims have made since 9/11 has been damaged by your stupid and illogical actions. Everything we've worked so hard for is once again going to be called into question. Every time a Muslim now wants to join the armed services, their intentions will be questioned. Every time a Muslim wants to learn how to fly a plane, their intentions will be questioned. Even the pursuit of medicine will now be questioned. You, sir, have single handedly set us back as a society simply because you didn't want to go to Afghanistan to serve in the military you signed up to serve.

All of the progress that Muslims have made since 9/11 has been damaged by your stupid and illogical actions.

Why didn't you just quit? Why didn't you hold your head up and say "I don't want to serve in Afghanistan"? Why instead did you decide to kill and injure those whose purpose it is to protect us as Americans? As President Obama said so fittingly at the memorial service for the fallen, "No faith justifies these murderous and craven acts; no just and loving God looks upon them with favor. And for what he has done, we know that the killer will be met with justice – in this world and the next."

Do you even know anything about the religion you seem to have tried to defend? The Islamic religion commands believers to obey the laws of the land they live in. Muslim jurists consider citizenship to be a covenant held between the citizen and the state, one which guarantees security in exchange for certain obligations such as obeying the laws of the land; covenants are considered sacredly binding in Islam. As the Qur'an states, "...and fulfill every covenant. Verily, you will be held accountable with regard to the covenants" (17:34).

On Friday, as I was walking with a friend to a dorm building, we passed by a large group of drunk males.

One looked at me and said "Don't blow up the fucking towers." As I turned to respond, I was reminded of life in a post-9/11 society, one where people have defined actions by ignorant individuals as "going Muslim."

The term "going Muslim" was recently coined by a professor at NYU who "would describe the turn of events where a seemingly integrated Muslim-American – a friendly doughnut vendor in New York, say, or an officer in the U.S. Army at Fort Hood – discards his apparent integration into American society and elects to vindicate his religion in an act of messianic violence against his fellow Americans."

This is utterly ludicrous. Every major Islamic organization in the United States has condemned the attack as being a cowardly and heinous crime against our common humanity. It is one thing to talk about the actions of Major Hasan; it is quite another to argue that any Muslim can one day turn on those closest to him or her.

This is utterly false. I am a proud American and a proud Muslim and would never do anything to hurt those around me. To suggest an entire group of people is capable of violence simply because of the religion they practice is just as backwards as saying that a racial or ethnic group is more likely to commit violent criminal acts.

The greatest tragedy that comes out of the attacks of Fort Hood is not how Muslims will be treated; rather, the tragedy is truly felt by the families of the victims of this massacre. The fathers and mothers left without a child, the children left without a father or mother. They are the ones who will have to live with this tragedy each and every day for the rest of their lives.

Major Hasan faces the death penalty for his crimes, yet once again we are the ones left with the raw end of the deal. Muslims are once again forced into the role of defending themselves and their religion when they have done nothing wrong. May God help us all.

Mishandling of Levasseur

It has been nearly a week since a panel discussion entitled "The Great Western Massachusetts Sedition Trial: 20 Years Later," drew criticism for its invitation of convicted bomber Raymond Luc Levasseur. The University of Massachusetts remains under the microscope.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian thinks it's worth looking back on how the situation was handled by University and state leadership.

Massachusetts Gov. Deval Patrick was clearly more concerned about improving his image among police officers than with upholding the values of public education when he called publicly for UMass to rescind its invitation to Levasseur. As the week unfolded in a dizzying back-and-forth over the forum, the event became a public relations gaffe that hurt the image of his administration and the University.

The W.E.B. Du Bois Library holds a Colloquium on Social Change each year. According to the Department of Special Collections website, the event builds upon "the activist legacy of W.E.B. Du Bois," collecting "primary materials relating to individuals and groups devoted to the political, economic, spiritual and social transformation of American society."

Levasseur, the former leader of the United Freedom Front, an organization responsible for multiple bombings across the United States in protest to American military action abroad – as well as the murder and attempted murder of police officers – was supposed to take part in this year's forum. Levasseur is either a terrorist or a freedom fighter, depending on whom you ask. Yet it's hard to argue that he isn't a living, breathing primary document.

Levasseur was a defendent in the most expensive court case in Massachusetts history, when he and six of his cohorts were tried in a Springfield, Mass., courthouse for seditious conspiracy in 1989. Seven people were accused of trying to overthrow the U.S. government, 20 miles away from this campus, 20 years ago. It was clearly a historic event, and its 20th anniversary a prime opportunity to examine its significance.

This was not a celebration of revolution; it was a forum on an historic event. The legal history of the United States is populated by ne'er-do-wells, some of them much worse than Levasseur. The protections in our constitution, which were upheld on that day in Springfield, Mass., in 1989, exist not to protect the law-abiding. They exist to protect the Ray Levasseurs.

Yet the portrayal of this event in the mainstream media as an endorsement of radical violence resonated loudly when hundreds of members of fraternal police organizations descended on campus with signs that read "UMass Supports Terrorism Recruitment."

Even more troubling was administrative reaction to UMass professors who invited Levasseur back to campus in spite of Gov. Patrick's request. Chancellor Robert C. Holub called it controversy for its own sake. UMass system President Jack Wilson said the University never wanted him to speak, anyway.

If they really felt this way, they would have stepped in at the onset of controversy, not after being shamed into it.

Patrick's handling was equally puzzling, because in the end all it took was a phone call to a parole officer to keep Levasseur at home in Maine. Faced with a governor overstepping his authority and demanding a University event be censored – and an administration too weak willed to fight back – how could UMass professors be expected to act any differently than they did? How could anyone expect to silence the organizers of a colloquium on social justice?

For the record, neither Patrick, Wilson or Holub bothered to go to the event, even though Mr. Levasseur stayed home. They likely would have been disappointed. It really wasn't very controversial.

Unsigned editorials represent the majority opinion of The Massachusetts Daily Collegian's Editorial Board.

How much do professors care about speech?

Freedom of speech gained the support of a surprising group of people last week – the University of Massachusetts faculty.

I say surprising because in my three years at UMass, this is the first time I've seen our professors take such a vigorous public stand for the First Amendment. And apparently it took a convicted domestic terrorist to get them to do it.

After a lecture by political terrorist Ray Luc Levasseur was cancelled by the University amid massive statewide protests, five academic departments teamed together last week to re-invite him. "There were many faculty that were alarmed that freedom of speech on the UMass campus could be so compromised and so ... many large departments, after polling their faculty, decided to sponsor this event," said social thought and political economy professor Sara Lennox.

Their gesture is certainly appreciated, but where in the world were these faculty members during the numerous other rampant free speech violations at UMass over the past few years? Forgive my cynicism, but is it possible that maybe, just maybe, their newfound romance with the First Amendment has something to do with Levasseur's radical left-wing politics?

Professor Lennox denied that ideology was a driving factor behind the faculty's support of Levasseur, and said the professors invited him "not because any support the ideas, but because freedom of speech is sacred in this country."

But Freedom for Individual Rights in Education (FIRE), an organization that tracks constitutional violations on university campuses, questioned the faculty's motives. While FIRE's Robert Shirley applauded the University's support of Levasseur's free speech rights in a Nov. 10 blog post, he also noted that, "what UMass has persistently displayed is an appalling double standard through which controversial views on the 'left' side of the political spectrum are defended as free speech while controversial views on the 'right' are censored and punished either directly or through a variety of disgraceful artifices."

History appears to support FIRE's conclusion. In recent years, UMass professors have acted noticeably apathetic when the speech rights of conservative speakers and organizations have been violated.

In recent years, UMass professors have acted noticeably apathetic when the speech rights of conservative speakers and organizations have been violated.

For example, just last March, a lecture by conservative author Don Feder was viciously shouted down by left-wing protesters. Many students on campus were outraged at the way Feder was treated and columns in the Boston Globe, Human Events and RealClearPolitics.com forcefully condemned the protesters' violation of Feder's right to speak.

The number of professors who publicly spoke up in support of Feder? Zero. Apparently, their notion that "freedom of speech cannot be abridged" doesn't extend to controversial conservative authors.

The faculty was also conspicuously silent last April when 100 copies of The Minuteman, UMass' conservative student newspaper, were stolen by protesters. The incident was videotaped, written up on news sites like the Huffington Post, and well-publicized on campus.

But not a single professor publicly backed The Minuteman's freedom of the press. Ditto a few days later when the student government voted to suspend The Minuteman from campus unless the newspaper issued a public apology for unfounded allegations of slander.

Perhaps the UMass faculty's leanings are best illustraied by an event that occurred two years prior. In May of 2007, anti-war protesters tried to pressure the University into cancelling an honorary degree reception for former President Bush's Chief of Staff Andrew Card. The reception was set to take place during the spring commencement. When the University refused to cancel it, hundreds of protesters booed and shouted so loudly during the commencement that they drowned out Card's portion of the ceremony. All he could do was stand on-stage waving his award mutely, as activists barraged him with verbal invective.

Where was the UMass faculty during this incident? Well, joining in on the protest, of course. According to a May 26, 2007 Associated Press article, mobs of professors stood onstage right behind Card where they booed and unfurled humungous signs hand-painted with slogans like "War criminal, go home!"

And go home Card did – without a chance to give the acceptance speech traditional of honorary degree recipients.

So what brought about the faculty's sudden respect for civil discourse?

Maybe it was because some of them can commiserate with Levasseur's radical beliefs. Levasseur was a known Marxist when he founded and led the terrorist group called the United Freedom Front in the 1970s. Coincidentally, the four most vocal newfound "free speech" zealots in the faculty – Professor Lennox, Professor Dan Clawson, Professor Lisa Henderson and Professor David Kotz – also appear to have Marxist ties.

The July/August 2000 newsletter of the American Sociological Association – an organization that Clawson belongs to – described Clawson as "a Marxist and feminist." Lennox and Henderson have both been featured speakers at the Rethinking Marxism conferences. And as for Kotz, he served as vice president of the Academy of Marxism, according to a July 28, 2008 Political Affairs magazine article.

This column isn't a rant against Marxism – I could care less what type of silliness faculty members are involved in. But if these professors want to support a domestic terrorist, they should at least be honest about their motives. Pretending that their interest stems out of some courageous defense of the First Amendment is not just a poor example to students, it's also intellectually disingenuous.

Avoiding family feuds and fits over the holidays

Can anyone believe that it is the middle of November already? With the air cool and dry and the colorful leaves swirling down from the treetops, it's a little surprising that another semester is almost over.

While I greatly lament that fact, the good news is that the holidays are right around the corner.

H.C. Wang

I may not be religious when it comes to celebrating Christmas, Hanukkah or any other end-of-the-year holiday, but I do love the atmosphere this time of year brings. Everyone knows that one's own family is often not the easiest to get along with.

Maybe it's because a person's family are the people who know that person best, and therefore know how to push all the right buttons.

With the start of holiday season madness just days away, I bring some free advice.

To continue with my series of articles on how to better interpersonal relationships, the holidays are an especially crucial time for working on familial interaction.

One reason for this is that conflict in a relationship is inevitable.

Depending on the length of any given relationship, the people involved have an exponentially longer running tab on their opinions and observations of one another.

An immediate family generally lives together, sharing a limited amount of space, very much involved in each other's business. In just the standard-sized American family of parents and their kids, there is a complicated group dynamic that needs to be considered that is much different from a one-on-one relationship. There is, of course, that sort of relationship between the parents. Then there is the generational factor between parents and their offspring. If there is more than one child in the household, throw in the various types of sibling dynamics for even more craziness. And again, that is only the immediate family unit.

Whenever the holidays roll around, the extended family adds a completely new level of potential dysfunctional to the mix.

These are people that have existed together for a long time, with years and years to build up unresolved conflict.

Getting the whole family together for a reunion with alcoholic holiday drinks on the menu could be a recipe for disaster. So how does one survive the holidays without too much of a scene erupting?

It's always difficult when conflict between family members arises and there is no apology exchanged or other resolution reached.

It's always difficult when conflict between family members arises and there is no apology exchanged or other resolution reached.

Even when all sides are outwardly polite and appear to have moved on, feelings of pain and mistrust are harbored.

Family gatherings are definitely not the time to revisit these past hurts. This can be dealt with in one of three ways:

The most obvious step is to confront and try to resolve the conflict. Although this is the solution that usually comes to mind, it is not always the easiest method.

This works if, and only if, all sides involved are committed to working through the problems in a civil, mature manner.

Get them on their own; don't make grand gestures of public apology with the whole family to witness. That could do more harm than good because there is less control over the situation when a peanut gallery is present.

If that kind of resolution seems unlikely, then it is better to simply forgive and forget. I dislike the phrase "turn the other cheek," but forgiveness is about being the better person. It doesn't mean opening oneself up to be wronged again.

It's just about letting go of feelings of resentment and anger. It is possible to be careful with what to expect in the future from the person who caused offense without presently harboring ill will.

When all else fails, it may be necessary to do some social cleansing. This is hard when it's a family member.

However, I am of the mind that relationships with family members should be treated like relationships with any other person. If someone is opposed to being treated a certain way, should he accept it if it comes from family? Why should he have to?

Family should be whatever a person makes it out to be, including whoever he wants to be a deserving part of it.

Surrounding oneself with good friends can be a suitable replacement for woeful family units.

Family is what one is born into against his will. Just because someone is related by blood, it is not a free pass for poor behavior.

If what the other person did was abusive and there's absolutely no remorse or reason to expect anything different in the future, severely limit contact with this person or cut off contact altogether. Just say no. Your emotional health and sanity will thank you.

Gas station cuisine: bargains and gems

By Brendan Murphy
Collegian Correspondent

Just imagine: You're driving down the road, and that little yellow light comes on signaling you're out of gas. Finding the cheapest place to fill up may be your number one priority, but knowing the best gas station to get a quick, cheap and delicious snack should influence your decision as well. The Hess station in South Amherst, Mass., the 7-Eleven in Sunderland, Mass., and the Cumberland Farms on College Street are great places where you can fill up your tank while tackling your hunger.

The Hess station in South Amherst, Mass., is open 24/7, and has a Subway sandwich shop inside. This particular Subway offers monthly deals to college students with a student ID. In the past, they have offered six-inch veggie delights and meatball subs for just $2 a piece; this month, they are offering BLTs and Italian sandwiches for the same deal.

However, the hot dogs are probably the least appetizing here compared to the other three destinations. Whether you go at 9 a.m. or 10 p.m., their hot dogs are rolling away on the cooker, shriveled to the point where they look like a dead man's finger. The condiment selection is limited to the standard ketchup, mustard and relish. Their frozen food selection is also lacking, mainly confined to Stouffer's TV dinners and Hot Pockets. The strengths of the Hess station are definitely the Subway station, free air for your tires and the 32 oz. Powerade bottles which sell for a buck a piece, perfect to inexpensively restore those electrolytes after a long night.

The 7-Eleven by Seven O's in Sunderland, Mass., is also open 24/7 and an excellent destination to get a gas station hot dog. For 99 cents, you can purchase a hot dog with all the fixings, including free chili and cheese, questionably fresh vegetables such as onions, sauerkraut, jalapenos and tomatoes, as well as all the favorites – ketchup, mustard and relish. They even stock spicy mustard packets for the bolder bunch.

Station-goers can also choose from a variety of freshly made sandwiches, 10 oz. chicken parmesan subs or a breakfast sandwich. All contain generous amounts of meat, condiments and surprisingly fresh vegetables. A personal favorite is the microwaveable 14 oz. "bumb" burritos that can satisfy even Suge Knight's hunger. Go-go taquitos are another staple of the 7-Eleven diet, and can't be missed when stopping by one of these highway oases. Flavors range from jalapeno cheddar to steak and cheese.

In addition to the fresh sandwiches and burritos – which are thawed, not frozen – the rest stop has the widest selection of bottled beverages that simply can't be found elsewhere. Calypso lemonade and Celsius green tea calorie burners are just a couple of the rare and delicious beverages sold here. If the delicious food and bottled beverages weren't enough to sell you, this 7-Eleven also has a selection of slushies to keep you cooled down in the summertime.

The weak points of 7-Eleven, however, are the frozen food and slushie selection. The Hess station mentioned above lacks in slushie variety as well, showing that the superior destination for a slushie will always be Cumberland Farms.

For only 79 cents for any sized drink, a driver can swing into a Cumberland Farms and purchase a slushie to go. The reason why Cumby's slushies are vastly superior to 7-Eleven slushies lies in what is known as the "NRG Kick." This heaven-sent slushie is not only the best tasting frozen sugar and water blend in the world, but it also contains caffeine. This wake-up blast is one of the best mixers around to mask vodka, so cheap it can double as paint thinner.

The Cumby's on College Street near Michael's Billiards offers a glimpse into what all Cumby's stations will be in the coming years. This station is open all day and night, and features hot food all the time. The hot dog selection is the best you'll find around town, including traditional tube steaks as well as the cheddar-stuffed Hillshire Farms kind. Cumby's also offers a Dunkin Donuts-style menu that includes breakfast sandwiches and hash browns anytime. If you opt for one of the fresh Jimmy Dean breakfast sandwiches, an 8 oz. El Monterey burrito, or an Italian sausage, the attendants will even heat them up. Other great deals include $2 quarts of sherbet, and two-liter colas for only a buck. Their brand-new coffee machine offers all sizes of coffee, lattes or cappuccinos for only a dollar per cup, as well.

If what you crave is a hot dog, your best bets are at a Cumby's or 7-Eleven. But if it's a Subway sandwich you're seeking, swing down to the Hess station in South Amherst, Mass. The best variety of late-night food goes in favor of Cumby's. No matter what you're craving any time of the day or night, it's a relief to know that late-night munchies are just a gas stop away.

Middle Eastern, Mediterranean meals made at Moti in Amherst

By Andrew Sheridan
Collegian Staff

There are certain foods that every American is familiar with. Whether or not you have ever eaten Peking duck, tasted genuine antipasti or learned the difference between empanadas and fajitas, the regional cooking styles behind them should be instantly familiar. There are countless other culinary traditions, however, that remain a mystery to the general populace, and as the melting pot continues to boil, new and interesting styles continue to emerge. In this spirit of diversity, a brand-new restaurant called Moti is bringing the flavors of the Middle East and the Mediterranean to Amherst.

Moti is owned and operated by chef Reza Rahnani and is named after his mother, a celebrated Bostonian restaurateur. Located in Amherst Center, the eatery serves up a variety of Persian and Mediterranean cuisine, drawing from traditional family recipes. The Persian style is marked by flavorful spice mixtures and marinades, as well as liberal amounts of onions and rice.

What strikes the diner upon opening up a Moti menu is the health of the options available. While plenty of organic beef and lamb dishes are available, most of the menu follows a decidedly lean trend, and, in contrast to many European styles, which tend to douse main courses in cream or cheese sauces, the Mediterranean traditions lean more towards yogurt, onion and chickpea.

Even where meat is absent, it is hardly missed, as the variety of flavors and textures is enough to satisfy the pallet in dishes such as creamy lentils and falafel sandwiches.

Appetizers offer light fare that are packed with flavor. They range from the familiar hummus platter to the decidedly more exotic dolmades, a mixture of rice and herbs wrapped in grape leaves whose acidic flavor can be a bit overwhelming.

From there, the menu continues on in a more consistent manner. Many items come wrapped in pita bread or served in a pocket, and whether they feature lamb, chicken or falafel, every sandwich is stuffed with fresh vegetables and homemade sauce.

Seasonings are top-notch at Moti, with all of their meats and poultry marinated in-house, and, although the taste of saffron is nearly omnipresent, it is never overwhelming. Ground beef has rarely seemed so exciting.

Those entrees which do not come wrapped in flatbread are served over a bed of well-cooked basmati rice. This long-grain rice is not simply a background ingredient but a dietary staple, and it serves to absorb the sauces and flavors of the headlining ingredients.

One such item that stood out as a winner is the "famous N.Y. chicken/lamb and rice." Served with a yogurt-ranch house dressing, the combination of chicken, lamb and veggies is tossed with gyro flatbread and basmati for a fresh and satisfying meal.

Portions at Moti are decent, but not overly large. Most items on the menu range from $5 to $8 and will serve as a respectable lunch, but for those interested in really filling up should look to the larger dinner platters. These are priced at around $15 and are filled out with skewers of Kabob and roasted vegetables.

Other notable items at Moti include specialty drinks, which vary from the tangy and refreshing to the downright sour, like yogurt-based Doogh.

While in past years the cozy location next to Antonio's has been a sand trap for aspiring restaurants, this one may buck the trend. Available for take-out or dining in, Moti serves simple, tasty ethnic cuisine from traditional family recipes. And while every item may not be suited for the timid American, there is sure to be something on the menu for everyone.

Lars Von Trier fills audiences with awe following 'Antichrist'

By Mark Schiffer
Collegian Staff

What may be one of the more important pieces of information to know about "Antichrist" is that if you are going to the movies to watch John Cusack save the world and his family in slow motion, you probably have wandered into the wrong theater. Actually, let me take that back. There is no way you could simply wander into the wrong theater, because "Antichrist" has been exiled to one evening screening a day at Pleasant Street Theater, giving the typical audience member little opportunity to view it. It is an unfortunate situation, but up until late last week, it seemed as if the Five Colleges community wasn't going to have access to the film at all. So in the long run, we really should count our blessings.

Whatever the case, "Antichrist" is a film to see if only an opinion can be developed about it. The end result of Lars Von Trier's attempt to work through a period of intense depression, it is a film shrouded in gloom and anger. It tells the tale of a couple described only as He and She (played by Charlotte Gainsbourg and Willem Dafoe) who, in a gorgeously photographed dialogue-less prologue, experience the loss of their son. Gainsbourg's intense feelings of loss and fits of anxiety are coolly received by therapist husband Dafoe. As a therapeutic device, He takes She to their cabin in the woods, as that is where She describes much of where her fear sprouts from. It is here that the majority of the film takes place and where we witness the breakdown of their marriage and common humanity.

Much has been written about the controversial genitalia-related sequences, so there is no need to discuss them at length here. I will only say this: They are disgusting, horrifying and exhilarating. Although other reviewers have found it necessary to spoil these scenes for readers, this one will keep them under wraps. Suffice it to say that they, like the rest of the film, function perfectly as visceral experiences. The reaction you will have to some sequences in "Antichrist" will come from a place deep inside, one which draws from the very same fears depicted in the film.

Gainsbourg and Dafoe deserve multiple awards for the portrayals given here, but it is not likely that they will receive them. Both actors give what are most likely the bravest performances of either of their acting careers, but in the process, they are degraded before our eyes in ways previously unheard of. This kind of bravery is unfortunately not likely to win them any awards, but recognition should still be given.

Lars Von Trier developed a reputation for misanthropic ideas in his films, but much like the acting highs provided by the two leads, "Antichrist" takes this aspect to new levels of intensity. It is difficult to walk out of this film with anything but a feeling of dread in one's stomach. It is almost a shame, because in terms of its filmmaking, "Antichrist" is a work to truly be contended with. Every frame of this film feels pored over, providing equal amounts of beauty and horror at every moment.

To be honest, this film isn't going to work for every audience. It draws from a fear deep inside of us all, and not everybody is going to be happy to see such intense horrors depicted onscreen. However, Lars Von Trier deserves to be commended for his bravado. It took courage to make and release this film to American theaters, and it is unfortunate that it is presently being smuck under the radar by distributors. One can only hope that this kind of spiritual cinema – for this is, at heart, a spiritual film – continues to be released.

"I hope they realize that what I'm telling them is that you don't have to be part of your own demise," Kellogg said. "Don't give the other team stuff when they don't really earn it at times."

Kellogg is also looking for some of his other veterans to step up, especially after he saw what a poor shooting Ricky Harris does for UMass. Harris shot 5-for-15 against UCF with 15 points on the night.

The only two other players to score in double figures were guards Anthony Gurley and Freddie Riley, but nobody could match the 26-point onslaught that came from Golden Knights guard Isaac Sosa.

Kellogg understands that the Minutemen may have to deal with a player who scores just as easily with Wittman. What he cares most about is making sure his defense is prepared to provide some kind of challenge to someone with Wittman's scoring ability.

Kellogg said that UMass has done a lot of things the way he wants them to be in practice. But with his team's youth, he's not sure if that effort can translate to success under the bright lights with its inexperience.

The Minutemen have four returning scholarship players on the 2009-10 squad and at this point, he wants to make sure future recruits have the work ethic that he's trying to put in place.

UM looking to build on 14-3 home record

Last home opener win at Mullins Center came in one-point win vs. Yale in 2007 season

By David Brinch
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's basketball team won five of its past six home openers. The only one UMass didn't win was last year in their first home opener to Jacksonville State, 75-74 on Nov. 28.

The team is 14-3 in home openers, including the first game ever played there back in 1993. Kellogg helped the Minutemen in a 68-60 victory over Cleveland State of that year, when the team reached the second round of the NCAA Tournament.

UMass beat another member of the Ivy League in their 2007 opener, a 90-89 victory over Yale. The only other defeats came in 1999 and 2002, while the Minutemen are 8-0 at the Mullins Center, dating back to Kellogg's time with the Minutemen. That year, Kellogg averaged 7.4 points per game along with 3.7 assists per game.

Esho signs with UMass

The future got even brighter for the Minutemen after Kellogg signed five freshmen his first year. Kellogg announced the first signing of a letter of intent for the fall signing period in forward Maxwell Esho.

The 6-foot-8, 200-pound forward is from Upper Marlboro, Md., and is currently playing at Lee Academy in Maine.

"We've been around him and watched him play for a couple of years now, and I think he's a good asset to our program," Kellogg said. "He's a great kid, a long, athletic kid and a kid who hasn't really scratched the surface, kind of like some of the young guys we have now."

Esho played for the DC Assault, the same AAU team freshman Javorn Farrell played for and one of the best developmental teams in the country. With the Assault, Esho averaged 12 points, eight rebounds and two blocks per game, and played among a number of highly-touted recruits that helped the team total 120 wins over the last four years.

Esho had a highly touted career at Henry Wise High School, averaging 14 points and eight rebounds per game before doing his prep year. He will also join highly touted freshman Terrell Vinson, who is also from Maryland next season.

However, like the five freshmen currently on the Minutemen's roster, Kellogg sees Esho as having to adjust to the UMass system.

"We're going to have to be patient with him, but at the same token, I'm hoping the dividends down the line prove worth having him come here," Kellogg said.

While a presence offensively, Kellogg sees Esho making an impact on the defensive side of the ball by blocking shots, grabbing rebounds and knowing where to be on the floor.

"He plays a lot of different positions, and I think defensively, he's a little bit ahead of the curve because he knows where he is supposed to be, and that's a nice bonus," Kellogg said.

Groebe returns

Max Groebe, a former member of the Minutemen, will return to Amherst as a member of the Big Red. Groebe, a redshirt sophomore guard from North Miami Beach, Fla., played in 19 games as a reserve during the 2007-2008 season, former coach Travis Ford's final season at UMass.

He averaged 2.1 points per game in 5.5 minutes, making 10 3-pointers. Groobe has yet to make his debut for Cornell, behind a veteran backcourt.

Guard Anthony Gurley rushes up the court to set up a play during a game last year. The Minutemen play their home opener tonight against Ivy League champion Cornell.

UMass takes on SJU at home after BU win

By Neil Carroll
Collegian Staff

Fresh off of a 79-73 overtime win against Boston University, the Massachusetts women's basketball team will take on St. John's on Wednesday at home, and hope to open the season, 2-0.

The last time the Minutewomen won the first two games of a season was in coach Marnie Dacko's first year as head coach in 2002-03, when Jennifer Butler, who averaged 17.5 points and 14.7 rebounds per game, led the Minutewomen.

Dacko was pleased with this year's season opening win on Monday, but thinks the Minutewomen will have to use a much different approach to match up with the Red Storm on Wednesday.

"We don't match up with them well," Dacko said on Tuesday. "But I think if we go with a smaller line up, they're not going to match up with us well either."

St. John's won its first game of the year against Stony Brook, 89-52, on Sunday, and prevents a huge offensive force in Da'Shena Stevens. As a 6-foot-1 sophomore forward for the Red Storm, she won Rookie of the Year in the Big East last year and scored 23 points for the team while shooting 9-of-10 from the field.

UMass sophomore Kristina Danella scored 21 points for the Minutewomen on Monday, and will have to come up big for the team on Wednesday. However, in the win against the Terriers, Kim Benton, Diatiema Hill and Nicole Jones also scored in double figures for UMass.

St. John's held its opponents to 59 points so the Minutewomen will have to try and break through the defense of Shenneika Smith. She finished the game with two steals, three blocks, eight rebounds and 17 points for the Red Storm.

"Fortunately for us we're playing at home," Dacko said. "We didn't have an opportunity to really get into our offense against BU, and hopefully we'll be able to settle down against St. John's."

Dacko also pointed out that her team needs to do a better job rebounding on defense early on in the season.

"We really have to box out," she said. "I think we gave up 10 points in the first half on second chance opportunities, and we can't afford to do that."

The Minutewomen, however, did show off their defense and height in the opening win against BU. Forwards Nicole Jones and Jasmine Watson had three blocks each, and Jones finished the game with a team-leading nine rebounds.

In the win against BU, UMass was down 10-3 early on in the first half, but still came back to tie the game up in the closing possessions. UMass' Danella hit three free-throws with 17 seconds left in the game in order to give the Minutewomen a share of the lead for their first time in the opener.

Although the comeback was not the preferred way to win the game, it showed that the team can play with the pressure on.

Dacko believes that her team needs to break the game down piece by piece in order to play with a more aggressive team in order to pull off the win.

"We've got to be able to manage to put short terms together and play 10-minute increments of a 40-minute game and just be able to execute within those 10 minutes as the game goes on," Dacko said.

After the game against St. John's on Wednesday, the team will face New Hampshire on Friday night in Durham, N.H.

Minutewomen sign 3 recruits during early signing period

By Mike Mastone
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts women's basketball coach Marnie Dacko hoped to build a team well balanced in both aspects of the game, and it appears she is continuing with that strategy.

Dacko and her staff were busy during the November early signing period. Within one week UMass already inked three recruits to National Letters of Intent to join the class of 2014.

Yesterday guard Kelly Robinson became the newest UMass signee, while center Sara English signed her letter of intent on Monday and guard Talen Watson became this year's first commitment last Friday.

The trio has strong offensive potential, but also has the skill set to add to the Minutewomen's already improving defense.

Robinson, a 5-foot-6 point guard from Queen Village, N.Y., is ranked No. 47 at her position by Hoopgurlz.com. As a junior at Francis Lewis High School, she averaged 10.1 points per game and led the conference with 8.5 assists per game. In April, she earned the Most Valuable Player award at the Wheelchair Charities High School Basketball Classic.

Robinson is known for her quickness and strong ball-handling. She is not afraid to drive to the basket and has the ability to create her own shots. She also plays alongside fellow signee Sara English for her AAU team, the New York Xplosion Elite.

English was the second recruit signed by Dacko this season. The 6-foot-4 center ranked in the top 10 in Long Island by averaging 11.3 rebounds per-game as a junior at Smithtown West High School in Smithtown, N.Y. She is a solid inside scorer and could help balance the Minutewomen on the offense and defensive sides of the ball.

The first recruit of 2009 for the Minutewomen, Watson could combine with Robinson to become the team's backcourt of the future.

As a 5-foot-8 combo-guard out of Odenton, M.D., Watson is a strong overall player. Like Robinson, she has the ability to create her own shot off the dribble. However, given coach Dacko's penchant for improving the defense, her skills as an on-the-ball defender may be her biggest addition to the team.

As a junior, Watson led her team with 105 assists and also helped it reach the state semi-finals with a 22-5 record.

With the influx of freshman and the impending senior departures, UMass could be a young team moving forward. Guards Kim Benton and Diatiema Hill are in their final seasons at UMass, while the careers of guard Dee Montgomery, forward Shakia Robinson and center Jasmine Watson are just beginning.

Factor in the three new signees, and next year's roster could be evenly split between six underclassmen and six upperclassmen.

Robinson and Watson both made their debuts on Sunday in the Minutewomen's 79-73 overtime victory over Boston University.

In 16 minutes of action, Robinson made her presence felt by grabbing six rebounds, making a steal and hitting both of her free-throws. Watson had three of the team's six blocks, and also had two rebounds, two points and an assist. Montgomery did not factor into the UMass rotation.

The Minutewomen are back in action tonight when they host 1-0 St. John's University. Tipoff is set for 5:30 p.m. at the Mullins Center.

Relationships crucial in recruiting

By Adam Miller
Collegian Staff

Sampson Carter always knew he wanted to play for Derek Kellogg. After all, it's rare when a coach and player have a relationship that starts as early as grade school.

Kellogg worked at a summer basketball camp during his tenure at Memphis and met Carter when he was 10 years old. Their relationship became so close, that Kellogg would even babysit for Carter and worked with him one-on-one to improve his game.

When he started thinking about playing college basketball, Carter initially wanted to follow his long-time mentor to Memphis, even though he wasn't sure if that was the best school for him.

As soon as he found out that Kellogg took the head coaching job at Massachusetts, Carter never hesitated scratching the Tigers off his list.

"I thought he was a great coach and how I always wanted to play for him so it was a perfect opportunity for me to come over and play for UMass," Carter said.

Trying to recruit players as a first-year coach is never easy, but Kellogg's ability to establish relationships made it easy for him to sign five freshmen, and set up the Atlantic 10's top recruiting class.

All of them have a similar characteristic; they're long and athletic, can play multiple positions and have good attitudes, according to Kellogg. Once he identified who those players were, he worked on catering his recruiting pitch to each recruit's personality.

Freddie Riley, who is a native of Florida, was one of the first players Kellogg targeted. He took a year at Hargrave Military Academy to prepare for college basketball when he graduated high school.

During his senior year of high school, he got a call from Kellogg, who at that point was just settling into his new job with the Minutemen.

He told Riley that he planned on following him during the AAU season and would come to all of his games. Hearing that from Kellogg peaked the Florida native's interest in UMass, and when he delivered on his promise, Riley knew that Amherst was the place for him.

"We developed a really good relationship because he came to all my games and my mom really liked him a lot so I was the most comfortable with him out of any of the coaches," Riley said.

Another factor that played into his decision to come to UMass was the way Kellogg talked to him.

"He didn't recruit me like all the other coaches," Riley said. "I felt like they were just trying to get me because I played basketball, but he really cared about me."

One of Kellogg's selling points was explaining to the recruits how their game would fit into the dribble-drive motion offense. When Riley heard how he could benefit from that style of play, he knew that he would feel comfortable playing for the Minutemen.

In their first regular season game, Riley showed his comfort in the system when he scored 12 points in the loss to Central Florida.

Having an offense that felt comfortable was also a big factor for Javorn Farrell.

"That's the way my AAU team and my high school team played so I thought I'd fit in pretty well," Farrell said of the dribble-drive offense.

It also helped that one of his friends from home, Raphael Putney, was also coming to UMass, although he didn't realize it until senior year of high school.

On the day Putney was playing in a high school all-star game, Farrell decided on UMass and officially signed on Nov. 12 Putney nine days later.

"It's good to have another player from where I'm from in the same area," Farrell said.

The final signing, Terrell Vinson, was also the biggest signing.

He originally committed to Loyola Marymount before backing out of his commitment to join the Minutemen. Vinson, who Rivals.com ranked as the 90th best player in the nation, chose UMass because of Kellogg's energetic and emotional coaching style.

Whatever the reasons were for the five freshmen playing for the Minutemen, they come with the understanding that because of the turnover from last year and the fact that there are so many rookies it important for them to play well immediately.

Farrell played a major role in UMass squeaking out a victory against Dowling while Carter and Vinson started on Nov. 13 against UCF.

Kellogg recognizes that the freshmen class he has isn't a five-star recruiting class and that he will need patience. But if the Minutemen are going to be successful, the freshmen will have to mature quickly.

"I need a lot of the [freshmen] to step up and maybe be better than they're supposed to be early on," Kellogg said.

Freshman forward/guard Javorn Farrell is one of five freshmen that looks to make an impact early on for the Minutemen. Farrell scored nine points off the bench in the loss against UCF.

In his second year in the program, redshirt junior Anthony Gurley looks to lead a young and inexperienced UMass team.

Gurley feeling at home in second year

By David Brinch
Collegian Staff

It's Anthony Gurley's time to shine.

Now, with a year under him in coach Derek Kellogg's dribble-drive offense, all that needs to be answered is if the physical guard will combine with senior guard Ricky Harris to lead a young Massachusetts men's basketball team back to the NCAA Tournament.

"There's just a buzz going on through the locker room," Gurley said. "Everyone's very excited to start this season off and see what we can do this season. Our ultimate goal is to make it to the tournament. I have very high expectations for the team and I'm sure all of the rest of my teammates do too, so I'm expecting to do very well this year."

Gurley knows a lot about success and high expectations.

A Boston native and the all-time leading scorer at Newton North High School, Gurley led the team to a 27-0 record his senior year before signing to play for Wake Forest in 2006. As a freshman, he played in all 31 games for the Deacons, playing an average of 14.5 minutes per game, averaging 6.4 points and 1.6 rebounds as Wake's most dynamic first-year player. He scored a career-high 24 points against Georgia Tech, making 8-of-11 field goals, 4-of-5 3-pointers and 4-of-5 free throws in a victory over the Yellow Jackets.

One of the best young, athletic defenders and sixth man in the Atlantic Coast Conference his freshman year, Gurley was going to make a push for the starting five in his second season in Winston-Salem, N.C.

Then came the death of coach Skip Prosser.

Prosser died of a heart attack in the summer of 2007, just as the team, as well as Gurley, began preparing for the upcoming season.

Gurley decided to transfer closer to home and start fresh, but with it, came a year of sitting out due to NCAA rules, and a new system.

While sitting out the 2007-2008 season, Gurley watched from the sidelines as one of the strongest UMass teams in recent memory reached the National Invitational Tournament, and then saw coach Travis Ford leave for Oklahoma State in the spring.

Gurley would be playing for three different coaches in three different seasons. Last season, he averaged 11.2 points and 3.1 rebounds per game in his first season in Amherst, starting 23 of 30 games, and coming off the bench in the seven other contests. The Minutemen finished below expectations last season in Kellogg's first year at the helm with a 12-18 record. But with a strong recruiting class looking to build for the future, Kellogg will rely on Gurley and Harris's experience in order to mentor a 2009 team that has five freshmen and two transfers, Sean Carter and Hashim Bailey.

"I'm willing to do whatever I can for the younger guys and I'm sure the other guys are too," Gurley said.

Like many other collegiate players, he has been there too.

He played with some of the best talent at Wake, and then learned from players like Tony Gaffney, Gary Forbes and Chris Lowe.

Gurley took giant steps this off-season in conditioning and ball-handling as well as moving the ball around in order to help the Minutemen have a legitimate shot at winning this season.

"I worked on my ball handling and I'm trying to work on getting other people involved," Gurley said. "I'm also trying to work on my conditioning, and I got in a lot better shape this year than I was in last year."

In an exhibition win against Dowling on Nov. 7, Gurley started at forward, and in 26 minutes, had 13 points and eight rebounds in an 80-78 victory. In the Minutemen's first game of the season against Central Florida, Gurley notched 14 points off the bench on 5-of-13 shooting from the field and 4-of-5 from the line.

"With a year under my belt in the system, I feel a lot more comfortable this year," Gurley said. "Last year I was just getting used to where I want to be on the floor and stuff like that but now I feel a lot more comfortable."

Gurley finally being comfortable is a relief for UMass fans and Kellogg, who hope that this could be the year the Minutemen once again get back to the Big Dance.

From the Charm City to Massachusetts

By David Brinch
Collegian Staff

It's extremely rare for a Division 1 collegiate basketball team to have two players from the same city.

Take Massachusetts basketball players Ricky Harris and Terrell Vinson, who both come from Baltimore, home to basketball greats like Carmelo Anthony, Rudy Gay, Juan Dixon and Sam Cassell.

"I think Baltimore, even though it's a big city, it's not that big," UMass coach Derek Kellogg said. "All of the basketball players know each other, and it's funny. They all have a competitive spirit, and the kids down there are always competitors and usually pretty tough. I think it holds true for both of our guys."

Harris, the only senior and the leading returning scorer in both the Atlantic 10 and Kellogg's Minutemen, will look to mentor a young player like Vinson, who looks to contribute significantly to the UMass starting five.

"I see Ricky as not only as a mentor to Terrell, but to a mentor of all of these young guys because it was painted for him when he came here. He didn't play as a freshman, and he did an extra year to get recruited at this level. He is definitely the kind of kid who has made himself into a player."

Harris graduated from Calvert Hall College High School in Baltimore County in 2005, leaving the team as the Cardinals third all-time leading scorer, behind Dixon. After a prep year at the Winchendon School, he played under former Minutemen Mike Byrnes, and then came to the Minutemen in the fall of 2006. He played in 32 of 33 games, averaging 4.5 points per game in 10.8 minutes per night as a freshman. As a sophomore, he was named the conference's Most Improved Player, and last season broke out as one of the best players not only in the A-10 but also in the NCAA.

With all the success Harris has had so far, he considers Vinson an intricate part of the Minutemen, and sees the Baltimore connection as a bonus.

"It's big to have him here because my first couple of years here, there were a lot of guys from New York. Having someone on your team from the same place as you, it's easier to relate to them," Harris said. "It's a good recruiting method, because you can get other guys from Baltimore to come up here, and Terrell's a good kid. He listens, he pays attention and he just wants to learn."

UMass is lucky to even have Vinson, a top 50 recruit, who initially signed to play for Loyola-Marymount a schoolunder former UMass guard and assistant coach Bill Bayno, in November of last year. After Bayno left the Lions with an illness, Vinson was granted a release and signed with the Minutemen in April.

"They know each other very well. When I told Ricky I was recruiting Terrell, he was really excited because he was another Baltimore guy," Kellogg said.

Vinson saw it as a good choice as well. He loves the diversity of such a big school like UMass, even if it is surrounded by farmland.

"It was a last-minute decision, but I'm glad that I came here," Vinson said. "It's good because you know that someone will always have your back, so to be from the same city is big. We knew each other prior to school, so it's been a fun experience to come up here with Ricky."

Coming out of Saint Frances Academy in Baltimore City after spending three years at national powerhouse Montrose Christian in Washington, D.C., Vinson averaged 23 points and eight rebounds per game, leading the Owls to a Baltimore Catholic League Championship and a Maryland Interscholastic Athletic Association title.

Harris and Vinson are not the only two UMass players to hale from Baltimore. Donta Bright, a former McDonald's All-American, went to Dunbar, the same school as Muggsy Bogues and Reggie Williams and had a successful career at UMass. A member of the 1996 Final Four team, Bright averaged 11.6 points per game and 5.4 rebounds over his tenure, and went on to play professionally overseas.

Despite being thrown into the limelight and collegiate basketball early on in his career, Harris, with Kellogg, feels that Vinson will develop into a strong player at the collegiate level, and will hope the Minutemen get back to the NCAA Tournament.

"This offense fits him perfectly with the dribble-drive motion," Harris said. "He likes to get to the basket, establish contact and is a physical player. Being from Baltimore, it kind of sets him apart. He played at a high level in high school, so I don't really see him struggling."

Forward returns to team after year off

By Adam Miller
Collegian Staff

When Massachusetts men's basketball coach Derek Kellogg dismissed sophomore Tyrell Lynch from the team, he didn't have to go far to find another big man to replace him.

In fact, he was already at UMass, just waiting for another opportunity to play. Trey Lang came to Amherst for the 2007-08 season when Travis Ford was still the team's coach.

Lang is undersized as a 6-foot-7 power forward, which didn't bode well for him since the Minutemen already had three centers and six forwards competing for playing time.

UMass' depth meant Lang would spend most of his freshman year on the bench. He ended up playing eight minutes in four games and finished the season with three rebounds.

The next season, academic trouble and personal problems kept Lang off the team, although he said he never wanted to quit playing basketball.

Kellogg never spoke more than a few words to Lang much during his first year coaching the Minutemen, but wasn't sure if he'd return to the team.

Lang worked out with UMass players over the summer, but he did it only to keep in shape. It wasn't until one of the assistant coaches, Adam Ginsberg, talked to him about the possibility of returning to the Minutemen that he thought about playing during the 2009-10 season.

"We had a great relationship ever since I've been here," Lang said. "He basically told me that if I wanted to come back, they'd let me back and that they were short on big men."

Kellogg had no idea about Lang's intention until he showed up to the first day of practice as a walk-on.

"Really, he just showed up and the guys said 'Trey's back,' and I said, 'ok, can't wait to coach him,'" Kellogg said. "I've always liked him as a kid and I thought he's done some pretty good things and he really gets along well with our team," Kellogg said. "His attitude has been great and he's a [player] that takes care of business off the court, which is huge."

Unlike his freshman year where there wasn't space for Lang on the team, UMass is thin on big men, which should give Lang a decent opportunity to earn quality minutes.

Kellogg isn't expecting centers Sean Carter or Hashim Bailey to play too many minutes in the beginning, which is exactly where Lang's help comes in.

Kellogg doesn't have a specific number for playing time in mind, but he believes Lang could play anywhere from 10-14 minutes per game and maybe even more depending on how he progresses. However, Kellogg won't know exactly where Lang is at until he plays in regular season games.

"He's been good at practice," Kellogg said. "I don't really know what he can do because he really hasn't played basketball in two years."

Lang played five minutes in his first game since freshman year against Dowling and finished with nothing more than a block and a foul. Even with his limited playing time, Lang was happy just to step foot in the Mullins Center with a UMass uniform.

"I can't tell you how excited I was to be back, even though the crowd wasn't that big," Lang said. "Just being back around the crowd in warm-ups and being on the bench, cheering on the guys was great."

One thing that kept Lang on the bench his freshman year was his work ethic and toughness. But since returning to the Minutemen, he believes that is no longer an issue for him.

In the limited time Kellogg coached Lang this season, he praised his ability to fit in with the team and his improved work ethic.

"I've always liked him as a [player] and I thought he's done some pretty good things and he really gets along well with our team," Kellogg said. "His attitude has been great and he's a [player] that takes care of business off the court, which is huge."

Schedule features tough opponents

BY DAVID BRINCH
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts basketball coach Derek Kellogg says he doesn't really know how good his team is yet.

That must be okay, because no one else on the Minutemen's strong schedule knows either.

After a 80-78 exhibition win over Dowling and a season-opening loss on the road to Central Florida, UMass faces arguably one of the best Cornell teams in recent memory tonight in the opening round of the Legends Classic tournament, hosted at the Mullins Center. The Minutemen also play other tough non-conference opponents later on this year, including Rutgers, Florida or Michigan State, Memphis, Boston College and Davidson back-to-back in late December before starting their regular Atlantic 10 schedule.

"I'm trying to recruit the kids who want to play at that level and the only way you do that is scheduling those types of games," Kellogg said. "I have a better indication now of how I want everything implemented with the defense and offense into what we're doing and I think we're a little more versatile."

Versatility will pay off for the Minutemen, whose roster includes five freshmen and two big-man transfers, Sean Carter and Hashim Bailey, who sat out last year and will need to be a presence offensively and defensively as the team's only true big men. Redshirt junior forward Anthony Gurley, probably the most versatile player on UMass's roster, will look to lead the Minutemen, along with senior captain Ricky Harris through a long and grinding schedule this season.

"I want to go 10, maybe 11 guys and the big guys are going to be in position where we're going to shuffle guys in and out the whole game," Kellogg said. "I need four, maybe five minutes at a time. I'm going to have to put up with some turnovers in this offense early on because the guys are all new and we're trying to have them play faster than they've ever played before."

In his second year as head coach of the program, Kellogg is still getting his young team familiar with the dribble-drive offense, as well as a number of defensive sets in order to shut down some high-profile teams.

"Basically we got a whole new team out there, which I like because I like their attitudes and I like the kind of energy they bring," Kellogg said. "Last year at this time, I felt like I was tired and it seemed like a long season at that point. With this group, I feel like I could go every day. I feel like I can practice 10 times a day with these guys."

After facing the Big Red tonight, the Minutemen take on Arkansas-Fort Worth and St. Francis, two teams that should give UMass momentum going into the Legends Classic in Atlantic City, N.J., over Thanksgiving weekend. The Minutemen will take on the Knights on Friday, and either the Spartans or Gators on Sunday. UMass defeated Florida in the National Invitational Tournament semifinals two seasons ago, but the Minutemen aren't set on returning back to the NIT. They want to bring the program back to national prominence.

"People at UMass want a national program, they want a team that's going to play against the best," Kellogg said. "I want to recruit the best players and we want to get national exposure and the only way you do that is by playing a national schedule."

After the Legends Classic, the Minutemen host Quinnipiac on Dec. 2 before going on the road against Holy Cross, a game that will be played at Worcester's DCU Center. After games against Seton Hall and Grambling State, UMass faces its three toughest opponents all in a row. Kellogg believes this is where his team will either gain momentum for the upcoming conference schedule, or for the future of the program.

"We'll find out where we are pretty quickly," Kellogg said. "It's a schedule that I want to continue to have so that when we get older and more mature, we can compete with those guys on the road, in a hostile environment and on television."

The game against Memphis, where Kellogg was an assistant for eight seasons, will be played at the TD Garden and broadcasted on ESPN2 on Saturday Dec. 19, followed by contests at Boston College and Davidson. A non-conference game against Baylor on Jan. 23 and a home contest against Charlotte on Jan. 30 will also be televised on ESPNU.

The Minutemen then get into their A-10 schedule, hosting Fordham on Jan. 6, a team that won three games and one in the A-10 last fall. After a four-game stretch against La Salle, hosted in Springfield, Mass., and back-to-back road games at Richmond and Temple, UMass heads back home to take on St. Bonaventure before the televised game against Baylor. The Minutemen then come back for two home games against Charlotte and Xavier.

After taking on Rhode Island, a squad that reached the NIT for the second year in a row last year, UMass will travel to Pittsburgh to square off against an experienced Dukes team that made the finals of the A-10 Championships last season. The last six games of the Minutemen's season includes Saint Joseph's, George Washington, Saint Louis and No. 18 Dayton, who made the second round of the NCAA Tournament last season and have a veteran team returning. The Minutemen will travel to take on the nationally ranked Flyers on Feb. 27, before traveling to La Salle and finishing up their regular season at home against Rhode Island.

"Right now I have no clue what kind of team we are, but I do like that we come to practice hard every day, and the good thing is we don't have a lot of pressure from media people," Kellogg said. "You could probably ask any coach in the league who UMass has on the roster and they have no clue. I'd prefer eight seniors and four juniors, but what's great about these kids are that they are receptive to learning."

In-depth look at the 2009-2010 Minutemen

Kellogg brings 7 new players to UM roster

BY ADAM MILLER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

This year's roster for the Massachusetts men's basketball team barely resembles anything close to last year's. On the 15-player roster, 10 of the players have never seen a minute of playing time at UMass. Four of the returning players are expected to be in the rotation every game, which leaves UMass coach Derek Kellogg with several new faces and a young team that will require a lot of patience early on. However, the Minutemen have several players who can play multiple positions and have a lot of potential.

It's just a matter of how long that potential takes to help UMass win games.

Here is a player-by-player breakdown of the roster at each position, in order of expected playing time.

GUARDS

RICKY HARRIS –

He was the Atlantic 10's leading scorer last year and the clear leader of the Minutemen.

Harris also made the A-10 Preseason First Team after he averaged 18.2 points per game for the second year in a row. With such a young team, Harris will have a lot riding on his shoulders as he will be expected to produce and live up to being a team captain in his senior season.

"He is the face of UMass basketball," Kellogg said. "He's an unbelievable kid both on and off the court. He's a great leader and really someone that you would want as a son and he can play so that adds so much value to him."

In the ideal situation, Kellogg would like to see other players step up besides Harris, but with such an inexperienced team, finding someone who can take the load off the team leader might take some time.

ANTHONY GURLEY –

Kellogg is the most impressed with Gurley's improvement. He averaged 11.2 points per game, but shot a 39.3 field-goal percentage.

Over the summer, he became a better ball handler and is in noticeably better shape.

If the Minutemen's exhibition game against Dowling is any indication for the work he's done over the offseason, he also became a better rebounder. Gurley finished with eight rebounds in 24 minutes.

"That's very encouraging," Kellogg said of Gurley's rebounding. "Really, for awhile there, [center] Sean Carter was going in by himself going after every rebound."

As a redshirt junior, he is one of the few veterans on the team, and will be asked to be another go-to player for UMass. Kellogg hopes that Gurley will draw from his experience playing for Wake Forest to help the Minutemen with their competitive schedule.

DAVID GIBBS –

It won't be easy, but if UMass hopes to have any sort of success this season, it will have to rely on the sophomore to make up for the absence of last year's point guard, Chris Lowe.

Making the dribble-drive motion offense works requires having a great point guard. As a starter, Gibbs will be expected to do more after averaging 17.5 minutes per game his freshman year.

One thing he has working for him is his athleticism. He's one of the fastest players on the team and has decent jumping ability.

Now he'll have the chance to show what he learned playing behind Lowe.

GARY CORREIA –

If it wasn't for his conversation with Kellogg during the offseason, Correia would've been part of the Boston University squad.

But as a backup point guard, his role will be to tutor Gibbs throughout the season in preparation for potentially becoming a coach when his playing days are over. Correia should get some major minutes as a tough defensive player and because of his experience.

He also will be relied upon to hit open jumpers late in games. Correia has a ' ng history of being a timely shooter and Kellogg hopes to see more of that this year.

FREDDIE RILEY –

The 6-foot-5 guard brings some much needed size as a guard for the Minutemen and comes from Hargrave Military Academy, which has produced several NBA draft picks.

He has the potential to be a big-time scorer in the future, but right now Kellogg is working with him on improving his shot selection and becoming a better defender.

In the game against the Golden Lions, Riley went 1-for-9 from 3-point range. Kellogg wouldn't mind those kinds of nights as much if he played better defense.

LEX MONGO –

He walked on last year in his junior year after the Minutemen became depleted due to injuries. Prior to joining UMass, he played intramural basketball and played on the same high school team with Gurley.

BUD GAFFNEY –

If his name sounds familiar, it's because his brother is Tony Gaffney. He transferred after playing for Division III Wheaton, but will sit out the 2009-10 season.

FORWARDS

TERRELL VINSON –

He was the biggest signing from last year and now has a good chance of starting as a freshman.

Kellogg describes him as hard-nosed and capable of playing multiple positions as nearly any of the five freshmen can. Vinson leads a position that is deep but not experienced with Matt Hill being the only returning UMass forward, but missed most of last year because of injuries.

Vinson was originally going to Loyola Marymount, but pulled out of his commitment late and signed with the Minutemen.

The freshman already had the attention of the A-10 when he made the Preseason Rookie Team. This year, he will get a chance to prove the hype as he will receive a lot of minutes early.

JAVORN FARRELL –

All of Farrell's teammates describe him as one of the hardest working players on the Minutemen roster, which should equate into more playing time than he was going to have originally.

Kellogg sees him as the biggest surprise talent-wise with how much he's improved before the regular season and it showed in the exhibition game against Dowling that he doesn't mind stepping up when needed.

Kellogg doesn't see him at any particular position, but he is a sound all-around player who shouldn't have much trouble getting onto the court with his work ethic.

SAMPSON CARTER –

Carter knew he wanted to play for UMass as soon as Kellogg accepted the head coaching job because of their connection from when he was young. But if he wants playing time this year, he'll have to compete for one of the forward spots.

Like all the other freshmen, he plays multiple positions because of his ball-handling skills and is also long and athletic.

RAPHIAEL PUTNEY –

He's an exciting scorer to watch with his athleticism and shooting ability, but he has yet to develop a body that can handle the aggressiveness at the college level.

As soon as he adds on some muscle, Kellogg believes he has the potential to be an ideal player for the dribble-drive offense.

TREY LANG –

Originally a freshman under former UMass coach Travis Ford, Lang never got much playing time in his first season with the Minutemen. He sat out the following season due to academic problems, but is back with the team as a walk-on, and should receive more minutes with a lack of depth down low.

MATT HILL –

After sitting out most of last year with a torn Achilles tendon and playing eight minutes his freshman year, Hill will finally get more playing time than his first two years combined.

Although he should get to play more minutes than he has in the past, it's unlikely that he plays more than a few minutes per game.

CENTERS

SEAN CARTER –

He's the best big man the Minutemen have and that means expectations will be high. Carter will need to get a large share of the rebounds as he is athletic and a defensive specialist.

Carter never received much playing time at his previous school (Oregon State), so he still has a bit of work to do before he can sustain playing over 30 minutes per game, but he's getting close.

"[Carter] is a kid that has some great tools and potential and I think the more he plays and the more comfortable he gets and the better he gets in shape, he has a chance to be another guy we haven't seen in awhile," Kellogg said of his center's potential.

He will likely rotate with Hashim Bailey or even Lang if Kellogg chooses to go with a smaller lineup in order to keep his centers fresh.

HASHIM BAILEY –

One of the biggest challenges "Big City" had coming to UMass as a transfer out of Memphis was getting down to a size that's not so big. He did just that during his redshirt year and lost somewhere between 30 and 40 pounds.

Similar to Carter, the key to him being a big contributor for the Minutemen is to continue that conditioning and getting to the point where he can play several minutes at a time. In the beginning, Kellogg expects both of his big men to play in minute-and-a-half bursts to make sure they stay fresh.

He is currently the biggest body UMass has and takes up a lot of size down low.

Work starts on new police station

UMPD will move to new $12.5 million home on East Pleasant Street near fire department

BY CAMERON FORD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Anybody who has been to Tobin Hall, the new recreation center, or somewhere in between has probably noticed a small, bare-bones brick building with an illuminated, retro-style sign that reads UMASS POLICE. This is the University of Massachusetts' current police station, out of which a force of 62 sworn officers and 29 cadets, supported by a fleet of 20 vehicles and 16 bicycles, maintain law and order on campus 24 hours a day, 365 days a year.

That will be changing soon, however.

Last Friday, UMass broke ground on a brand new, $12.5 million police station. The 27,130 square-foot building will be located at 505 East Pleasant Street, across from the North Fire Station and behind Orchard Hill and at the end of the road leading past Sylvan and the North Apartments. It will be in operation 24 hours a day, and according to a press release, will provide "a home for the police department's patrol, investigation, specialized and emergency services, as well as crime prevention and educational initiatives for the campus."

The groundbreaking ceremony was held at 1 p.m. on Friday, with speeches given by UMass Amherst provost and senior vice chancellor for academic affairs James V. Staros, UMass police Chief Johnny C. Whitehead, State Rep. Christopher Donelan (D) of Orange, UMass trustee Edward W. Collins Jr. and Richard J. Lawton, a trustee and vice chairman of the UMass Building Authority. Former UMass police Chief Barbara O'Connor, who now serves as executive director of public safety at the University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign, was also present at the ceremony.

The new police station was designed by Caolo and Bieniek Associates, Inc. of Chicopee, Mass., which also renovated the Old Chapel Clock Tower and the laboratories in the Morrill science buildings. Its development started in about mid-April 2008.

"[The new police station] started out as a study with cost estimates and development," said Jim Hanifan, the project architect, who was also present at the groundbreaking ceremony.

"Our architects are involved throughout the production process overseeing building materials, observing construction, and things like that," continued Hanifan. "It's expected to be completed in December 2010, and occupied at least a couple of months later."

Committee approves public law school plan

BY SAM BUTTERFIELD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The proposal to create a public law school within the University of Massachusetts system came one step closer to becoming a reality Wednesday when the Board of Trustees Committee on Academic and Student Affairs voted 11-5 to approve the plan, which would give the University a fully accredited law school without spending state or university funds.

The proposal would create a law program at the University of Massachusetts Dartmouth by absorbing the assets and resources of the 235-student Southern New England School of Law, also in Dartmouth.

In a release, University of Massachusetts system President Jack M. Wilson stated that most other states have a public law school and that he feels Massachusetts should be in that category.

"We seek to offer the citizens of the Commonwealth the opportunity to obtain an affordable, high-quality legal education," he said. "That public option exists in 44 other states nationwide and should be available in Massachusetts," he continued.

Before being finalized, the proposal faces two more votes. The Committee on Administration and Finance will vote on the plan Dec. 2 and, if that passes, the plan will move to the Board of Trustees Dec. 10. If the Board backs the proposal, it would go to the state Board of Higher Education for final approval.

In a presentation to the Committee on Academic and Student Affairs, UMass Dartmouth Chancellor Jean F. MacCormack said a public law program would benefit the state in a number of ways.

Marketing class turns UMass into DewMass

The DewMass Marketing agency will promote the Winter Dew Tour for this year for the second year in a row, helping to target college students.

Some people call the University of Massachusetts ZooMass. One group of students in the sports management department would prefer for it to be known as DewMass.

The group of 14 students in the Isenberg School of Management's sports management program founded its own student-owned agency, DewMass Marketing, last year to help Mount Snow, a West Dover, Vt., ski resort, promote the Winter Dew Tour's stop there last year.

Mount Snow's marketing and event operations director, Greg Fisher, a 2001 UMass graduate, approached the School of Management with the idea of pairing marketing students with Mount Snow, Chicago marketing firm Alli, the Alliance of Action Sports, and other distinguished department alumni.

The sports management department leapt at the opportunity, and the partnership was born.

In a release, Fisher said teaming up with students helped marketers develop a direct strategy for catering to the college demographic.

"The first ever Dew Tour at Mount Snow was an overwhelming success," he said "Working with the direct market demographic of the Dew Tour within the student population at UMass was another success story, the class pulled through with some great promotions for our event and the Tour and were a vital part of the success and organization of the event," he continued.

The DewMass agency is composed of 14 students who work in three departments: promotions, partnerships and advertising. The class meets for two hours on Tuesdays and Thursdays, covering departmental updates and discussing upcoming events and promotions.

No happy ending for local massage parlors: Area masseuses facing prostitution, licensing charges after state raid Nov. 4

BY RACHEL DOHERTY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

November 4 was just another normal day in the Pioneer Valley: cows being milked, hippies shopping for organic vegetables, Chinese prostitution rings being infiltrated by the police.

On Wednesday, Nov. 4, eight area massage parlors in six towns were raided by state and local police on suspicion of prostitution. According to a Nov., 4 report by ABC 40 News, the investigation was prompted by a tip from federal and authorities in New York.

Three women were arrested in the aftermath of the raid. Xiumei Zheng and Zhen Shu of Hadley were charged with performing sexual acts for a fee, with bail set at $250. Zheng and Shu were arrested at Jane's Spa and Hadley Massage respectively, both of which are located on Russell Street in Hadley.

Xuili Li of Longmeadow was arrested and held on $5000 bail on charges of operating an unlicensed massage parlor and allowing prostitution on the premises. A resident of Springfield, Mass., Li is the owner of Chinese Massage located at 809 Maple Street Rd. in Longmeadow, Mass. and Chinese Massage at 217 Belmont Ave. in Springfield.

Angela Stasiowski, a University of Massachusetts junior who lives two blocks away from Chinese Massage in Longmeadow, says that it was completely unexpected coming from Longmeadow.

"Honestly, when is a prostitution ring not a surprise?" Stasiowski said. "But yeah, it's definitely out of the norm for our town. Longmeadow is nice suburban town with lots of wealthy folk."

"I never heard anything, 'Chinese Massage' is in this plaza with a bunch of other stores and restaurants," Stasiowski said when asked whether she ha'd heard anything about the prostitution ring prior to the raids. "It's one of those sketchy places you tend to avoid. I've been to the Chinese restaurant next to it though, Li's Brother's. The food is pretty good."

There are two Chinese restaurants in the same plaza at Chinese Massage in Longmeadow. One is Iron Chef Asian Cuisine, the other is Li's Brother's Chinese Japanese Restaurant. Neither is in any way connected to Xuili Li's Chinese Massage.

According to an employee of Li's Brothers, the restaurant has been suffering as a result of the scandal at Chinese Massage.

"We've been losing a lot of business over this," said the employee, who preferred to remain anonymous. "We're not owned by the same people," he went on., "[The last name is just a bad coincidence. Li is a very common last name, like Smith, there are millions of people in China named Li."

The raids were the culmination of several months of investigations by state and local police. According to the ABC report, officers used an undercover informant after witnessing men entering the business and leaving an hour later looking disheveled. The informant reported being led into a room in Chinese Massage where he was asked to remove his clothes. The informant said that he could hear sounds form the next room that suggested another client was having sex, and was approached by another Chinese Massage employee who offered him sex in exchange for additional money.

The ABC report says that the police went on to use an undercover officer, who paid $50 for a massage at Chinese Massage and then requested a "happy ending." The term "happy ending" reportedly meant oral sex. According to the officer, Xuili Li told him it would be $40 for a happy ending, and $50 for each additional girl.

Li's attorney, Christopher Todd, has argued that the language barrier prevented Li from understanding what the officer tem, would get accreditation by the American Bar Association by 2013, would generate $673,576 for Massachusetts in its first year and over a million a year within five years and would significantly raise the amount of cash the University has at its disposal over the next decade.

"The University of Massachusetts was founded to create educational opportunity for the citizens of the Commonwealth. This public law proposal is grounded in our University's historic mission and evokes our tradition of service. I thank the committee for its support," Chancellor MacCormack said at the meeting, according to a release.

President Wilson said a public law school would be another fine institution in a state rich with educational resources.

"This University has a demonstrated record of creating programs that achieve world-class status," he said. "We will build a law program that will serve the needs of the sons and daughters of the Commonwealth and become a source of enduring pride for our state," President Wilson continued.

"The committee has given this plan an important vote of confidence," he added.

Indicating a desire to preserve the school's mission of educating future lawyers in Southern Massachusetts, the trustees of the Southern New England School of Law offered in October to donate the school to the University of Massachusetts, with the net value of the donation valued at $22.6 million.

Founded in 1981, the small private non-profit school in North Dartmouth says that it will donate its assets to UMass Dartmouth and that the new law program there will be funded by student fees, private contributions and leveraging the school's real estate for initial funds.

Proponents of the plan argue that it will generate revenue for Massachusetts quickly by adding tuition monies to the General Fund of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

Southern New England School of Law currently offers full-time three year programs, part time four-and-a-half year programs and summer sessions.

If the proposal passes all levels of approval, the University of Massachusetts Dartmouth law program could enroll students as soon as next fall.

Chief Whitehead said when contacted by phone that the biggest benefit the new facility will provide is additional space.

"Right now we only have about 12,000 square feet of space in Dickinson to work with, and the new station will have well over 27,000," he said. "We also have some of our services on the top floors with the classrooms."

The police station will also provide holding cells, something that Dickinson does not have. "We can't really house people who can't make bail in Dickinson because there are no holding cells here," Whitehead said.

"The new police station will also have a new dispatch center," Whitehead continued. "We'll host the campus-wide emergency center from there; right now it's in a conference room in Draper."

In addition, the new police station will be constructed with energy reduction and sustainability practices.

The lighting system, for example, will utilize occupancy sensors, energy-efficient lights, and will make use of technology to automatically adjust the lights in relation to the amount of daylight. All windows, doors, and walls will have insulated glazing systems to reduce the amount of energy needed to heat the building, and water-saving plumbing fixtures will be installed as well.

The UMass Building Authority has also set a goal to have 10 percent of the construction materials come from recycled material, with another 10 percent of construction materials originating from sources within a 500-mile-radius of the university.

Once the police station is completed, it will be registered for certification by the U.S. Green Building Council's Leadership in Energy and Environmental Design (LEED) program.

class, the departments meet separately to discuss their responsibilities.

The various updates and strategies the group devises are then presented every two weeks via conference call to Alli and Mount Snow.

In the agency's release, Chris Pryylo, vice president of events for the Winter Dew Tour said last year's crop of DewMass marketers helped the Tour and that he hopes this year's class will do the same.

"Last year's DewMass class and their efforts to promote and enhance the Winter Dew Tour's stop at Mount Snow were integral to the event's success," said Prybylo. "We look forward to building on last year's achievements to make the Toyota Championship at Mount Snow an even bigger and better way to end the 2009-10 Tour."

The grouping between DewMass, Alli and Mount Snow helped the Mount Snow leg earn the top ratings of any stop on the tour last year.

This year, the agency will hope to boost ratings at the Winter Dew Tour's Toyota Championship, the final stop of the tour, which will be held February 5 to 7 at Mount Snow.

DewMass will seek to plan promotions for the college-aged demographic, seeking to connect to the Dew Tour's lifestyle brand.

The firm will plan what it calls experiential, interactive events like tailgating at college football games around New England, a bar tour throughout Amherst, and ski and snowboard movie premier events.

It will also attempt to partner with ski and snowboard equipment companies, media and entertainment firms and social networking sites.

This year's Toyota Championship carries particular significance as it is the last major winter sports event before the 2010 Olympics in Vancouver, British Columbia, and many participants in the Dew Tour will be participating in both.

Fisher said he anticipates the event will feature top competition.

"I expect to see another amazing competition," he said, "with the Olympics only a week later, winter sports will really be in the spotlight, and I know Mount Snow and the Dew Tour will not disappoint."

He furthered that he believes the agency will continue to grow and that he is excited to see what promotions they develop.

"We'll expect some big things out of the class in year two, and I personally can't wait to attend some of the promotions they have in store," he said.

was requesting.

According to a Nov. 5 article asshiveit the Springfield Republican, prostitution in western Massachusetts massage parlors has been connected to a Chinese organized crime ring operating out of Flushing, New York. Flushing is the second largest Chinatown in the U.S.

UMass junior and Longmeadow native Elisabeth Compton said the raid was initially disturbing but that, upon consideration, she realized there might be a market in her town for such services.

"It was shocking at first, but then I thought about it, and it's actually not surprising," she said. "Not to stereotype, but there are a lot of wealthy businessmen living in Longmeadow, businessmen and lawyers."

Although the Longmeadow massage parlor has been getting the most publicity, the prostitution circuit was not limited to Longmeadow. Seven other massage parlors in Springfield, East Longmeadow, Hadley, Chicopee and West Springfield were raided and face charges ranging from prostitution and operating an unlicensed massage parlor to employment of illegal immigrants.

Zheng and Shu will return to court next month on charges of prostitution. Anh Li is due back on November 23. If convicted, Li could face a minimum of two years in prison and a $5000 fine.

Motown Man welcomes all

Chris Russell

Benny Johnson approached about 20 drunken revelers dancing to rap music at a Lincoln Street house party late on a recent Thursday night. Once people recognized him the music was turned off and the requests poured in.

"Motown Man, play a song!"

Johnson quickly obliged, performing "Twist and Shout" with a bucket, a kazoo hanging from his neck and a worn shaker held together by masking tape.

The crowd's dancing soon engulfed him as the whole room sang along to the classic Beatles song. After two encores, Johnson left with a Keystone Light as a parting gift.

"Parties are fun, but I like playing on the street more," Johnson said while walking toward downtown Amherst to entertain the bar hopping crowds that congregate on the sidewalk.

Johnson, 62, performs in Northampton and Amherst several days a week, usually sporting one of his many colorful capes. He answers to a variety of nicknames, including Bucket Man, Motown Man and Motown Johnson, "because I play Motown music," he said.

The crowd's dancing soon engulfed him as the whole room sang along to the classic Beatles song. After two encores, Johnson left with a Keystone Light as a parting gift.

He's good, too. Real good. At least that was the opinion of Mount Holyoke junior Jessica Alvatte after she heard Johnson sing John Lennon's "Stand by Me" outside Subway in downtown Amherst.

"I appreciate it. You're not bullshit," she told him. "You're pretty good." She called for an encore, and Johnson chose Al Green's "Let's Stay Together," which elicited an immediate response from Alvatte. "I love this song! This guy knows what's happening!"

She quickly turned the performance into a duet, and both sang with intense passion.

"I'll keep on loving you, whether times are good or bad, happy or sad," they sang.

Jessica said she is glad to have someone of Johnson's caliber singing in Amherst.

"It's extremely nice having him out here," she said. "He sings Al Green. You don't even know who Al Green is, do you?"

Johnson started playing in the clubs of his hometown New Orleans, La., eventually traveling the world as a drummer and vocalist in a band with his five brothers.

He said playing the bucket is as enjoyable as playing the drums, and over the years has developed a science for bucket playing.

He made several small depressions on the bucket's bottom which produce different notes. He also moves a laminated piece of paper around the inside while playing to achieve the desired pitch.

"Music is my high," he said. "When I'm playing I don't feel the injuries I have in my shoulder or spinal cord."

Johnson still plays in clubs the once performed his array of instruments in Northampton's Academy of Music alongside ballet dancers) but especially enjoys interacting with people while performing on the street.

"It's a lot of fun to get out and get people to sing," he said.

UMass senior Erik Hellmer quickly recognized Johnson's talents after seeing him perform in downtown Amherst two years ago.

"I've seen people in Boston playing the drums outside of Bruins and Red Sox games, but I have never seen one man entertain so many people like he does," he said. "It's incredible. His charisma is out of this world."

Hellmer said this as Johnson entertained an impromptu sidewalk dance party with a jazz-funk interpretation of "monster mash."

"It doesn't matter if people are drinking or not, my beats make them move," Johnson said.

Hellmer is a testament to this, as he got down while singing a duet of James Brown's "I Feel Good" with Johnson.

"I have more fun singing with him than being in the bars, swear to god," Hellmer said.

Johnson is impressed with Hellmer too. He designated him "Party Man" because "he always brings a party," a title Hellmer said he will treasure for the rest of his life.

"It feels like I have accomplished more than I thought I would in college," he said. "It means more to me than my degree."

Even though Hellmer was (hopefully) being hyperbolic, it's easy to see why he would make such a statement. Johnson is an everyman's musician who plays for the love of music and performing with others. It's rare to find someone as friendly, engaging and talented as Johnson. One must perform with him to believe it.

The next time you're in downtown Amherst or Northampton, look for Johnson. He's out most nights, serenading pedestrians with some of the 200 songs he has memorized, a tradition he hopes to continue for many more years.

"As long as I can stand and hold my bucket I'll still play," he said. "Even if I have to go out with a walker."

Chris Russell is a Collegian columnist. He can be reached at crussell@student.umass.edu

Assault reveals faults in library

Nick Milano

It seems that everything at the University of Massachusetts has its bright spots and its many downsides. The W.E.B. DuBois Library is no exception.

The tallest library in the United States boasts computers and studying spaces galore, but is not without its fair share of problems. In light of the recent attack on a woman on the library's 19th floor, these issues have surged to the forefront and for good reason. UMass' library stands as a beacon of learning, but there is plenty of room for improvement.

As anyone who has been to the library to do some studying in the stacks on the higher floors can attest, it gets scary up there, especially at night.

Around finals time, there are hundreds of students bustling around the library trying to get last minute work done, but throughout the rest of the year, these floors can be abandoned. The floors with the bathrooms are especially empty as they are the floors with the tiny study rooms and other offices.

Due to the lack of police and library patrols and the emptiness of these higher floors, it is not surprising that an attack occurred there. What is surprising to me is that I have been at UMass for four years and have not heard of any problems before this.

The attack highlights a few problems. First, there is no way to prevent random members of the public – if the attacker was not a student at one of the Five Colleges – to roam the library freely with bad intentions. Half the battle is the fact the library is open to the public and UMass cannot unilaterally refuse entry to members of the public.

It is too bad that it took an attack for us to realize the danger of an unpatrolled library.

Another problem is the lack of patrols by library staff or even UMass police. While I have seen library staff conducting walks around the library, it does not seem to be a routine or even common occurrence. The UMass Police's failure to establish public safety in perhaps the busiest building on campus is a stunning indictment of what the police seem to view their responsibilities as at UMass. They are always more intent on stopping people from going 27 miles per hour in a 25 mile per hour speed zone or preventing 20 year olds from drinking beer.

As a senior and as a person who spends considerable time in the library, ask anyone who knows me – I have never seen police officers just taking a walk around the library to announce their presence. It is ironic that the UMass Police website shows pictures of cops talking amicably with students when everyone I know lives in fear of the police.

According to the UMPD website, their mission is to "serve our community by providing a safe environment in which to live, learn and grow." It would be nice if the police lived up to this instead of perfecting their performance as the road rules Gestapo.

It is too bad that it took an attack for us to realize the danger of an unpatrolled library, but it is just as bad that this attack has cast the library in such a bad light because it is one of the best features of UMass.

Though there are basic problems with the library that cannot be fixed, there are incredible benefits. One glaring issue cannot be helped, however. The library's design is foolish, because tall libraries make no sense. It is and should be the tallest library in the United States, and the world for that matter.

If writing a paper on the country of Ireland for example, a book on Michael Collins, go to floor 15, a James Joyce novel, go to floor 11, a book on politics and the IRA, go to 8. While the library cannot make the Dewey Decimal System easier to understand, the fact that it is more than 20 small floors means that finding necessary books might include running from floor to floor. Libraries should be expansive and broad, not compact and tall.

Still, there is more to be proud about than to nitpick. Since I have been here, the library has expanded wireless access from just the first few floors to the entire building. More computers have been added. The computer labs are more useful and there are plenty of printers and copiers. The staplers inside the front door and downstairs have proven critical time and time again. And the list could go on and on.

There is plenty to rave about, but still just as much to be done. The library staff and UMass administration needs to work with UMass Police to establish a presence to make sure the tragedy of Nov. 3 does not happen again. In fact, the police would benefit from a more visible role and a role that puts public safety first and foremost over the minute traffic violations that give the campus cops glee.

The library needs to continue replacing its unused floors with computer labs. It seems the study rooms are never used. A future construction project might be to convert them to computer labs. The UMass library surely has much going for it, but recent events have shown a bright light on its shortcomings.

'Progress' in India hurts the people

Syed Akhtar

The Indian sub-continent over the past few years has seen some bloody battles – not the type of battles seen in Iraq and Afghanistan, where foreign military is engaged in a country. The battles in the sub-continent are between its own people, whether it's Sri Lankan government and military fighting the Tamil Tigers, or Pakistan and its military fighting the Tehreek-e-Taliban or the Indian government fighting the Naxalites or so called Maoists.

In recent times, both the problems in Sri Lanka and Pakistan have gotten a lot international media coverage. Deservedly so, because of the gravity of situation there. But India's fight against the Maoist is a completely different situation.

In evaluating the history of this conflict, one has to go back to Vedic period (2nd century B.C.) when society was divided into caste based on profession. After years and years of exploitation by top castes, the lower castes of India (commonly called Dalits or Harijans), presently grouped in one of three categories: as a scheduled caste, a scheduled tribe or Other Backward Classes (OBCs), finally revolted. From this the Naxalite Movement was started in 1967 in Naxalbari, West Bengal. Naxalites, or the Maoists as they are commonly referred, fight for the rights of these poor backward caste people against the government and landlords who have exploited them for years.

The situation over past few years has escalated. Regions in north and central India are now called "The Red Corridor" or "The Maoist Corridor" have a vast population of backward caste and are home to vast reserves of minerals and resources worth trillions of dollars. With India's economy booming and the need for more resources, India has started pushing its boundaries for foreign and local investment and the government has been signing Memoranda of Understanding (MoU) with many multinational corporations.

Arundhati Roy, a prominent social activist in a recent newspaper column said the region called the Red Corridor should rather be called "The MoUist Corridor" because of the number of memoranda of understanding signed by government.

The problem is that almost half of India's population is recognized as belonging to these backward castes and is mostly concentrated in the region described above. Now that the government is signing MoU, these poor people are being displaced and are not compensated for their loss.

The Maoists have taken arms to fight the Indian government to save the hills and so many other lands that are to be butchered by the big corporations.

For example, in the state of Orissa, the government signed a MoU to sell a hill in Dongria Kondh, which is believed to contain bauxite to a British multinational company Vedanta. This affected the lives of people of Dongria Kondh, who relied on the hill for various purposes. Close to 400 people have been killed in one small village. The Maoists have taken arms to fight the Indian government to save these hills and other lands that are to be butchered by the big corporation for billion-dollar profits.

Prime Minister Mannohan Singh, talking about the Maoists, said they are the "single largest internal security threat to India," not so much because of their violence resistance against government uprooting of the tribal people but because they pose a threat to slow down India's developing economy.

The government recently announced that it will launch an all-out battle against the Maoists because of their violent means and their objection to the development work done in the area. The government has been setting up mobile towers, powerhouses, railway tracks and bridges in these areas, calling it the development of tribal people. What good will these developments do to tribal people who live life barely on one meal a day?

Everyone knows that this so-called development is actually for big companies to setup their factories, mines and to extract other resources from the region. The Indian government gets to call India developed because of its "growing economy." But, this economic growth comes at the cost of the lives of more than half of the Indian population.

This problem is not common in India alone. All developed nations in the world have witnessed this before. The injustices done to Native Americans are common knowledge. India is now emerging as one of the most powerful economies in the world. Along with China and the U.S., India is likely to be a key player in financial dominance in the world. This gives the Indian government a reason to fight anything that would hinder such economic development. The Maoist resistance for their people sure gives the government an excuse, but the government's actions can never be justified.

It's about time for the government and urban population, which supports government's actions, to realize the need for a change in their attitudes. The poor cannot be left to suffer for the greater good of the country. Development is a necessary evil, but not at the cost of the climate change it brings and definitely not at the cost of the lives of the millions of poor people it affects.

NO SENSE IN NO TRAY POLICY

Dear Editor,

Every day I eat at least one meal in campus center. If I purchase a meal, drink, maybe a piece of fruit or bag of chips. There is no way to do this without a tray. So I put things down because I can't hold all of it. I'm also not about to wait in those long lunch time lines twice.

Many of my fellow students feel the same way.

You may think Dining Services is saving money, but you are loosing a significant amount of revenue in lost sales. It's not helping the profit margin.

To say it is to prevent waste or to save money is ridiculous. The cost to students for food in campus center is equal to or in some cases greater than off campus. So where is the savings from this trickling down other than to the university and third party contractors?

WE DO CARE ABOUT SPEECH

Dear Editor,

RE: "How much do professors care about speech?;" Alana Goodman, November 17

The editorial page on Wednesday November 18, 2009 was a delight for this student of civil rights and liberties. It contained a rich mix of commentary on the meaning of free expression on this campus. I feel fortunate to be part of that dialogue.

However, I would like to comment on the difference, for me, between the abstract notion of free expression and opinion on specific expression.

Free expression is valuable. It is enshrined in the Constitution and it is part of the enlightenment tradition that produced American institutions like open government, periodic elections and jury trials.

In addition, the University is a place where speech has special protection because we do our best work when we are not afraid to speak.

On the other hand, we should engage the content of speech and not simply retreat to an abstract assertion that everyone has a right to say whatever they want. Free expression is really only valuable if we engage with what is said. Alana Goodman is right, the case of Andrew Card has parallels with that of Luc Levasseur. But it is not exactly the same.

In fact, one of the sillier parts of the discussion last week was the suggestion that, by letting Levasseur speak, the University would be endorsing terrorism. The University was not endorsing the views of Levasseur.

As the Daily Collegian editorial points out, the Levasseur speech should have been protected in the interest of inquiry rather than advocacy. I think the police who protested had some sense of this with their silent vigil, although their signs and back room pressure said otherwise. I wish our administration had been clearer that we need to protect inquiry in the face of political pressure.

The case of Andrew Card was different because the University was indeed endorsing Card's work, which included planning and advocating the American invasion of Iraq. Like many members of the University community, I opposed that award. But I was also aware that the expression of opposition to Card was a matter of considerable debate. It was a debate that had as one of its core values, freedom of expression.

Demon barber to possess crowds at FAC

By Alissa Mesibov
Collegian Staff

The UMass Theater Guild's production of Sweeney Todd opens tonight. The musical features a cast and artistic team composed almost entirely of UMass students.

The plot surrounds the story of Benjamin Barker, a barber who returns to London after more than a decade of exile. After finding the remnants of his former life in ruins, Barker takes up the alias of Sweeney Todd and a mission of murderous revenge with the help of his landlady, Mrs. Lovett.

Despite the murderous plot, Sweeney is no villain, according to Artistic Director Sophie Kaner.

"[The characters] really can't be boiled down to 'hero' or 'villain' or 'damsel in distress,'" Kaner said. "The show is about many people, who all struggle to deal with what society expects of them versus what they really want. For that reason, I came to the conclusion that the villain is, in fact, the class system that traps every character."

Sweeney follows the Theater Guild's production of The Laramie Project. Each semester, the Guild produces one play and one musical. The musical was selected last semester during a special meeting, in which it competed against several other musicals.

Producer Dana Levy said, "There was an overwhelming majority voting for Sweeney."

This is not at all surprising, as this production trails the well-received Tim Burton film adaptation by less than two years. However, there are some significant thematic differences between the film and stage versions.

"The stage version is more about the characters, as opposed to the film, which focuses on the action and the horror genre," said publicity director and cast member Ben Skinner.

That is not to say that the show will be lacking in gore, by any means. Sweeney made theater history as the first popular horror musical, since the modern musical genre developed in the early 1900s. The gore was especially hard-hitting for its first audiences, as it came right after the happy-go-lucky musicals of the 1950s and 1960s.

While there is no existing proof of a London barber by the name of Todd, it is suspected that the original folk tale of Sweeney Todd drew inspiration from a barber in Paris who killed his clients in 1800. He then teamed up with a pastry chef, who actually baked and served the cannibalistic pies for human consumption.

Gore is not the only part of Sweeney Todd. The multi-Tony Award winning show has multiple layers to it.

While the musical has become infamous for its bloody murder sequences, "It is also part romance, part action, part drama, and then there is the horror aspect," said Ben Sharton, who plays Sweeney Todd. "There really is something for everyone."

Sweeney Todd first opened on Broadway in 1979, where it won eight Tony Awards. It has since had two revivals on Broadway, and the three productions have earned a combined 10 Tony Awards.

Sweeney Todd will play at the Fine Arts Center today and tomorrow at 8:00 P.M., as well as Saturday at 2:00 P.M. and at 8:00 P.M. Tickets can be purchased at the Fine Arts Center Box Office. Student tickets are $6 each, and adult tickets are $10.

Alissa Mesibov can be reached at amesibov@student.umass.edu.

'Pirate Radio' rocks the boat, doesn't find cinematic gold

By Matt Robare
Collegian Staff

Rock on, no matter what. That's the message of "Pirate Radio," a nice little imported comedy that flopped in the UK under the name "The Boat that Rocked." It was written and directed by Richard Curtis. The film "stars" Philip Seymour Hoffman as an American DJ called The Count, Bill Nighy as British manager Quentin and Kenneth Branagh as a government minister named Sir Alistair Dormandy.

The plot is simple. The year is 1966 and no legal British radio station is allowed to play rock n' roll, so pirate radio stations have sprung up. They are housed on boats anchored off the coast and occupy a legal gray area. The government, however, is against rock n' roll and Sir Alistair is assigned to figure out a way to shut down the pirate radio stations, leading the station Radio Rock to attempt various ways to, ahem, stay afloat.

The Radio Rock ship is populated by several characters, most of whom are DJ's and the others whose jobs are never specified. In addition to the Count, the other DJ's are Angus (Rhys Darby), Dave (Nick Frost), Bob (Ralph Brown), Simon (Chris O'Dowd) and Mark (Tom Wisdom). The ship is populated by John (Will Adamsdale) as a newsreader, "Thick" Kevin (Tom Brooke), Quentin, the lesbian cook, Felicity, and the viewpoint character, Carl.

The movie is an ensemble comedy and it suffered from being edited down, as it tries to get to jokes and gags as quickly as possible. But as an ensemble piece, most of the comedy is dependent on having strongly developed characters. Because twenty minutes of the film have been taken out, we miss a lot of the development. A perfect example of this occurs fairly early in the movie when Gavin (Rhys Ifans), a DJ who had left for more money in America returns to Radio Rock, setting up a rivalry between him and The Count. But apart from a cold reception to Gavin by The Count, we don't even get any interaction between them from that scene until a later one where The Count challenges Gavin to a game of "chicken" that involves climbing the mast and jumping into the North Sea.

As a period movie, it is amazing. The costumes and hairstyles are wonderful and in some scenes provide a stark contrast between the dour conservativeness of the government with the ongoing sexual revolution. Remember, in 1966 The Beatles were still together and The Who and The Rolling Stones still had their original lineups (Keith Moon died in the '70's and Brian Jones died in 1969).

The greatest thing about Pirate Radio is the music. Nothing beats classic rock. The Who, The Kinks, The Turtles, Jimi Hendrix and The Beach Boys all have songs. The music is simply awesome. It's a great introduction to some of the greatest music in history, or a nice trip down nostalgia lane for those who are already familiar with it.

On the other hand, the comedy isn't so hot. Pirate Radio's comedic aspirations fall short as it seems that it doesn't know what kind of comedy it wants to be. Some of the plots seem more screwball some more slapstick. Is Pirate Radio News Radio or Seinfeld in a pirate radio station? The funniest parts of the movie involve interactions between the characters, specifically, how their quirks and goals conflict with the reality of being at sea and in close proximity to one another all the time. For instance, Bob is your stereotypical stoner DJ. He loves the Grateful Dead and other kinds of music like that and looks a lot like John Lennon would in the late 70's.

In one scene late in the movie, the ship takes on water and Bob is only able to rescue one record. Dave throws it into the ocean with the comment, "That's a terrible record." But the movie doesn't stick to that kind of humor and suffers for it.

It's a good movie, but it has its faults. It's worth going to see once in theaters, but certainly not twice.

Boy-next-door Jesse Ruben is bringing acoustic back into pop

By Annhalee Guarnieri
Collegian Correspondent

For the past year, Jesse Ruben has relentlessly toured up and down the east coast to support his debut album. His quick wit and handsome boy-next-door style makes his performances wonderfully entertaining and carefree. A Jesse Ruben show feels like a group of friends jamming around the living room. Each moment of his shows is filled with his sarcastic and endearing banter, even to the point where he stops himself and manages to laugh out an apology, "Oh man, I'm rambling. I'm so sorry." He will poke fun at the audience, and don't be surprised when his audience pokes fun right back. Audiences should be prepared for new songs and wild anecdotes when his new album drops in early 2010. Ruben takes an acoustic stand in what is now an electronic-dominated world.

Ruben began taking piano lessons when he was about five years old, and continued until he was a freshman in high school. Yet, after "wasting a lot of my parents' money," he said regarding the piano lessons he dreaded, Ruben discovered his true calling when his father bought him his first guitar in his junior year of high school. "When I started playing guitar it was like, 'Oh, this is what you've been waiting for your entire life.'"

Ruben continued his musical education at Boston's Berklee College of Music as a freshman in 2004. He entered the classrooms that held young musicians who had been playing guitar for most of their lives. He, however, had only picked up guitar in his junior year of high school. For him, the experience gap was daunting.

"I had only been playing guitar for a year when I applied to music school. If you have any friends that are thinking of doing that, tell them not to, because it's really scary," he said. "I was kind of a mess when I first got there."

Future guitarists should take heed of the warning from Jesse Ruben. However, as he gears up to record his second full-length album, it is clear he made the right choice. Putting the scariness of the classroom aside, the good-natured performer ventured on and developed a strong grassroots following.

After four years at Berklee, Jesse graduated with a major in songwriting and several career highlights. He scored a gig as the opening act on a 10-city East Coast tour with multi-platinum selling artist Ryan Cabrera. He also opened a Bridgeport, Conn., show for Alaskan songstress Jewel in Feb., which to his family's excitement earned him a resounding standing ovation from a crowd of 1,400.

His song "Lack of Armor" was recently featured on an episode of the teen television favorite, "One Tree Hill." The track takes you on the journey of a heartbroken lover who just can't seem to get over his lost love. The same song was a finalist in the 2008 John Lennon Songwriting Contest, as well as the 2008 New York Songwriter's Circle Contest. The cherry on top of the past year came when Ruben signed his first major record deal with Sony BMG.

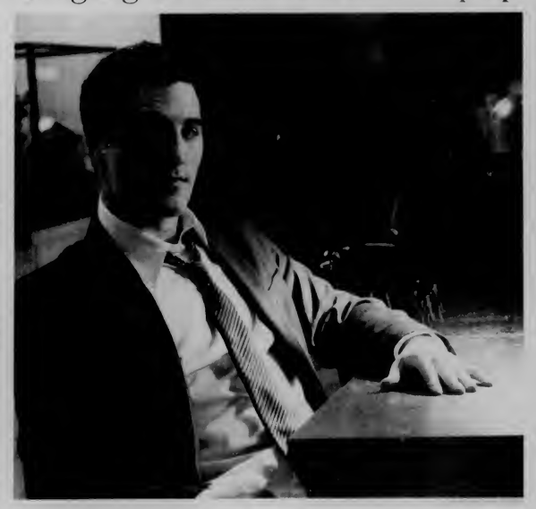
Ruben's career officially took off in Jan. 2008 with the independent release of his debut album, "Aiming for Honesty." With songs like "Ace of Spades," crooning about how one needs the other "like shades of red on Valentine's Day" and the sickly sweet honeymoon period of relationships, this album will set a mood made for canoodling.

The acoustic pop and slightly folksy album, which has a hint of his influences James Taylor and John Mayer, grabbed the attention of an underground following and led to regular spots on college radio stations, in Kohl's department stores around the country, and XM Satellite radio. Ruben had no idea his music was being played on XM Satellite radio, but he found out when he was 30,000 feet in the sky.

"I was on an AirTran's flight and I was listening to XM," he said. "My song came on while I was listening to it and I just lost it, but of course I couldn't do anything about it because I was on an airplane. So, I couldn't tell anyone until I landed three hours later. It was torture. And the beverage announcement came on during my song! Which was amazing, and hilarious, and awful all at the same time."

His path to success has had some wonderful moments, but it has not gone without a few bumps in the road. "Song for Zach," a track off of "Aiming for Honesty," is about one of Ruben's best friends who, five years ago, suffered a broken neck after a severe fall in Maine.

"Watching a friend go through that was one of the hardest and most painful situations I've ever gone through in my life," said Ruben. "They were waiting for the ambulance to come and somehow I was brought up in conversation. Someone said 'What is Jesse going to do when he finds out about this?' Zach said, 'I don't know, but he better write a really good song about it.'"



The four months following the accident were spent exclusively on the songwriting that led to what Ruben says is one of his best songs. "Song for Zach" is a beautiful ballad, in which Ruben displays raw emotion in his voice: "You taught me how to fight again by learning how to laugh. I'm adding up the numbers, but I still can't do the math. And I wish that I had been there, to save you Zack." Unlike the other songs on the album, Ruben's voice and heart wrenching lyrics tell the story of Zach better than his guitar.

"You have moments where you think, I could do this everyday for the rest of my life and it wouldn't be too terrible. But for all those days, there are a million other moments where you're like, 'What am I doing, why am I doing this?'"

"It's really hard mentally to be focused enough and have enough trust in what you do to keep going," he said. "I'm so happy that I've gotten to do everything that I've been able to do, but in terms of stuff that I want to do and the amount of people I want to have hear my stuff, it is so far away."

"Aiming for Honesty" is an album full of the trials and tribulations of a young man's journey through love and life. Ruben wrote most of the tracks on "Aiming for Honesty" when he was around 17-years-old, but at 23, he's writing with a bit more experience under his belt. The second album Ruben claims will be just as relationship driven, but it will feature different kinds of relationships.

"There's still going to be the girl-boy songs, but they're also going to be about examining what it's like to be older," he said.

Jesse Ruben, a graduate from Boston's Berklee College of Music, has recently been touring the east coast to promote his first album. In the past, he's opened for the likes of Ryan Cabrera and Jewel.

I want to write songs that when people are at their worst day they say the only thing that will help me get through this moment right now is to listen to Jesse's stuff," Ruben said. "And if they are having the best day of their lives they say the only way that this could get better is if we put Jesse's record on now. And I want to have songs for all the moments in between."

In the moment of this phone interview Jesse's main concerns were spending time in New York City with a girl friend and enjoying his hometown team, the Philadelphia Phillies. Take on the New York Yankees in the World Series.

"I've been wearing Phillies gear for the last 36 hours in New York and getting heckled for it. And I love it. It's amazing."

Minutemen move up

By Jeffrey R. Larnard
Collegian Staff

It may have not have been a big playoff game, or even a game for first place, but the game-winning goal by David Boehm against New Hampshire on Friday was certainly the biggest of his career.

"[I've never had] something that big," Boehm said. "It felt really good to get that goal, and has probably been the biggest goal of my career to date."

The goal also earned the redshirt freshman the honor of Hockey East Pro Ambitions Rookie of the Week for last week. After Casey Wellman tied Friday's contest at three with 11 seconds remaining in the third period, it was Boehm who gave UMass (7-2-0, 4-2-0 HEA) the win and the two points.

"It's a great honor after having the season that I did last year, to be among the top rookies in the league," Boehm said of receiving the honor.

Doug Kublin found Boehm in the neutral zone two minutes, five seconds into the extra period, and Boehm fired the shot for the win.

Boehm has been an important piece to the Minutemen's success this season. He has filled in as injuries have taken their toll, proving UMass' depth this season. In six games, he has recorded two goals and an assist, and credits a lot of his success on the ice to UMass coach Don Cahoon.

"I feel like he puts me out there in good key situations," Boehm said. "He plays me in times when I should be played."

Even strength

While UMass has one of the top offenses in the Hockey East, prior to this past weekend's set with New Hampshire, there was a concern about it to Cahoon. While the Minutemen had been scoring a lot of goals, the majority of them had been coming on power-play opportunities, not while at even strength.

"Over the last couple of weeks, that has been our focus, lets get our 5-on-5 play where we can be more productive and score goals," Cahoon said.

UMass scored six goals on the weekend, with only Wellman's goal at the end of regulation coming with a man advantage after Cahoon pulled his goalie. The other five goals came while both teams were at even strength.

One issue the Minutemen found against the Wildcats (3-6-2, 3-2-1 HEA) is the lack of power-play opportunities they are getting. In two games over the weekend, New Hampshire only gave UMass three power-play chances, with the Minutemen failing to find the back of the net on any of them.

"I thought New Hampshire did a great job of keeping the game penalty filled, which would have played to our favor with the way our power play has been executed," Cahoon said.

With the early success UMass' power-play line has had, scoring on 12-of-43 chances for a 27.9 percent success rate for best in the Hockey East, Cahoon expects more teams, including Yale, to keep play clean when they face the Minutemen, in hopes of neutralizing one of its biggest strengths.

Jumping Minutemen

Despite the split last weekend with the Wildcats, UMass still improved its national ranking, jumping from No. 14 to No. 11 in the latest USCHO.com Poll. The ranking is the highest for the Minutemen this year, and sets up a matchup of two of the top 15 teams in the country when they travel to No. 9 Yale on Thursday.

UMass is currently the second highest ranked team in the Hockey East, behind only No. 4 UMass Lowell – the two sister schools play at Lowell on Dec. 5 – and one of four HE teams currently ranked. Vermont and Boston College are also in the Top 20, at No. 18 and No. 19 respectively.

UMass looking to score early, wants to push play against Yale

Yale (2-1-2, 1-1-2 Eastern College Athletic Conference) has gotten off to a slow start to its season in a relatively few amount of games.

The Bulldogs are coming off a three-point conference weekend in which they defeated Cornell, 4-2, and tied Colgate, 3-3, in their first draw of the season.

In its home arena, Yale was 12-5-1 last season and is 1-0-1 so far this year. Though the Minutemen have won both of their road games this season, they have yet to play an opponent as good as the Bulldogs away from home.

In the all-time series between the two teams dating back to 1971, Yale and UMass have split it with three wins each. The Minutemen, however, have come out on top in the last three meetings.

The Bulldogs' last contest against a team from the Hockey East was the 2009 NCAA East Regional, a game in which they lost to Vermont by a 4-1 score.

In its last Hockey East meeting prior to that, Yale lost 2-1 in overtime to Boston University. In fact, the Bulldogs have not had a win over a Hockey East opponent since the 2006 season, when they defeated UNH, 4-3, in overtime.

Yale has played its best hockey late in games this season, holding a 9-2 advantage in the third period. The mo8.9chances to use its strong power play unit.

Against the Bulldogs, Cahoon wants his team to force the issue and create penalties on the opposition.

"We have to do a better job of pushing the play a little bit to create calling a penalty," he said. "We have to play a little quicker, make them haul us down speed wise, and get to the front of the net where they end up maybe using their stick."

UMass is 12-42 on the power-play this season, while Yale has a 76.2 percent success rate on the penalty kill. How well those two units play tonight could determine the outcome between these two highly-ranked teams.

"They've got three great center icemen, they score goals and have a good power-play themselves," Cahoon said. "They play with a lot of confidence and win a large majority of their games at home, so I have a feeling that we have our work cut out for us."

Jay Asser can be reached at jasser@student.umass.edu.

Forward Danny Hobbs looks for a pass from teammate Matt Irwin last weekend. The Minutemen travel to Yale to face the Bulldogs tonight in the first stop of a three-game road trip.

Defense, rebounding lacking

employed a zone defense.

"We didn't match up with them body for body. They're a great slashing team and unfortunately they were still able to slash into our zone and elevate over us," Dacko said. "If we could have kept them on the perimeter and gained rebounding position, that would have been beneficial for us."

Going into the match, UMass knew this match-up was going to be tough, but maybe not this tough. A thrilling overtime victory over Boston University on Sunday showed a UMass defense capable of getting stops at key moments. Wednesday's match told a much different story.

The Minutewomen would have had a hard time stopping the Red Storm even if their defense played to its utmost capability.

offense with nine points over that span, while UMass could not come up with any answers on either side of the ball. Sophomore Nicole Jones made a layup with 31 seconds remaining to cut the lead to 28, but sophomore Britney Murphy responded with a layup just as time expired to give St. John's an 82-52 victory.

Danella led UMass in scoring for the second game in a row with 16 points, and also led the team with seven rebounds. Watson also has a strong outing with 14 points on 5-of-10 shooting, while junior Ceria Mosgrove set a new career-high with six rebounds, finishing 2-of-5 from beyond the arch and totaling six points.

The Minutewomen will try to turn things around when they travel to New Hampshire on Friday. Tip-off is set for 7 p.m. at Lundholm Gym in Durham.

Minutemen move up

By Jeffrey R. Larnard
Collegian Staff

It may have not have been a big playoff game, or even a game for first place, but the game-winning goal by David Boehm against New Hampshire on Friday was certainly the biggest of his career.

"[I've never had] something that big," Boehm said. "It felt really good to get that goal, and has probably been the biggest goal of my career to date."

The goal also earned the redshirt freshman the honor of Hockey East Pro Ambitions Rookie of the Week for last week. After Casey Wellman tied Friday's contest at three with 11 seconds remaining in the third period, it was Boehm who gave UMass (7-2-0, 4-2-0 HEA) the win and the two points.

"It's a great honor after having the season that I did last year, to be among the top rookies in the league," Boehm said of receiving the honor.

Doug Kublin found Boehm in the neutral zone two minutes, five seconds into the extra period, and Boehm fired the shot for the win.

Boehm has been an important piece to the Minutemen's success this season. He has filled in as injuries have taken their toll, proving UMass' depth this season. In six games, he has recorded two goals and an assist, and credits a lot of his success on the ice to UMass coach Don Cahoon.

"I feel like he puts me out there in good key situations," Boehm said. "He plays me in times when I should be played."

Even strength

While UMass has one of the top offenses in the Hockey East, prior to this past weekend's set with New Hampshire, there was a concern about it to Cahoon. While the Minutemen had been scoring a lot of goals, the majority of them had been coming on power-play opportunities, not while at even strength.

"Over the last couple of weeks, that has been our focus, lets get our 5-on-5 play where we can be more productive and score goals," Cahoon said.

UMass scored six goals on the weekend, with only Wellman's goal at the end of regulation coming with a man advantage after Cahoon pulled his goalie. The other five goals came while both teams were at even strength.

One issue the Minutemen found against the Wildcats (3-6-2, 3-2-1 HEA) is the lack of power-play opportunities they are getting. In two games over the weekend, New Hampshire only gave UMass three power-play chances, with the Minutemen failing to find the back of the net on any of them.

"I thought New Hampshire did a great job of keeping the game penalty filled, which would have played to our favor with the way our power play has been executed," Cahoon said.

With the early success UMass' power-play line has had, scoring on 12-of-43 chances for a 27.9 percent success rate for best in the Hockey East. Cahoon expects more teams, including Yale, to keep play clean when they face the Minutemen, in hopes of neutralizing one of its biggest strengths.

Jumping Minutemen

Despite the split last weekend with the Wildcats, UMass still improved its national ranking, jumping from No. 14 to No. 11 in the latest USCHO.com Poll. The ranking is the highest for the Minutemen this year, and sets up a matchup of two of the top 15 teams in the country when they travel to No. 9 Yale on Thursday.

UMass is currently the second highest ranked team in the Hockey East, behind only No. 4 UMass Lowell – the two sister schools play at Lowell on Dec. 5 – and one of four HE teams currently ranked. Vermont and Boston College are also in the Top 20, at No. 18 and No. 19 respectively.

UMass looking to score early, wants to push play against Yale

Yale (2-1-2, 1-1-2 Eastern College Athletic Conference) has gotten off to a slow start to its season in a relatively few amount of games.

The Bulldogs are coming off a three-point conference weekend in which they defeated Cornell, 4-2, and tied Colgate, 3-3, in their first draw of the season.

In its home arena, Yale was 12-5-1 last season and is 1-0-1 so far this year. Though the Minutemen have won both of their road games this season, they have yet to play an opponent as good as the Bulldogs away from home.

In the all-time series between the two teams dating back to 1971, Yale and UMass have split it with three wins each. The Minutemen, however, have come out on top in the last three meetings.

The Bulldogs' last contest against a team from the Hockey East was the 2009 NCAA East Regional, a game in which they lost to Vermont by a 4-1 score.

In its last Hockey East meeting prior to that, Yale lost 2-1 in overtime to Boston University. In fact, the Bulldogs have not had a win over a Hockey East opponent since the 2006 season, when they defeated UNH, 4-3, in overtime.

Yale has played its best hockey late in games this season, holding a 9-2 advantage in the third period. The mo8 9chances to use its strong power play unit.

Against the Bulldogs, Cahoon wants his team to force the issue and create penalties on the opposition.

"We have to do a better job of pushing the play a little bit to create calling a penalty," he said. "We have to play a little quicker, make them haul us down speed wise, and get to the front of the net where they end up maybe using their stick."

UMass is 12-42 on the power-play this season, while Yale has a 76.2 percent success rate on the penalty kill. How well those two units play tonight could determine the outcome between these two highly-ranked teams.

"They've got three great center icemen, they score goals and have a good power-play themselves," Cahoon said. "They play with a lot of confidence and win a large majority of their games at home, so I have a feeling that we have our work cut out for us."

Jay Asser can be reached at jasser@student.umass.edu.

JEFF MORTENSEN/COLLEGIAN

employed a zone defense.

"We didn't match up with them body for body. They're a great slashing team and unfortunately they were still able to slash into our zone and elevate over us," Dacko said. "If we could have kept them on the penimeter and gained rebounding position, that would have been beneficial for us."

Going into the match, UMass knew this match-up was going to be tough, but maybe not this tough. A thrilling overtime victory over Boston University on Sunday showed a UMass defense capable of getting stops at key moments. Wednesday's match told a much different story.

The Minutewomen would have had a hard time stopping the Red Storm even if their defense played to its utmost capability.

Steve Levine can be reached at slevine@student.umass.edu.

offense with nine points over that span, while UMass could not come up with any answers on either side of the ball. Sophomore Nicole Jones made a layup with 31 seconds remaining to cut the lead to 28, but sophomore Britney Murphy responded with a layup just as time expired to give St. John's an 82-52 victory.

Danella led UMass in scoring for the second game in a row with 16 points, and also led the team with seven rebounds. Watson also has a strong outing with 14 points on 5-of-10 shooting, while junior Ceria Mosgrove set a new career-high with six rebounds, finishing 2-of-5 from beyond the arch and totaling six points.

The Minutewomen will try to turn things around when they travel to New Hampshire on Friday. Tip-off is set for 7 p.m. at Lundholm Gym in Durham.

Minutemen can't hold off Big Red

MAXWELL SPARK/COLLEGIAN

Senior guard Ricky Harris looks to score against Cornell last night. Harris had 26 points, and UMass held a 37-27 rebound advantage, but could not hold onto the victory, falling 74-61 to the Big Red.

Harris nets 26 points in home-opening loss

By Daniel Gigliotti
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts men's basketball team tangled with the Ivy League's defending champions last night, and played formidably in a 74-61 loss against a more experienced and disciplined Cornell team.

The Minutemen were never out of contention, as their aggressive play kept the Big Red honest. However, their assertiveness on the offensive end led to costly turnovers, allowing Cornell to dictate the pace of the game and maintain its lead.

"We have to value the basketball," senior guard Ricky Harris said. "Our turnovers killed us."

UMass played sloppily on the offensive end, unable to move the ball swiftly and committing unforced turnovers. The Minutemen gave the ball away in many different ways, committing four travels as well as a charging foul and a shot clock violation.

The Big Red scored 25 points off of 20 UMass turnovers in the game, including 16 points off turnovers in the first half.

UMass played an aggressive game, moving up the floor quickly and attacking the basket with the dribble. The Minutemen saw a number of good looks around the rim, but had trouble putting them in.

Scoring started out slow in the first half, as neither team shot well from the floor.

The Minutemen caused Cornell troubles on defense, forcing them into bad shots and dominating on the boards. UMass held a 25-10 advantage on the glass after 20 minutes, but it was miscues that ended up being too much for them to overcome.

Freddy Riley was a big spark off of the Minutemen bench, scoring six points on his first three attempts. The freshman forced the Big Red into calling a quick timeout following a transition lay-up to bring UMass within two points, 19-17, with seven minutes to play.

UMass had trouble spreading the scoring around in the first half, as 22 of the Minutemen's 28 points came from four players. Guards Riley, Harris, and Anthony Gurley as well as Terrell Vinson combined to go 8-for-15, while the rest of the team went 1-11.

UMass controlled Cornell's two top-scorers, as center Jeff Foote and forward Ryan Whittman were scoreless from the field in the first half, managing four points between them.

The Big Red started the scoring in the second half, looking poised to break away from the pesky Minutemen.

Louis Dale led the Big Red to a 50-38 advantage with 12:41 remaining, draining three long-range shots on three attempts, and finishing the game with a team-high 24 points on 9-of-17 shooting.

Just when it looked like Cornell was going to run away with it, six straight points by Harris brought UMass back in. Harris hit three of five free throw attempts and drained a three-point basket from the corner to bring the Minutemen back in the game, 50-44, with 10:42 left.

A dunk by Foote silenced the anticipating crowd and the Big Red began to gain back momentum after two offensive rebounds sent Geoff Reeves to the line. UMass coach Derek Kellogg felt that play changed the complexion of the game.

"Our inexperience showed. We didn't check out, they got the rebound and went to the foul line," Kellogg said. "Really, I thought that was the turning point in the game."

The Big Red weathered the Minutemen attack, as the lead never dipped below seven points from there on.

Yet, the ability to maintain pressure and rebound the ball kept UMass afloat in throughout the game, to Kellogg's liking.

"We executed quite a few parts of our game plan tonight," Kellogg said.

His star guard also agreed with him.

"I feel as though we played better," said Harris. "But there are still strides that we can make."

Daniel Gigliotti can be reached at dgigliot@student.umass.edu.

In defeat, Riley taking better shots, driving to the basket

By Adam Miller
Collegian Staff

In Freddie Riley's first game as a collegiate athlete, Massachusetts men's basketball coach Derek Kellogg couldn't wait long enough to pull his freshman out of the game.

After going 1-for-9 in the exhibition game against Dowling, Kellogg criticized Riley's shot selection and work ethic defensively, while Riley admitted that he was still learning to play tough on a consistent basis.

"I'm still trying to adjust to playing hard every play, but I think it's going really well," Riley said prior to the season opener against Central Florida.

Against the Golden Knights, Riley put up 12 points, but did so on 4-of-11 shooting. He played about the same amount of time in both games, and finished with nine 3-point attempts both times.

Last night against Cornell, Riley's shooting percentage was much higher, as he shot only two 3-pointers the entire night. Although he didn't play as much against the Big Red as he did in either two of the previous games, he showed several flashes of how high his potential is.

Riley came to the Minutemen as an Atlantic 10 All-Rookie Selection for his ability to get to the basket. Kellogg believes that in the coming years, the lanky guard can be a prolific scorer, because of how many ways he can get to the basket.

Last night was the first time that Riley's main offensive weapon wasn't shooting a 3-pointer, but driving to the lane.

Riley finished with eight points in 13 minutes while shooting 50 percent. Late in the game, he picked up an offensive rebound off his own miss and made both free-throws after he picked up a foul.

Kellogg felt that UMass as a whole improved its shot selection. After putting up 38 3-point shots against UCF, the Minutemen finished with 16 against the Big Red.

"I thought our guys in general did a better job of taking better shots and sharing the basketball and doing some good things," Kellogg said.

Even Cornell coach Steve Donahue noticed UMass played smarter offensively.

"I think they've really respected that they have to go and play and grind it out, and I thought they made us work for things," Donahue said.

Groebe hot in return

It's easy to forget that at one point, junior Max Groebe played for the Minutemen. Groebe transferred after his freshman season, where he played 5.5 minutes per game.

He was one of seven freshmen on the 2007-08 squad that saw four of its players transfer (Gary Correia, Trey Lang and Matt Hill are the only remaining players from that class).

But when he returned to the Mullins Center, he made his mark in a relatively short amount of time.

Groebe played eight minutes and shot 2-of-3 from beyond the arc. He made the first 3-pointer early in the game to give Cornell a 12-9 lead with 11 minutes, 51 seconds left in the first half.

UMass never regained the lead from that point forward.

"If I have to be on the bench and just cheer them on, I'll do that," Groebe said. "If I have to come in for a couple minutes and give them an offensive spark, that's what I'll do."

Donahue isn't sure what type of role Groebe will have down the road, considering his team is already established with proven veterans. However, he feels that whatever that role is, Groebe will fit in just fine.

"Max has done a terrific job. He doesn't just speak it, he does it," Donahue said about Groebe's work ethic. "He works extremely hard, as hard as anyone in our program, doing the extra things. I think he's a quality player and knows how to play."

Dacko and Co. want presence down in paint

By Steve Levine
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts women's basketball coach Marnie Dacko said before the season began that her team's success would rely on defense. The Minutewomen proved that point to be true on Wednesday, when they fell to St. John's University, 82-52. UMass' defense was weak in many aspects, specifically around the rim.

Inefficient on the glass

UMass was outrebounded, outhustled and simply outplayed in the contest, allowing the Red Storm to walk out of the Mullins Center with an easy win. The biggest aspect of the game came down to rebounding, where UMass did not have much of a presence.

"If we were able to rebound with them, we could've played with them," Dacko said. "They're very athletic and they just elevated over us."

The Minutewomen allowed St. John's too much room inside, where the Red Storm grabbed offensive rebounds at will. At the half, St. John's had 13 offensive rebounds to UMass' three. Unsurprisingly, those offensive boards lead to an abundant amount of second-chance points for St. John's.

"We got beat in every position on the floor," Dacko said. "We gave up two and three second chance opportunities, and that kills you. You have to get a body on somebody and then also beat them to the ball. At times we had a body on somebody but we couldn't beat them to the ball. It was a challenge on our mental toughness and we have to get tougher mentally."

Transition Defense

Following the first twenty minutes, Dacko tried to convince her team to erase what happened so far and focus on getting stops. However, the second half showed more of the same from the defense, which could not prevent the Red Storm from beating them in the mid-court.

"It's hard to finish a half and come out with the same intensity in the second half when they just keep coming at you," Dacko said.

UMass' transition defense gave up a large amount of fast-break points throughout the match. The up-tempo style of the Red Storm proved to be too much for the Minutewomen, who failed to get back on defense numerous times after missed baskets.

"The goal going in was transition defense knowing what St. John's does," Dacko said. "We didn't do a very good job of that. The credit goes to St. John's – they were on their 'A' game today."

Zone Defense

St. John's ability to pick apart UMass' zone defense also played a large factor in their 30-point victory. The Red Storm showed a variety of ways to score throughout the game, creating high percentage shots from inside as well as on the perimeter. St. John's high conversion rate raised the question of why Dacko

Minutewomen fall to visiting Red Storm, Danella adds 16

By Mike Mastone

The Massachusetts women's basketball team fell short in a bid to upset St. John's University, with the Minutewomen unable to match the speed and physicality of the Red Storm.

St. John's overpowered the Minutewomen on the offensive glass and took advantage of a flurry of UMass turnovers. An imposing man-to-man defense forced UMass to commit 27 turnovers, which led to 35 Red Storm points. UMass also had trouble boxing out St. John's, with the Minutewomen being outrebounded 21-12 on the offensive end.

Sophomore Kristina Danella scored the first basket of the game to give UMass their first lead. The Minutewomen extended the lead to 7-4 following a field goal and free throw from Danella and a layup from senior Diatiema Hill.

The Minutewomen were able to cut the lead to five on two occasions, and trailed 19-14 following a pair of free-throws by freshman center Jasmine Watson. St. John's closed out the first half with a 20-9 run over the period's final 10:41.

Throughout the first half, UMass tried to get the ball into the paint, but was unsuccessful in most of their attempts. Freshmen Shakia Robinson and Watson were able to create their own shots, but were unable to finish near the rim.

The Minutewomen also had a tough time getting open on the perimeter due to a tight man-to-man defense by St. John's. Danella was the only player who was consistent offensively in the first half, finishing the period with three made field goals on five attempts for a total of 10 points.

Meanwhile, St. John's successfully cut through the UMass zone and pounded the ball in the paint. The Red Storm finished the first half with a 20-12 advantage in points in the paint, while proving to be effective in the transition game with six fast break points.

"If we were able to…rebound with [St. John's], I thought it'd give us an opportunity to play with [them]," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said. "I think giving up 14 offensive boards in the first half; we just didn't have the touches. Their perimeter pressure hurt us, and I think we have to use this game as a learning tool to move forward and understand how important the value of rebounding is."

UMass came out looking strong on the defensive end in the first few minutes of the second half and forced St. John's into several bad shots, but the Minutewomen could not sustain the same level of play for the rest of the period. The closest UMass got in the second half was when they trailed 48-35 with 13:02 remaining.

St. John's then went on a 25-8 run to push their lead to 30, with Stevens pacing the Red Storm

UM takes on Bulldogs

By Jay Asser
Collegian Staff

After enjoying the friendly confines of the Mullins Center in seven of its first nine games, the Massachusetts hockey team will travel to New Haven for a three game stretch beginning with Yale tonight.

The No. 11 Minutemen are coming off their worst weekend of play in which they nearly dropped consecutive games to Hockey East opponent New Hampshire. UMass (7-2-0, 4-2-0 HEA) was able to steal a win from the Wildcats (3-6-2, 3-2-1 HEA) on Friday with a late second goal in the third period to tie the contest before scoring the game-winner in overtime.

On Saturday, the Minutemen struggled in keeping UNH off the board, losing 4-2, despite outshooting the Wildcats, 35-18.

Things won't get any easier for UMass, as they get the No. 9 Bulldogs away from home tonight.

UMass coach Don Cahoon doesn't look at this contest as a must-win with a big out-of-conference opponent, but sees it rather as any other game on the schedule.

"The truth of the matter is that every game we play is a big game, whether it is for league implication or national tournament implication, and our own joy of finding a way to win games," Cahoon said. "There are a lot of other benefits to playing, but there's no question that the fun's in the winning."

PHENOM talks budget cuts

MICHELLE WILLIAMS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

On Thursday, in the Cape Cod Lounge, the Public Higher Education Network of Massachusetts (PHENOM), held an educational forum to discuss the issue of rising tuition and budget cuts called "Budget Crisis: UMass at the Tipping Point."

"We are all members of the constituency. Faculty has been grumbling about budget cuts. Students have been complaining about fees," said Louise Antony, a philosophy professor at the University of Massachusetts. "Both have a common problem, and it would strengthen the pressure against the state if both groups join together."

Antony spoke of how faculty and students feel they are pitted against each other, with students fearing the rise of tuition and fees, while faculty are wary of shrinking faculty and the slipping integrity of programs.

The stated mission of PHENOM is to "keep higher education available and affordable to students who cannot afford private educations," said Antony, adding that, "We envision state-funded universities funded by a progressive tax that provides a quality education that all can attend. We would like to see a society with no need for private institutions of higher learning."

Massachusetts is currently ranked 45th in the nation for state-funding given towards higher education, spending $206 per resident. The national average is 30 percent higher. For the cost of net tuition, including tuition and fees, and subtracting financial aid, Massachusetts is almost $1,000 more expensive than the national average. State colleges in Massachusetts recently lost $62 million in state funding after Gov. Deval Patrick announced budget cuts in late October.

KAZHROE DRUAR/COLLEGIAN

Sam Dreyfus (far right) mediated PHENOM's teach-in held in UMass' Cape Cod Lounge in the Student Union. Students shared stories about how the budget crisis has affected their lives.

To open the event, Andrew Prowten, a junior political science major, spoke of the financial issues he and his family have faced. "I've taken out about $20,000 in loans," said Prowten.

He also spoke of rising interest rates that he was surprised to find himself facing. "My freshman year, I took out a $5,000 loan at a 2.5 percent rate. My father and I thought it was a great deal," said Prowten. "Later I learned that my rates had raised to 12 percent, and could potentially rise higher."

Prowten also spoke of his father's necessary back surgery that has been delayed for three years, which would put him out of work as a contractor for six months, in order to help his son pay for school. Prowten spoke of a need for the University to help students better finance their educations and keep costs down as a state university.

Next, Jackie Walton, a graduate student, spoke of the need for an affordable healthcare plan. She spoke of her need to get a mammogram, yet her inability to pay the $200 deductible, as required of services not offered at University Health Services. "Having to choose between $200 that I do not have and healthcare has been very troublesome."

Walton also explained that she is at high risk for breast cancer, and yet cannot afford to take early preventative measures. "Many members of my family, including my aunt, have had to have double mastectomies, and yet I have not been keeping up with precautionary measures despite being of the age most at risk," said Walton.

A faculty member submitted a letter to the event anonymously about the pressures being placed upon professors. The letter read "I find it increasingly difficult to do my job as a professor and for it, I am ashamed." It also spoke of the pressures to teach one-credit seminars and the increase of work as three-credit classes become four-credit classes. The letter cited budget constraints are not allowing departments to replace retired professors and possible furloughs with no promise of guaranteed positions to return to. This professor also touched on Chancellor Robert Holub's plans to increase out-of-state student enrollment by 2,500, despite already overcrowded classrooms.

Corey Chenevert, a senior in the social though and political economy (STPEC)

International Career Fair educates

SAMANTHA WEBBER/COLLEGIAN

The Hills on Infirmary Way is where the International Programs Office is located on the University of Masschusetts' campus.

BY CHRISTA ROMANO
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Educational institutions from over 100 different countries joined together this week to celebrate the benefits of international education and exchange worldwide.

The University of Massachusetts hosted various events in recognition of International Education Week, which ran from Sunday, Nov. 15 through Friday, Nov. 20. Events included presentations featuring Cambodian dancing, live speakers from Afghanistan, films from Africa and East Asia, as well as multiple workshops and fairs to aid students in their quest to study or work internationally.

"The whole point of this is to say, 'There is more on this Earth than you can possibly imagine,'" said Assistant Director for Career Planning Caroline Gould during the International Opportunities and Careers Fair on Wednesday. Gould was also a contributor to the production of the fair.

"Living in another part of the world is horizon expanding. Whether that means being an au pair in Germany or working on a dude ranch in Nebraska, it's all about tasting life," Gould said.

According to Gould, the week-long celebration of International Education was not only intended to spark an interest in going abroad for students, but also served as a way to promote the importance of an international education.

In a world that gets smaller every day, Gould said the need to communicate in other languages and with people of other cultures is becoming necessary for students entering into business and service industries in order to reach their maximum potential success. International education is a substantial service industry in and of itself, contributing more than $15.5 billion to the U.S. economy.

"Students seem very interested in learning department spoke of the program's plans to create revenue. Chenevert spoke of the department's decision to recruit out-of-state students for the program in hopes of increasing both out-of-state admissions and funding for the department. "The department has a weekly meeting when we discuss potential ways to increase revenue," said Chenevert. "Options included online classes, which is an unfeasible educational approach for STPEC. We decided to do more outreach."

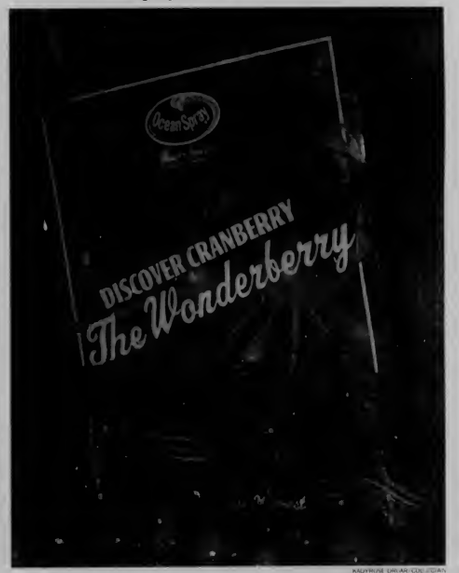
Chenevert spoke of traveling out-of-state to give speeches to private schools whose students can potentially afford the higher tuition. They traveled to New York, Connecticut and New Jersey, states outside of the New England region that pay in-state tuition for this department. To end his speech, Chenevert said, "I was disappointed that Massachusetts students were unable to hear my speech, causing the STPEC program to remain a hidden department." He added, "The budget cuts are affectively resulting in the privatization of UMass."

Also speaking at the event was state Rep. Peter V. Kocot, of the first Hampshire district, who discussed the need for University staff members and students to lobby to their representatives for funding. Kocot talked about his support for progressive taxes for public education, and called on students and faculty by saying "you need to engage this as a political battle," and remarking, "this is a guerilla war."

On the event, UMass junior Rachel Antony-Levine, a BDIC major said, "I believe college should be for everyone, and that all should be able to access state-funded higher education." Antony-Levine hopes that Thursday's event will "help UMass students realize that they own their education and have the ability to shape and control what they want their University to look like."



Another student in attendance, Kelley Anne Curlay, a junior in the STPEC department, said "in today's present economy, we, as residents of Massachusetts, need more state funding for higher learning institutions. Otherwise, it will lead to the privatization of the University."

A mediator of the event Sam Dreyfus, spoke of PHENOM's past work lobbying for state funding. For three years, the group has participated in a Spring Lobby Day. Each time, PHENOM has won increases in the MASSGrant Program, a financial assistance grant program that was almost cancelled last year. Dreyfus hopes this continued event will "build a state-wide movement," adding, "When we get together and lobby, we can really make a difference."

Award-winning writer visits

By Michelle Williams
Collegian Staff

Thursday night, Charles Simic came to the University of Massachusetts to speak in the Fine Arts Center's University Gallery as a part of the University's Visiting Writers Series.

Simic read from his work in the University Gallery to a mix of undergraduate students, graduate students and community members.

His most recent works include "Dark Things," a translation of Novia Tadic's poems, and "Monster Loves His Labyrinth: Notebooks."

Simic has written over 30 books of poetry. He is one of two poets to receive both the Wallace Stevens and the Edgar Allan Poe Award. His work, "The World Doesn't End," won a Pulitzer Prize in 1990, and his book "Classic Ballroom Dances" won both the 1980 di Castagnola Award and the Harriet Monroe Poetry Award.

The author participated in a free reading sponsored by the Masters of Fine Arts Program for Poets and Writers and Juniper Initiative.

Past writers have included Dars Wier and Mary Gaitskill. Future events will include Sherman Alexie and Sam Lipsyte speaking about their works.

Born in Belgrade, which at the time was apart of Yugoslavia, Simic grew up in war-torn Europe. He immigrated to the United States in 1954 when he was 16, and lived in Chicago.

Simic received his B.A from New York University. He taught creative writing at University of New Hampshire for 25 years.

International education pushes for global mindset about international opportunities for after they graduate," said International Programs Officer Laurel Foster-Moore in regards to the large turnout the fair received.

Gould added, "I think that the economic situation in America is really pushing a lot more students to find international opportunities."

Many students have expressed an interest in an international education, Gould said, adding that the opportunity to travel abroad is especially important now regarding the state of the U.S and global economy.

Daniel Stone, a senior at UMass, said that he hopes to spend some time working in a Latin American country to teach English after graduation.

"I'm not sure what I want to do for grad school yet and this economy is not the best to look for a job," Stone said about his decision to work abroad. "I want to travel before I'm locked down with a real job or with school. I like traveling and I think it would be beneficial to my career to become fluent in Spanish by working in a Spanish-speaking country."

Stone realized his desire to work internationally after spending the last spring semester studying abroad in Mexico. In addition to this program, UMass offers more than 100 study abroad programs and has also established new partnerships this year with colleges and universities in South Africa, China and India. According to the news release, over 1,300 UMass students attended various colleges and universities around the globe last year.

UMass is not the only university that is dedicated to offering students the opportunity to gain an international education. According to the International Education Week factsheet, about 242,000 U.S. students studied abroad and 624,000 students from other countries studied in the U.S. during the 2006-07 academic year.

The International Education Week is currently in its 10th year of tradition, gaining much support from high-ranking government officials.

In an official statement from Secretary of State Hilary Rodham Clinton, she said, "Together, we must respond to the challenges of poverty and hunger, climate change, public health and economic revitalization. Education is an engine for change in all countries and for all people — whose potential to contribute to global progress and prosperity is enhanced when they participate in educational opportunities. Through international educational exchanges, we can build bridges of respect and understanding that will connect people and enable us to work together, now and in the future for a better world."

STAND–ing up against genocide

Why oh why do we pardon those birds?

Matthew M. Robare

Survivor's Guilt. Committing a crime just by being who you are. A massive genocide committed twice a year every year in a supposedly free country. This is the sad, terrifying way of life for millions in America. Every year at Thanksgiving and Christmas, millions of turkeys are slaughtered without mercy.

Except for one.

One lone turkey among the millions of his or her fellows is always spared. But is it compassion? No, it's an injury inflicted on the poor bird worse than the deaths of its friends and family. That turkey is taken to the White House and pardoned.

The origin of this cruel and barbarous act by the leader of we "victors" in the turkey slaughter are now lost in the mists of history and legend. One source says that a turkey was given to the Lincolns in 1863 for their Christmas dinner, but was spared by the president because his son Tad had befriended the bird. The modern tradition is generally attributed to President Harry Truman, when the National Turkey Federation presented him with one in 1947.

However, there is no evidence of this in any of the archives in which his papers and photos reside. All the turkeys presented to President Eisenhower over his two terms are known to have been eaten. The first attested evidence of the president pardoning a turkey is dated in 1963, when John F. Kennedy spared the one presented to him a few days before he went to Texas (Perhaps the turkey was afraid Kennedy would change his mind). The tradition was formalized in 1989 during the presidency of George H.W. Bush, who issued a formal presidential pardon to the turkey.

After being pardoned, the turkey has usually been taken to a high security concentration camp (i.e. a farm) as part of a life sentence. In more recent years, as part of a new way to emphasize their subservience and demean this proud and noble flock, the turkey has been taken to a Disney resort to be grand marshall in the Thanksgiving Day parade.

Good God! That's like the Soviet Union celebrating its birth with a parade led by supporters of the Tsar or Mensheviks.

> One lone turkey among the millions of his or her fellows is always spared. But is it compassion?

Just imagine what the poor turkey must be going through. A few weeks before the parade he discovers that he's the one who will survive the eating, who will be pardoned by the president while his parents, uncles, aunts, cousins, brothers, sisters, wife and his children will all be killed ruthlessly, then have their corpses desecrated, cooked and eaten. Contemplating that future throughout the year must have stressed him out, given him nightmares and depressed him.

At first, as you or I would be, he is elated. In love with life just from the mere fact of being alive, and maybe even feeling a little immortal. Full of vitality and energy, and happy for the first time in his life until he sees a turkey who wasn't so lucky. Instantly, reality sets in and the turkey's psyche is utterly destroyed by the guilt of being the sole survivor of his generation.

Of having to pass on the knowledge and history of the turkeys to the young ones and bear their questioning stares, "How did you survive?"

The turkey, now emotionally hollow and a shell of his former self, is then taken to Washington and from there to Florida to be grand marshall. He is made to be the guest of honor at a parade celebrating the genocide of his fellows. How can anything be so cruel?

An even crueler aspect of this barbaric presidential tradition is that the turkey's life is not just spared. He receives a presidential pardon. Pardons are usually given out when the president feels that a person has been imprisoned (or may be imprisoned, as was the case with Gerald Ford pardoning Richard Nixon in 1974) wrongly or unjustly. In other words, to be pardoned, a person needs to have been accused of committing a crime.

What crime has any turkey committed? They have always been loyal Americans, living and defending this land before there were any humans around, and they have kept themselves thoroughly protected against avian flu. Apparently, it is a crime for a turkey to be a turkey, and the punishment is death.

I believe that bald eagles are responsible for the oppression of turkeys. They have the best motives, having been rivals for many years. Benjamin Franklin wanted the turkey to be America's bird, pointing out "For the Truth the Turkey is in Comparison a much more respectable Bird, and withal a true original Native of America ... He is besides, though a little vain & silly, a Bird of Courage ... " and noting eagles' bad morals, laziness and cowardice.

This is paranoia on the part of eagles, the turkeys are no threat to them. But perhaps, in the end, that's the point. Mistrust, jealousy and fear have created a state of affairs where the ordinary eagle needs little motivation to abuse and torture the turkey. The eagles have also lost sight of their own role in the situation, forgetting that encouraging people to eat turkeys would result in there being more turkeys, while the eagle population has dwindled into endangerment. Let us all remember the horrifying consequences of such hatred this Thanksgiving.

Oh, and pass the gravy.

The World Cup to high school, how bad is cheating?

This week, Thierry Henry introduced France's own "Hand of God" goal to the soccer world. It (possibly) gave them their entrance into the World Cup this coming year.

Ben Moriarty

And to the dismay of the Irish, it is because of pure cheating.

The original "Hand of God" goal, if you didn't know, was during a game in the 1986 World Cup (you know, the biggest sporting event in the world) between England and Argentina. Diego Maradona, one of the greatest footballers of all time, reached into the air and handballed the ball into the goal on a cross, giving Argentina the lead, and eventually the win.

Completely illegal? Yes. Completely badass? Also yes.

Does France care that Henry used a handball to give him an advantage to cross it for a goal? No. Does Argentina care that Maradona handballed a goal instead of in some "fair" way? No.

Does any outside person really care? Only if they're trying to prove a point, or if they're one of those goody two shoes that everyone tries to avoid.

All of us got the idea that cheating is wrong pounded into our brains from the moment we were kids. But is it really so bad?

One of my friends and I talked about this a lot this past summer. To both of us, it obviously is preferential to do things honestly, but maybe only because there is no risk involved in that method. Cheating is, like most things, a life skill. If you can do it properly, why not go for it?

In high school, I did my fair share of cheating. I think I cheated on every biology test my freshman year, and I got Ds on every single one except the one chapter I read. I used to go online and look up who people were during my AP U.S. history tests, and I think I got Cs on all of those.

> But even if he had the ability to overcome his laziness by cheating, I couldn't possibly care less about "cheating yourself," but it indirectly cheats other people as well by the way of grade inflation.

I shrunk, because I knew my teacher's copy machine code, all the words and definitions for my final vocabulary test and distributed them out to the class, only to not use one and do very well on it, while most people who used it did poorly.

It took me a long time to realize that I was really bad at cheating and I shouldn't do it.

So I gave it up, partly because I am lazy and don't care that much, partly because I suck at it and do better not cheating at all. Maybe because doing the work actually produces better work, but I don't know about that.

In one of my classes, I saw some kid in the back row on his phone looking things up online. And it got me thinking, because I can't remember the last time I cheated on a test and forgot the feeling. "What a jerk."

A lot of that feeling was because he was so horrible at it. He was trying to be discreet, but he was just a fool in fool's clothing. Trying to sneakily play around with his phone, typing things into it, acting like no one knew what he was doing. I contemplated telling my professor, mostly because he deserved it for being so dumb, but I refrained from doing so.

In the end, you get what's coming for you. In his case, sure, he may not have been caught this time, because most people in the class probably pitied him, but he was either too dumb to learn it or too lazy with no quality that would make up for the laziness.

A sad set of qualities indeed.

But even if he had the ability to overcome his laziness by cheating, I couldn't possibly care less about "cheating yourself," but it indirectly cheats other people as well by the way of grade inflation.

Yet, I still say go for the gold.

DC Showdown: Berkshire v. Hampshire

Berkshire is better

Thomas Moore

The typical college student, during their fourish years here at the University of Massachusetts, will experience quite a bit out of life. Grueling all-night study sessions, Saturday afternoon football games, long hikes up to the Townhouse of Amherst Apartments for weekend parties and watching Quidditch games on the commons are just a few of the memorable practices that are forming this period of our lives. Although these are all important, the experience that will truly make or break our time as college students is clear: the dining commons (DC's).

The most important thing to clear up is which DC is the best. We need to remember that this is far from a blind comparison of Coke and Pepsi, but more realistically of Coke and salt water.

Yes, it really does matter which DC you're eating at. Yes, there are drastic differences between them. And yes, I will persuade you in the next 650 words that the Berkshire Dining Commons is better than the Hampshire Dining Commons.

Before we even get to the actual food, we need to remember that atmosphere and ambiance play a huge role in our eating experience. The first thing you notice when walking up to Berkshire are the flashing lights and contemporary/modern entry way. On the contrary, the entrance to Hampshire's DC not only sports brick walls, but also brick floor that screams, "Hello, and welcome to Shawshank State Prison." Walking into Berkshire, on the other hand, is like entering a hip and exclusive night club that perfectly fits the aura of the Southwest Residential Area. Berkshire is able to capture the mood of excitement and fun before students even take a bite of food.

The first thing that one does (or should do) before eating is make a pit-stop at the restroom to wash up. A small but important point about Berkshire in regards to this hygienic habit: The DC sports automatic toilets, urinals and sinks. Hampshire on the other hand? Full on contact with every bacterially magnetic flusher and faucet that would give a heart attack to any mildly germaphobic individual.

I could spend the rest of this column talking about the superior ambiance of Berkshire. I could talk about how there are three plasma screen televisions that are placed so that no seat is out of eye-shot. I could talk about how the lighting dims and brightens with the onset of different times of day. I could talk about how there are comfortable booths – both party sized and regular – to eat in with friends. Heck, I could probably spend the entire column just ranting about the six-tiered rotating plate return that you never have to wait in line for.

But I won't. Let's move onto the food.

I don't know if it's the lighting, but something about the serving area makes the food just look better at Berkshire. In Hampshire, with the low light and high school cafeteria-style serving platform, the food looks mediocre at best. Presentation is key, and Berkshire displays its food wonderfully.

The main-menu meal is on a constantly rotating schedule, so you never see the same food two days in a row, or even two days apart. During my extensive field studies, I have encountered everything from buffalo wings, to shrimp scampi, to shepherd's pie, to stuffed ravioli to full-out turkey dinners with all the fixings. Because all of the DCs share the same main-course menu, Berkshire can't boast too much in it. But what it can boast is it "specialty areas" that remain consistent.

Berkshire has so many other great options that when the main-menu dish fails, your dining experience doesn't have to as well. For the pizza fans, Berkshire has fresh oven-baked pizza with the wildest and most tasty assortment of toppings made all day. That's right, you don't have to go all the way to Antonio's for your CBR (chicken bacon ranch) or Sicilian slice.

Berkshire also has a grill that is constantly pumping out burgers, seasoned chicken breasts and hotdogs right before your eyes. Not a fan of meat? Berkshire houses a 50-foot salad bar but a vegan center as well. This is something that Hampshire cannot claim.

If you haven't been convinced that Berkshire is better than Hampshire yet, here comes the exclamation point on the whole sentence: late night. Hampshire closes at 9:00 p.m., but those of us on "college time" know that hunger doesn't disappear when the DC closes. If you're exclusively a fan of Hampshire, you'll have to turn to alternative and more expensive means of food via delivery, which will take quite a bit of time. Berkshire fans don't have to do that. The doors open for Berkshire late night starting at 9:30 p.m. running until 12:00 a.m. serving your favorite foods like bread bowl soup, "mozz" sticks and waffle Sundays. The popularity of late night has grown so much that fans receive a weekly message via Facebook with the menu.

So what are you waiting for? If you're reading this and you're in Hampshire right now, grab your friends and hit up Berkshire! (No financial incentives have influenced this writing, but some free meal swipes would be greatly appreciated).

Happier at Hampshire

Alex Perry

Hampshire Dining Commons is undoubtedly the best DC on campus, although it certainly doesn't have that reputation. Particularly during lunch, the food at Hampshire is not at all comparable to Berkshire. The burritos made at Hampshire might be the best item made anywhere on campus. The sandwich line, although sometimes slow, is always worth the wait because the sandwiches are well made and you get the clutch option to toast your sandwich. I find the staff at Hampshire to be generally friendlier and they seem happier to serve you, while at Berkshire, you're just another number. The best part of Hampshire are the lack of lines. You can simply walk up and get your food whenever you want it. Unlike Berkshire, there is not a constant battle to get through lines, find a table or walk around in general. At Berkshire, you may find yourself roaming around, holding your multi-colored plates and looking for a table in the middle of a big crowd. It's annoying. Half the battle at Berkshire is finding a table without dropping your stuff. This is never the case at Hampshire. The crowds and noise at Berkshire make one feel as though they are on a crowded subway car at all times, but at Hampshire, it is calm. You feel more like you're relaxing at the beach than eating at a DC. And when you have got all your food and are finally seated, one can actually watch and hear the TV. It's truly a great experience.

So why then, do I even have to write this? Shouldn't this be obvious to everyone? I am pretty sure I know why Berkshire has the reputation for being the best DC, and that is of course "Berkshire Fan." Berkshire Fan is the stereotypical person that comes to mind when one thinks of the people who love to go to Berkshire. It's important to note I am not talking about all people who go to Berkshire, just specifically, Berkshire Fan.

We have all met Berkshire Fan and there are a few things everyone should know about Berkshire Fan before arguing with them about which DC is better.

First and foremost, Berkshire Fans are mostly freshmen who have the perception that they were cool in high school (although sometimes Berkshire Fan extends to older students). Berkshire Fan thinks Berkshire is the end-all-be-all of eating because it is their last chance to maintain their status from high school. Berkshire reminds them so much of the stereotypical high school cafeteria because of the large crowds and the large cross-section of cliques you see at Berkshire dinner tables. Let me give an example of how to spot a Berkshire Fan. Berkshire Fan never travels alone at the DC. You never see people eating alone at Berkshire during peak hours, because that's just not what Berkshire Fan uses Berkshire for. Berkshire Fan needs to be surrounded by friends at all times, because their friends are their existence on top of the fact that they are really cool and they want you to know that. The athletes sit together. The girls who think they are auditioning for roles in "Mean Girls 2" sit together. You all know what I'm talking about. For this reason, Berkshire Fan loves the fact that the dining areas are always packed during peak hours, particularly at dinner time. Berkshire Fan thrives when this is the case because when they go and sit with their cool friends, they will be seen by lots of other people and, in an ideal world for Berkshire Fan, these people will be less cool and less attractive than them. This builds up Berkshire Fan's confidence and reconfirms just how cool they were in high school. At Hampshire, getting this satisfaction would be impossible on the same scale because not enough people go and the setting is much more laid back.

The most threatening thing you can do to Berkshire Fan is tell them how not cool it is to go to Berkshire. They despise this because if going to Berkshire is not cool, that means that they, in turn, are not cool. If you ever threatened Berkshire fan with this, they would get extremely defensive and tell you a lot of stuff about how much cooler the scenery at Berkshire is, or how there is trendy food such as sushi and tofu at Berkshire. They may even criticize Hampshire, saying "Nobody goes there." These three things, of course, just re-confirm to non-Berkshire Fan just how messed up Berkshire Fan really is. Berkshire Fan knows deep down Berkshire isn't better then Hampshire, but Berkshire Fan is made up of followers. Berkshire Fan needs to do what the crowd does in order to feel as though they fit in and are therefore cool. We all know the true motive of Berkshire Fan going to Berkshire over Hampshire – it's being seen at Berkshire. That's the difference between Berkshire Fan and Hampshire Fan. Hampshire Fans are looking for the best DC, Berkshire Fans are looking for the best place to recreate the high school lunch room.

On top of all of this, I don't even think the "scenery" is better at Berkshire. Berkshire's scenery is overrated and it starts from the second you walk in. There is a series of vertical blue lights that go up the side of a yellow wall. What kind of scenery is that? It looks more like the entrance to a space station in a cheesy futuristic 1980s movie than an entrance to a popular dining facility. I half expect to get greeted by someone telling me to make sure I strap in before we make the jump to light speed every time I walk in. Oh, and don't forget the romantic view through the glass on the right hand side of the entrance. You can see pavement, the horseshoe and the Pita Pit all at once! What a joke.

If you are looking for a friendly service, a consistently good meal – in relative DC terms – and you don't want to wait in long lines during peak hours to find out fried steak is the main entree on the menu, you go to Hampshire. It's a simple choice for all of us who have already had our first beer. It's time to grow up and see the DC battle for what it is, no contest.

Land of Talk frontwoman talks about new album

By Sam Butterfield
Collegian Staff

Sometimes it pays to put things into perspective and remember what made you want to do something in the first place.

After a brush with losing her voice while touring last year, that's the lesson Elizabeth Powell, frontwoman for the Montreal indie trio Land of Talk, learned.

After what she described as a devastating break-up with her boyfriend and the scare of losing something as precious to a singer as her voice, Powell said she needed some time to pour her innermost feelings into a project and to relax, reconsider her priorities and go back to why she started playing music in the first place – to have a good time.

She began experimenting with the computer program Garage Band last year while on the road and played songs without amplifiers into her laptop's microphone, adding digital guitar effects and drum beats.

Powell said she never expected her personal tinkering to transform into real material, but that when the band played her songs and matched live music to what she had created on the computer, they struck gold.

What resulted is "Fun and Laughter," a four-track EP on Saddle Creek, the band's first release on the Omaha label, which was put out this fall.

The group has been touring since October and did a run of shows on the West Coast before swinging back east for a brief run.

They play in Boston on Wednesday, Burlington, Vt., on Thursday and at the Iron Horse Music Hall in Northampton on Friday before finishing out their stint in New York City.

Powell said that the tour for "Fun and Laughter," has, fittingly enough, been nothing else but that.

"It's been pretty awesome," she said of the shows.

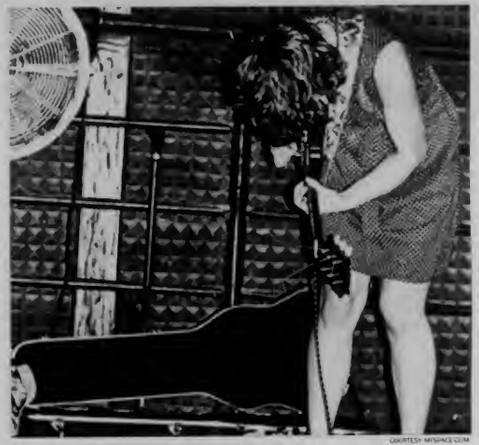
"This tour seems like there's a lot more fun, a lot more laughter," she went on. "I don't want to sound cheesy, but it could be a self-fulfilling prophecy, maybe we'll title the next album 'Rich and Successful,'" she joked.

Powell said her experience last year promoting Land of Talk's full-length debut album, "Some Are Lakes," and doing double duty singing in Toronto collective Broken Social Scene, wore her to a raw point and forced her to do some reflecting on her goals and desires.

"Last year was such a grind, I was singing with both bands, I ended up almost having to get surgery, it put a lot in perspective," she said.

"I kind of know what's important to me now and what's not worth getting stressed out about," she said. "I freed up some emotional space so I could be happier on this tour, I'm just enjoying."

Powell said "Fun and Laughter" is a product of some intense emotional turmoil, and was something she felt she needed to put out as a form of catharsis.



"I just wanted to get those songs out," she said. "Those four songs just needed to be released ASAP for personal reasons."

Powell said she was pleased at the responses to the new EP.

Elizabeth Powell describes her emotionally charged recent work. A bad break-up and fears of losing her voice prompted her to gain new perspective.

Land of Talk will with play tonight at the Iron Horse on tour in promotion of "Fun and Laughter," their latest album.

"I'm super happy with the songs, with the way everyone's receiving it, people who we know are our fans," she said.

But on how she feels when she hears it?

"I don't listen to it, I think you should tell me that," she said.

"Fun and Laughter" is certainly something of a departure from the band's earlier work. Slower and often more melody based, the songs feature Powell's characteristic rich harmonies and a broad range of dynamics, but seem more calculated and less intense and ripping than "Some are Lakes" and the group's first EP, "Applause Cheer Boo Hiss!"

The EP opens with "Sixteen Asterisk," an even-tempoed song where Powell muses on her increased recognition and on life's obligations and stresses. The song crescendos to a building point of tension with snare drums and well-matched guitar and bass, but never rocks in the way the band does on earlier songs like "Corner Phone" and "Speak to Me Bones."

It then transitions to "May You Never," which starts slowly with a dreary piano line and a haunting, dulled opening vocal sequence before kicking into a livelier, more energized chorus, reminiscent of work from Rilo Kiley or Cat Power.

From there, the EP shifts to "As Me," another slow song relative to much of the band's work. Powell's voice is smooth and coos softly throughout the song, which features a characteristically downward slanting guitar sequence and light, steady drums.

The last song is "A Series of Small Flames," which Powell said might be the biggest departure from previous work the band has made. Powell plays a light guitar and recorded the drums herself, and sings a high, soft tone throughout the song, which has no real bass and features a background echo of high, distant vocals.

Land of Talk plays Friday with Surprise Me Mr. Davis, featuring The Slip and Nathan Moore at the Iron Horse Music Hall. Tickets are $14 at the door. "Fun and Laughter" is in stores now.

Big D and the Kids Table to bring adult language

By Ellie Rulon-Miller
Collegian Staff

Boston's Big D and the Kids Table will be taking the stage at Pearl Street in Northampton for the first time in several years tonight.

Joining the ska-punk band will be three other bands: illScarlett from Ontario, Canada, The Stereo State (formerly known as FiveAcrossTheEyes) from Holyoke, Mass., and Skasome Society from Westfield, Mass.

The show will be one of Big D's few ventures into the western half of Massachusetts in the last couple of years. The band typically plays in and around Boston and is very widely known for their energetic Boston pride song "LAX," in which they manage to angrily drop the F-bomb 26 times.

Big D and the Kids Table's July 2009 release, "Fluent in Stroll," brought along a lineup change in addition to a few new female singers who are now touring with the band. The departure of former drummer Jon Reilly brought about the addition of Derek Davis from Lenox to the band. Davis' drumming style fits perfectly with Big D's new dub-infused sound.

The songs on "Fluent in Stroll" feature lyrics drawn, in some cases identically, from singer Dave McWane's poetry. McWane released a collection of poetry, prose and lyrics called "The Gypsy Mile" in 2007.

At first, illScarlett's sound is typical white-boy-with-dread-locks reggae-infused ska. Singer Alex Norman's voice sounds like something you've heard before, but can't pinpoint exactly where, and the music doesn't sound particularly unique either. His voice grows on the listener, though, and as you listen, you pick up on those little things that make music enjoyable. It has flow to it, and will complement Big D's new sound nicely.

Holyoke, Mass.'s, The Stereo State has been making music and performing regularly for the last decade. Previously known as FiveAcrossTheEyes, the band's sound has changed some from its former hardcore-with-just-a-sprinkle-of-a-hip-hop-vibe to a slightly more refined, melodic, purely hardcore punk sound.

Skasome Society, featuring two University of Massachusetts students, is preparing for the release of their first full-length album, "PC4PC." It will be their first release since an EP the band put out in the spring of 2008. The new release sounds much more professional and shows how the band has grown and matured since its inception. Skasome recorded "PC4PC" over the summer and plans to release it during the month of December.

If you bought your ticket in advance, you likely only paid $12.50 for it. Tickets are $15 at the door. Make sure you catch the B43 no later than 6 p.m. because the show starts at 7 p.m.

Raising the Dead: Dark Star Orchestra to play NoHo

By John Shaver
Collegian Correspondent

The spirit of the Grateful Dead will rise tonight at the Calvin Theatre. The world-renowned Dark Star Orchestra (DSO) will bring the Dead back to Northampton tonight. They have been touring with the legendary Donna Jean Godchaux, who was in the Grateful Dead during the 1970s.

DSO has worked with Grateful Dead set lists over the past 30 years to recreate former concerts and attempt to bring back the spirit of the Dead with every show. Their note-for-note precision in duplicating past shows has gotten them heavy media attention and opportunities that most bands would only dream of.

This DSO show will be different than any other. It follows in the wake of singer and founding member John Kadlecik's resignation from the band on Monday. Kadlecik has been doing work with former Grateful Dead members Phil Lesh and Bob Weir, as well as with Joe Russo from the Benevento/Russo Duo and two members of RatDog on a project called "Further."

The faux-Dead group is nearing the end of its winter tour with Donna Jean, which started in late September. The group's final tour will take place on Dec. 5 in Buffalo, N.Y. Many DSO fans are not sure how the band will carry on without Kadlecik, and are skeptical about anyone else trying to fill the great Jerry Garcia's shoes. But Jeff Mattson is going to try.

Mattson is currently the guitarist of the Donna Jean Godchaux Band with Jeff Mattson and has played with Donna Jean and his band, the Zen Tricksters. He also toured with Phil Lesh and Friends, playing originals as well as covers of Grateful Dead songs. Dino English, one of the drummers of DSO, only speaks of Jeff Mattson in high regard. "Jeff is a phenomenal guitar player," English said. "He never runs out of things to say musically." His experience touring with Donna Jean and other members of the Dead gives him a great advantage over any other guitar player. There is a certain level of confidence that Dark Star needs to have in a guitar player for them to share the stage with them, and Mattson has it. "We were not afraid to put Jeff out there for everybody to see," English said. "Our goal is to get the best person out there for this position. Someone who understands the music, understands what we're doing and presents the music with the best clarity."

His addition to the already talented lineup is going to be very special and maybe short-lived. He was planning on filling in for John Kadlecik for a few concerts while Kadlecik was playing with Further, but it looks like his journey with DSO will be more extended than anyone initially thought. DSO has released information that Mattson will be filling in indefinitely after Dec. 5 until at least the end of their winter tour that starts in February 2010. No talks about the future have sprung up yet, but time will tell.

Renowned Grateful Dead cover band, Dark Star Orchestra will play tonight at the Calvin Theatre with Jeff Matson, who will attempt to fill Jerry Garcia's enormous shoes.

"We don't make any quick decisions like that," English said. "We like to play with people for a while and not mak[e] assumptions."

This talented group of musicians doesn't just recreate the music of the Dead, but the experience. Their flawless renditions of past shows give the look, feel and experience of a real Grateful Dead show to those who were not alive in May of 1977, or just don't remember. DSO captures what it meant to be at the Watkins Jam or at Barton Hall and still keep the tradition of never playing the same song twice.

Last time the group came to the Calvin Theatre, they played a set from 1990 which included some of the Dead's well-known songs, such as "Box of Rain" and "Greatest Story Ever Told," as well as some cover tunes like "All Along the Watchtower" by Bob Dylan and "The Weight" by The Band. This show had a killer set list, but don't expect the same tonight. The band looks at the history of what they have played at that venue in the past and chooses something different.

"When we go to a venue," English said, "we just try to make it different from the last time we were there."

DSO and the Donna Jean Godchaux Band with Jeff Mattson will perform at the Calvin Theatre in Northampton tonight at 8 p.m. Tickets are $27.

Goats beware: Clooney's got the look

George Clooney stars in the side-splitting comedy 'The Men Who Stare at Goats' in a knock out cast including Kevin Spacey and Ewan McGregor. The film follows the adventures of a naive journalist (McGregor) reporting during the Iraq War.

By Nora Drapalski
Collegian Staff

Goats Beware: Clooney has a few new tricks up his sleeve that might just cause your heart to stop.

George Clooney brings audiences back in time with his new film, "The Men Who Stare at Goats." Based on the nonfiction book by Jon Ronson, "The Men Who Stare at Goats" follows journalist Bob Wilton as he goes to Iraq in order to find his next big story.

Humor is aplenty in this wonderfully crafted film by Grant Heslov. A satirical take on the U.S. military during the 1980s, "Goats" is a laugh-out-loud comedy with plenty of inside jokes and LSD-driven bouts of insanity.

While the plot is a bit ridiculous – did the U.S. Army really invest money into developing Warrior Monks who could kill goats just by staring at them? – the casting of the film is spectacular.

Ewan McGregor stars as Bob Wilton, accompanied by veteran actor George Clooney, who plays Lyn Cassady, an eccentric man who claims he was part of an army military operation dedicated to exploring psychic abilities as a weapon during the war.

McGregor and Clooney light up the screen with their impeccable timing and easy relationship. Both actors play their parts so perfectly that it is difficult to find fault with their portrayals. Any issue with the characters is attributable to the screenwriting, not the acting ability of the two.

McGregor brings realism to such an extravagant story. As the film's narrator, he completely immerses the audience into the tale, voicing thoughts and questions as an intelligent, yet desperate and naïve journalist.

Clooney portrays the character of Lyn with a practiced ease only the former "Sexiest Man Alive" could pull off. Lyn is both comedic and contemplative, constantly flashing back to his time in the New Earth Army.

Jeff Bridges and Kevin Spacey round off the cast as two other Fort Bragg and New Earth Army members. As Bill Django, founder of the New Earth Army, Bridges embraces the hippie-influenced background of his character and once again proves to be a wonderful actor. Spacey, as Lyn Cassady's former rival, Larry Hooper, reminds audiences everywhere why he has won two Oscars. His stern-faced performance in the beginning and ridiculous LSD-induced wanderings in the end only add to the excellent performances of the ensemble.

The beauty of this film is that comedy has been woven into almost every aspect of the film – the setting, character interaction and character personality. George Clooney has once again made a film that appeals to both college students and their parents.

The protagonist of the film, Wilton, becomes wrapped in this unbelievable story told by Lyn Cassady, causing this normal, recently divorced journalist from Michigan to be captured by terrorists, stranded in the desert and eventually involved in a secret military operation. The resulting events and experiences are humorous simply due to their absurdity.

The funniest moments in the film are sprouted by the character of Lyn Cassady. Lyn so firmly believes that he has super powers that Wilton is almost forced to believe what he says due to his intensity alone.

In a nod to McGregor's previous work in the Star Wars series, Lyn consistently refers to the trained specialists as "Jedi Warriors." While at first mention, the irony of Lyn having to explain what a "Jedi Warrior" is to Obi-Wan Kenobi himself is rather side-splitting, the repeated use of the term grows old rather quickly though.

Even when the movie is over and the credits have run, "The Men Who Stare at Goats" will leave you happy, barely able to breathe and wanting more. And, if you have the time and seem to find yourself thinking about staring at a goat or two (or hamsters, for those who doubt their abilities), here are a few things Wilton would remind you of. First, "More of this is true than you would believe." Second, "Now, more than ever, we need the Jedi." And finally, the most cruel and unusual punishment used to torture prisoners of war is subjecting them to the endless singing of "I Love You" by Barney and Friends. Remember, America, Bill Django wants you to be "All you can be."

ACDC delivers old tricks on newly released box set

By Dmitriy Gabriel
Collegian Correspondent

As if "Black Ice" wasn't enough, the musical juggernaut that is AC/DC has decided yet again to bless the collective musical universe with a new product. "Backtrack," a new three-disk box set, contains some fun and delightfully odd and obscure tracks, as well as more live songs and video footage than you can shake a guitar at. Unfortunately, not even the box made to resemble a Marshall stack makes this worth the purchase for anyone but the most dedicated of AC/DC fans.

"Studio Rarities" is the first disk in the series, and contains the kinds of gems one would have previously had to scour the Internet for – all remastered. A large portion of these tracks are standard AC/DC fare: catchy riff, simplistic, crunchy guitar solo; the works. However, a few caught my attention, most notably, "Love Song" and "Crabsody in Blue." "Love Song" is the closest I have ever heard AC/DC come to a ballad, singing and playing softy and slowly. "Crabsody in Blue" is another interesting slow number, though the subject matter – catching crabs – indicates that this is anything but a ballad.

In addition, there are several other tunes that will catch your attention – specifically if you are growing weary of the same formulaic AC/DC and wish to hear something fresh. Not to mention, the tracks feature both former singer Bon Scott and the current Brian Johnson, so fans of both camps will get a kick out of the first disk.

The second disk is titled "Live Rarities." "Rarities" is a bit of a stretch, as only about half of these songs can be dubbed as such. Rare performances, perhaps, but "T.N.T." and "Rock 'n' roll Ain't Noise Pollution" hardly qualify as obscure. However, everything here has been digitally enhanced to make the sound as crisp as ever. New it is not, but definitely aesthetically pleasing to the ear.

The third disk is a DVD containing over a dozen videos spanning AC/DC's lengthy career. The first nine numbers are exclusively from the '90s and on, with tracks lifted from "Hallbreaker," "Stiff Upper Lip" and the most recent "Black Ice." Though arguably not the finest AC/DC has ever produced, a collector will get a kick out of these.

The second part of the DVD features songs everyone and their grandmother has previously heard. "It's a Long Way to the Top (If You Wanna Rock 'n' Roll)," "Highway To Hell" and yes, "You Shook Me All Night Long," are featured here. Live renditions of "Dirty Deeds Done Dirt Cheap" and "Highway to Hell" seem to have been thrown in at the end for good measure, as well as two making of clips for "Hard as a Rock" and "Rock 'n' Roll Train." Not necessary, but a nice touch for the collector.

Overall, "Backtracks," is a decent package. There are several numbers on the first disk that alone warrant the purchase of this package – if you are a rabid fan. The addition of a concerts worth of remastered live tracks as well as videos from their not-so-glorious days was nice, but ultimately only die-hard followers will see reason in purchasing yet another AC/DC box set.

Members of the Minutemen compete in a meet earlier this season. UMass travels to New York City to race in the IC4A Championships this weekend.

UM heads to NYC for final meet of '09 season

By Daniel Herberholz
Collegian Staff

A week after failing to qualify for the NCAA Tournament, the Massachusetts cross country teams will travel to Bronx, N.Y., to compete in the IC4A Championships.

The meet, hosted by the Eastern College Athletic Conference, will mark the end of the season for the UMass teams.

The Minutemen plan to send the bottom seven runners to New York for the race. Two of the races this season – the NCAA Regional Qualifier last week in Boston and the ISU Pre-Nationals in Terre Haute, Ind. – were limited to seven runners per team.

However, this week offers an opportunity for the runners left out in those meets to compete and showcase their skills.

"This race serves a different kind of purpose as an extension of the season," men's coach Ken O'Brien said. "[The new runners] will now be the top seven people, so they'll be more front and center. The kids are at various stages, so I have layered expectations [for this weekend]."

O'Brien said this week offers "a hint of the level of competition" for those runners, especially since they will be facing teams from outside the Atlantic 10.

"This is a bigger theater, with teams from Maine to North Carolina, not just the normal 14 from the A-10," O'Brien said.

Junior Kevin Johnson, the first finisher for the men in the past three meets, will not compete this week. Johnson was recently named to the Atlantic 10 All-Conference Academic team, his second straight year receiving the honors.

"The fact that he did it as a sophomore last year is a great response to what was put on his shoulders as a college student," O'Brien said, adding that Johnson "embodies" the dedication needed of a serious runner.

Johnson will look to lead the team next season as well in hopes of returning to the NCAA Championships.

"If anyone else is able to compete like him [next year], it will probably be because he will have showed them how to do it," O'Brien said.

Redshirt junior Shiyi Zan joins Johnson with the honors, also her second year on the All-Conference Academic team.

A-10 Freshman of the Year Courtney Baldwin and Zan have paced the women in the second half of this season, finishing first and second respectively in each of the last four meets.

This weekend offers a chance for the other girls to step up, with the extra meet after the NCAA qualifier coming as practice for the team next year.

The weekend race is the Division I Championship for the Intercollegiate Association of Amateur Athletes of America, with this year's IC4A Championships being the 101st year of the semi-annual cross country and track and field competition.

Last year, the men finished 13th in the IC4A Championship, while the women did not run. The men have ended the season with a race at Van Cortlandt Park the past six seasons, while the women have finished there the last three.

UMass faces BC and BU in Boston over weekend

By Jeffrey Engmann
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts swimming team will head to Boston to compete in the three-day Terrier Invitational beginning Friday, while the diving team heads to Harvard for the Harvard Diving Invitational. The Minutemen are looking to win the invitational for the fourth consecutive year, while the Minutewomen will look to improve upon their third-place finish last season.

Both swimming and diving teams are coming off of a one-week layoff, after defeating Binghamton in impressive fashion in their third home meet of the season. This weekend presents a different challenge for both teams as they will compete in their first invitational of the young season.

Invitationals usually feature several teams, and are spread out over an extended period, allowing swimmers and divers the proper amount of rest to put on strong individual performances over the course of three days. They consist of preliminary races in the morning, followed up by final meets in the afternoon. Although the beginning of the season was heavily loaded with dual meets, the next part of the schedule is more balanced, with both teams competing in three invitationals overall this season.

This weekend's invitational features some of the top swimming programs across the Northeast, and will be held at Boston University's competition pool.

The Minutemen defeated the Terriers earlier this season by a slight margin (153-147). The Minutemen won the race in exciting fashion, pulling ahead of the Terriers in the last race of the day. Since then, the Terriers have gone 3-1 in their dual meets. In the first Mid-Major Swimming and Diving Poll released this week, the College Swimming Coaches Association ranked the Minutemen 10th, two slots ahead of the Terriers.

The Minutewomen will be competing against the top-rated Mid-Majors women's swimming and diving team at BU. The BU women are undefeated so far this season, and their unblemished record includes a victory over the Minutewomen earlier this season. The event will also feature future dual meet opponents in Yale University and Boston College.

In last year's Terrier Invitational, the Minutemen had several strong individual performances and came out on top. Among those who had strong contributions were Joe Sbordon, who as a freshman helped the 1650-freestyle as well as the 400-freestyle relay team win. On the women's side, team captain Elizabeth Walsh performed very well, and was among the top-point earners for the Minutewomen. This year's team features many underclassmen, and this will be their first race of this variety.

Each team has started their season out in strong fashion, as they both have earned a 3-1 record in dual meets. The teams hope to continue their strong swimming in a meet that will be their last race before Thanksgiving break. The meets will kick off on Friday at 10 a.m, followed by the same start time Saturday and Sunday.

Marcou brothers add two scores

By Nick O'Malley
Collegian Staff

Michael Marcou scored the first goal of the night, while his brother James scored the game winner in overtime, as the No. 11 Massachusetts hockey team defeated No. 9 Yale, 4-3, Thursday night.

T.J. Syner and Casey Wellman also had goals, while goalkeeper Dan Meyers had a strong showing in goal, recording 28 saves on the night, getting a spot start in place of Paul Dainton.

Although not a Hockey East game, the win against Yale puts another major win on UMass' resume after defeating then-No. 2 Boston University, and will likely move them even further up in the national rankings.

After a strong second period, the Minutemen (8-2, 5-2 Hockey East) held a 2-1 lead on the Bulldogs (2-2-2, 1-1-2 ECAC), but with two unanswered goals early in the third, Yale stormed back ahead.

With 13 minutes, 22 seconds left in the third, the Bulldogs scored their first power-play goal of the night after several missed chances, including multiple shots hitting the post. Sean Backman fired a shot that was blocked by Meyers, but grabbed his own rebound with a scrum in front of the net and flipped it past Meyers for the tying goal.

Just over a minute later, the Bulldogs would score again on a one timer from Andrew Miller to Broc Little to put Yale up 3-2.

The Minutemen continued the third period flurry of goals by taking back the lead two minutes later. In transition, David Boehm fed it to Syner, who fired a shot past goalkeeper Nick Maricic for the tying goal.

The Bulldogs kept the pressure on late in the third, but failed to score the decisive goal, sending the game into overtime. At that point, it was back-and-forth play, until James Marcou put the puck on net and had his deflection go off of Yale's Jimmy Martin and into the net to give UMass the key win.

It took until 6:25 into the first period for Yale to get its first shot on goal for the night. The Bulldogs made it count, though, as Miller scooped up a loose puck off of a faceoff off and fed it to Denny Kearney who snapped it past Myers for the goal.

There was no shortage of opportunities for the Minutemen, who had two power-play opportunities and outshot the Bulldogs 10-7 in the period. UMass' offense, though, failed to produce any prime scoring opportunities outside of a short-handed breakaway by Syner that resulted in his shot ringing off the post.

Yale took the 1-0 lead into the second period and held onto it until Michael Marcou scored his third goal of the season. In transition, Brett Watson took the puck into the offensive zone and found the defenseman Marcou, who came up in support, on the far faceoff circle as the sophomore's shot slipped past Maricic (32 saves).

A little over a minute later, Yale's Mark Arcobello was called for a slash, followed by a hooking call on Little, giving UMass a 5-on-3 opportunity, a dangerous situation for the Bulldogs against one of the top power-play units in the country.

It took little time for the Minutemen to take advantage of the two-man advantage. Showing good puck movement in front of the net, Justin Braun took the centering pass in the slot and fed it to a waiting Wellman on the left side. The sophomore fired it high past Maricic to give UMass the 2-1 lead. The goal gave Wellman his sixth goal of the season and his fourth on the power play.

The Minutemen went 1-for-6 on the power play on the night while the Bulldogs went 1-for-7. The three goals at even strength were a major factor in the win. Although UMass has had major success on the power play, the Minutemen have sometimes struggled to score without it.

Yale looked as though it would get a chance to score later in the period when the Bulldogs were attacking on the power play after a holding call on Rocco Carzo and then another power play on a James Marcou slashing call. Despite several scoring chances by Yale, the UMass defense, along with Meyers in a spot start, looked strong in his second start in place of Paul Dainton in goal.

Jayhawks outlast Tigers in rematch

By Andrew Morris
Collegian Correspondent

No. 1 Kansas outlasted Memphis on Tuesday in the Hall of Fame Classic game, and got off to a 2-0 start with a 57-55 win. The game came down to the final seconds, as the Tigers had a chance to win the game as time expired with a 3-point shot, but Kansas (2-0, 0-0 Big 12) dodged a bullet.

The Jayhawks' offense was led by Cole Aldrich, who had 18 points and 11 rebounds, along with five blocks, and was given MVP of the game.

The first half saw fairly even play; however, the Jayhawks had the lead for the vast majority of the time. After leading 5-4, the Tigers (1-1, 0-0 Conference USA) were playing from behind for the rest of the half, but were able to keep it close and go into the break only down six with a score of 26-20 in favor of the Jayhawks.

The second half opened with the Tigers cutting the Kansas lead to three, 26-23, before the Jayhawks went on a 12-5 run to extend their lead to 10 points with 14 minutes left. Memphis called a timeout, and proceeded to steadily chip away at Kansas' lead until it was down 48-45 with three minutes to play.

With a couple of three pointers in the last minute, the Tigers were able to cut the deficit to one point at 56-55 with just 16 seconds left. Memphis fouled on the ensuing inbounds play, and after one miss and one make, the Jayhawks led by two points. Memphis got a good look at a three-point shot to win the game, but it bounced off the back of the rim, and Kansas was able to hang on and stay undefeated, as Memphis fell to 1-1.

Texas rookies shine

Texas showed everyone why they are considered by many to have the best freshman class and bench depth in the nation on Wednesday with a blowout win over the Catamounts, 73-41.

The first half was a solid indication of how the game would turn out, as the Longhorns (2-0, 0-0 Big 12) went on a 20-6 scoring run to propel themselves to a 43-24 halftime lead.

Western Carolina (1-1, 0-0 Southern Conference) fought hard, but were unable to find their offensive rhythm, as Texas held them to just 26 percent shooting from the floor and 17 points in the second half.

Damion James lead the Longhorn offense with 18 points, and three other players were in double digits in the victory for the Longhorns, as they remain undefeated on the season, while the Catamounts fell 1-1.

Saunders and Wright get weekly accolades

By Herb Scribner
Collegian Staff

Duquesne's men's basketball team made history on Nov. 17 when it defeated Iowa 52-50. It was the Dukes (2-0) first victory over a Big Ten team in 36 years.

The last time the Dukes pulled off such a feat was on Dec. 28, 1973, when they earned a 85-83 victory over Illinois. Similar to the game against the Hawkeyes (0-2), the victory for the Dukes back in 1973 was by a slim margin of two points.

The first half of the game proved to be in favor of Duquesne, who led by eight (33-25) at the half. Thirteen of the Dukes' points were off turnovers alone, as the Hawkeyes outscored the Dukes off the bench (6-0).

The Hawkeyes managed a comeback in the second half which made the game tighter. Iowa outscored the Dukes 25-19 in the second half of play, with 12 of the points coming from inside the paint. Duquesne failed again in the second half to score any points off the bench.

While the Hawkeyes led in nearly every statistical category in the game, the Dukes out rebounded Iowa (42-38), and sunk more 3-pointers (8-6).

Junior Damian Saunders, who earned Atlantic 10 Player of the Week honors after Duquesne's match against Nicholls State, earned a double-double in the game against Iowa. Saunders scored 16 points, and grabbed 16 rebounds, but fouled out later in the game.

The Dukes had another player score in double digits, with junior Bill Clark scoring 20 points in his 39 minutes of play. He also had four turnovers and six rebounds, proving to be an all-around player.

Supporting Duquesne to victory was sophomore Eric Evans, who had six assists against Iowa, and also scored seven points.

First POW announced

The first Players of the Week for the A-10 regular season were announced Tuesday, with Saunders and Chris Wright (from Duquesne and Dayton, respectively) earning the awards for their contributions to their teams' victories.

Saunders received the award after scoring 17 points and grabbing 19 rebounds, six on the offensive end and 13 on the defensive end – a career high.

The 7-of-13 shooting gave the Dukes (2-0) the edge in their 85-62 victory over the Colonels. While the Flyers found themselves down in the second half, Saunders attributed five assists, four steals, a block and 12 of his 19 rebounds to the offensive push.

Wright had a game-high 25 points for the Flyers (2-0), as they pushed passed Creighton, 90-80. Similar to Saunders, most of Wright's offensive efforts came in the second half, as he scored 18 points and grabbed eight rebounds.

His scoring ability was on showcase, shooting 9-for-12, which included two 3-point baskets while blocking two shots on the defensive end.

For both Saunders and Wright, this is their second Player of the Week awards. Both were also named to the preseason all-conference teams, with Wright being on the first team and Saunders on the second.

Rookies worth a look

The Rookies of the Week for the week of Nov. 16 should not go unnoticed by the rest of the A-10, as both freshmen Shamarr Bowden and Aaric Murray dominated their respective games.

Bowden, who came off the bench for Charlotte, scored a team-high 21 points in 11 minutes of play, with 12 of those points being scored in 67 seconds. Much of this can be attributed to Bowden's 3-point percentage, as he went just over 54 percent from beyond the arc. Bowden's 6-for-11 3-point shooting led the 49ers (2-1) past North Carolina-Asheville, 86-70.

Murray was a large factor in La Salle's narrow 83-80 victory over Hampton. Murray gave the Explorers (1-0) 16 points from the center position, including 11 rebounds, receiving his first college double-double.

With the accomplishment, Murray becomes the first freshman player to earn a double-double in his freshman debut game since Michael Brooks did the same on Nov. 26, 1976.

Players given probation

Carven, Mele, McLaughlin and Viveiros to play against Pride Sat.

By Nick O'Malley
Collegian Staff

The four members of the Massachusetts football team that were arrested earlier this season on charges of cocaine possession were sentenced to probation on Monday, with the potential of charges being dropped.

According to a report on Massline.com, the Northwestern District Attorney's office and defense lawyers reached an agreement for the players to receive pre-trial probation, meaning that the charges were continued, and the four did not admit guilt to the charges.

Juniors James Carven, Mike Mele, Bob McLaughlin and sophomore Shane Viveiros were ordered to take part in a four-month UMass BASICS program for substance abuse as part of the agreement.

In addition to the cocaine charges, Mele and Viveiros were also charged with possession of false identification.

According to the Massline report, if the four players avoid further trouble until their next court date on March 15, the charges will be dropped.

The four players were suspended for one game earlier this season, which is in compliance with the UMass substance abuse policy that mandates players be suspended for 10 percent of a season. They were also held out of another game as per decision by Morris.

The players participated in UMass' four most recent games, and will play in this weekend's season finale at Hofstra.

UMass coach Kevin Morris declined to comment on the issue.

The BASICS program, which is part of University Health Services, according to the UMass website, tries to "promote an environment that supports responsible decision-making regarding alcohol and other drug use, on campus and in the community."

According to police reports cited in the Massline report, the four players were seen acting suspiciously behind a dumpster behind The Pub restaurant on East Pleasant Street in Amherst. The Amherst Police officer that went to investigate received inconsistent responses from the four men as to what they were doing. The officer then saw that Viveiros and Mele had false identification and found a small bag with white powder inside and charged all four with the possession of a Class B substance.

Viveiros has the most time of the four players, starting four games this season and playing in seven. On the season, the sophomore has 29 total tackles, one interception and one blocked kick.

McLaughlin, the son of recent UMass Hall of Fame inductee Joe McLaughlin, has played in six games this season, making eight total tackles.

Mele, a Syracuse transfer, saw no playing time before the suspension due to injury, but has played in two games since, starting one in place of an injured Tyler Holmes. Mele has 10 total tackles on the season and one fumble recovery.

Carven has played in eight games this season, making seven tackles, an interception and forcing a fumble in that time.

Minutemen close out 2009 season

By Nick O'Malley
Collegian Staff

On paper, Saturday's game doesn't have much importance for the Massachusetts football team. In the standings, New Hampshire has already locked up the Colonial Athletic Association North Division race, while UMass is stuck in third place.

Ask the Minutemen (5-5, 3-4 CAA), though, and you'll get a much different answer about the importance of their last game of the season.

"It's about pride now, going out with a winning record," senior defensive end Michael Hanson said, one of 19 seniors playing in his last collegiate game this weekend. "It's the one they say you remember forever, your last game, so it's big for us to win."

As a team, Hofstra comes into the game as much as a middle-of-the-road team as is possible in the CAA. The Pride (4-5, 2-5 CAA), enter the game, statistically, in the middle of the conference in most respects. While not spectacular in any particular area, the Pride have also avoided being at the bottom in any particular aspect, a feature of balance that UMass coach Kevin Morris says makes them a tough opponent.

Even if the last game of the season isn't coming in the playoffs like the Minutemen had hoped, Morris said that he sees the final game of the season as something to cherish.

"Any opportunity to play together is never lackluster," Morris said. "It might be a little disappointing and frustrating not being where we want to be, but our favor's in our hands, and a lot of it is the turnovers and not completing ball games, and we're 5-5."

Hofstra is currently 10th in the CAA in scoring offense, but with the help of quarterbacks Cory Christopher and Steve Probst, the Pride have the fourth best passing offense in the conference. Helping in the passing game are Aaron Weaver, who ranks second in the CAA with 5.33 receptions per game, and Anthony Nelson (35 catches for 449 yards).

Meanwhile, Hofstra also features the seventh best rushing offense in the conference at 132.5 yards per game, just under seven yards below UMass' mark of 145.1 yards per game.

In the running game, the Pride have five players that have received over 50 carries on the season, two of which are quarterbacks Christopher and Probst. In fact, Probst holds a team-high mark of 48.8 yards per game in the six games in which he has played.

True freshman Miguel Maysonet leads the way for the team's backs with 75 carries for 399 yards. Sophomore Kwabena Asante is fourth on the team with 54 carries and 266 yards, while fullback Everette Benjamin is fifth with 55 carries and 246 yards in eight games to fill out the crowded Pride backfield.

On the defensive side of the ball, Hofstra ranks eighth in the conference in scoring defense, giving up 21.4 points per game. In terms of yardage given up, the Pride have fared much better, ranking third and fifth in passing and rushing defense, respectively.

"Defensively, Luke Bonus is one of the better linebackers in the league, and he's been a four-year starter for them. He anchors their whole defense. [The defense is] very active up front, not a lot of base defensive looks, they're going to blitz you to keep you off balance," Morris said.

The bane of the Minutemen this season – turnovers – emerged once again in their loss last week to James Madison, as they turned over the ball on their first three offensive possessions. In its last four games, UMass turned over the ball 17 times, going 1-3. The sole win during that stretch came against Northeastern, where the only turnover was an interception with the game already in hand.

According to Morris, success against the Pride will come from consistent play and avoiding mistakes, something that the coach has preached all season.

"If we play our game – I'm going to be repetitive – If we play UMass football, don't turn it over, I like our chances," Morris said.

Morris sees that potential for a winning season as a large factor heading into this weekend's game, as it would mark a positive end to what has largely been an up-and-down season for the Minutemen.

"Well, it would be a winning season, and the kids certainly deserve that," Morris said of what it would mean to win Saturday's game. "They played hard enough to win some games, and we know we gave some games away. When we give them away it's frustrating, so we're looking to finish on a good note."

Morris' players reflect his sentiment, taking the season for what it's worth, tough losses and all.

"You never know what can happen in the course of a season," Hanson said. "A lot of ups and downs this season and it wasn't our year. But we don't put our heads down, we just keep on fighting to the end and try to get this win for our last game."

Amherst remembers transgendered

By Sam Hayes and Michelle Williams
Collegian Staff

More than 60 supporters, speakers and mourners turned out for the Transgender Day of Remembrance on Thursday, Nov. 19, which was observed at the Unitarian Universalist Society of Amherst with help from the University of Massachusetts Stonewall Center, Northampton's synagogue Beit Ahavah and the UMass Everywoman's Center.

As attendants walked in on Thursday, volunteers handed out small purple pamphlets and candles baring the names of those who have died around the world from hate crimes since Nov. 20, 2008.

After a short introduction by the Jennifer Levi of the Gay & Lesbian Alliance Against Defamation (GLAAD) Transgender Rights Project, the attendants marched through the center of Amherst to the intersection of Route 9 and South Pleasant Street and back to the Unitarian Church, each carrying a candle representing one of the people lost to transgender violence in the past year.

The crowd sang "We are gentle angry people," as some passersby in cars slowed down to ask those in the candlelight parade why they were marching.

Rabbi Raquel Kosovske, of Beit Ahavah, the reform synagogue of the greater Northampton area, spoke after the candlelight march. "Seeds of a progressive society have been planted but not yet cultivated," Kosovske said before the full church.

Kosovske also noted that these crimes cannot be prosecuted, because there is no such crime as a "gender identity hate crime in Massachusetts."

Gaming with a cause

Students Against Lack of Education (SALE) and the National Society of Black Engineers (NSBE) hosted their first game night fundraiser in the University of Massachusetts Student Union on the evening of Thursday, Nov. 19.

SALE board member Nathalie Regis originally came up with the idea for the event. Since it was an experimental endeavor, Regis and her fellow board member Lanai Noble hoped to see the game night become a success.

"We are learning from it, and seeing what we can do differently," Noble said. "We're putting our hands in the pot."

The night's events featured a Street Fighter 4 tournament, a Rock Band tournament, pool games and chess competitions. The two tournaments were playing for a "mystery prize," which will be awarded at the next general body meeting of SALE.

Rock Band allows players to form a virtual musical group including instruments such as guitar, base guitar, drums and vocals. It was five dollars to enter the tournament as a group, with a two song set list for each round.

Street fighter 4 is a two-player game which pits contestants against one another in a virtual fighting match. This tournament was intended to have five rounds at 60 seconds each, with a $2 entrance fee.

While the turnout for the Rock Band tournament was not substantial, Street Fighter had quite the crowd of participants. Seven players battled to win the tournament and the mystery prize, with the initial six rounds cut down to just three.

One of the tournament's hopefuls was junior Yinan Shi. As president of Free to Play (FTP), a video game club that is new to campus, this event was a good opportunity for him to recruit new members.

"It is always fun to see new players," he said. Shi is also an avid tournament participant, and is always looking to get involved in them.

Another Street Fighter contestant was junior Viet Nguyen. He has been playing Street Fighter for a year and this was his second tournament. In his effort to win the tournament, Nguyen said he was, "trying his best."

Half of the profits of the evening will go towards education in Africa through another organization called Teachers for East Africa Alumni (TEAA). This organization uses the money to provide items to East African secondary schools.

The other half of the profits will go towards the NSBE's national conference. NSBE is an organization who's goal is to "increase the number of black engineers who excel academically, succeed professionally and positively impact the community," according to the group's mission statement.

This is SALE's first big fundraiser, other than their semi-annual book drive. At the end of each semester, SALE raises money by collecting books, ranging from text books to novels. They then take the books they have compiled and sell them back at a discounted price at the beginning of the fall semester.

The main goal of the night was allow students to socialize and have fun for a good cause. SALE, a relatively new Registered Student Organization after only two years of existence, is "still gaining more support and more awareness," said Noble, who added that the event was a good opportunity for them to further branch out to the student community.

UMass panel discusses the impact of the past century of African American poetry

By Angela MacGray
Collegian Staff

A panel discussion of black poetry of the 1960s and 1970s took place Thursday, Nov. 19 in the Lincoln Campus Center, sponsored by the University of Massachusetts Afro-American studies department. Panelists for the evening included Everett Hoagland, Sam Cornish, Sonia Sanchez, and Askia Toure, all of which were prominent participants in the black arts movement of the 20th Century.

Everett Hoagland, winner of the Gwendolyn Brooks Fiction Award, poet laureate of New Bedford, and English professor at UMass Dartmouth was the first panelist to speak. Hoagland chose to touch upon the significance of the black arts movement.

"What American poets have been more dedicated, more committed than the late and surviving exemplars of the black arts movement? More dedicated to loving folk in print and in word?" Hoagland asked his audience. "No one," he answered. "The black arts movement was so influentially powerful that no other American art movement can compare with it . . . It changed what we wrote and read . . . It influenced the names we gave our children."

Hoagland went on to note that, as a writer, this movement helped him move from an "I" perspective to a "we" perspective, as well as teaching him that he must live his poetry through actions.

"You can't just chant justice, you [have to] struggle," Hoagland said as he read from his book, "Undoing the Do," which he said touches upon the need for humans to live "largely" instead of abundantly. He ended with a poem by Assata Shakur called "Current Events," which talked about lacking the feeling the need to "fit in" in society.

Sam Cornish, winner of a National Endowment for the Arts grant in 1967 and a retired creative writing instructor at the Highland Park Free School in Roxbury, Mass., spoke next. Cornish told the audience that leaving the U.S. Army in 1958 inspired him to write. He went on to say that he felt "privileged" in his life because he is a man, and most of his work is dedicated to reflecting the voice of the strong woman figure.

One of Cornish's most pivotal poems was "Woman in a Red Dress," which was written about Harriet Tubman. He said that his work came to light when he realized his place in the world, and realized he had some "dues to pay." He claimed to be influenced by the works of Richard Wright and Margaret Walker, as well as the death of Malcolm X.

UMass moving forward with plans to acquire law school

By Caitlin Soto
Collegian Staff

While Massachusetts has never offered its residents a public law school, things could be changing for those who feel they cannot afford private school prices. Last week, University of Massachusetts officials announced they have revived a plan to open a public law school in Dartmouth with the donation of the Southern New England School of Law (SNESL).

SNESL has offered to impart all assets of the school to the University of Massachusetts Dartmouth campus, including real estate, facilities, technologies and the library, assets that have an estimated total value of $22 million dollars. This donation would be the second largest donation in the history of the UMass education system.

The details of the plan call for UMass to absorb the 230-student SNESL, with classes beginning as a public law school in the fall of 2010. The plan also aims to increase enrollment, as well as to invest $13.8 million over a five-year span to bring the school up to the standards of the American Bar Association (ABA), with the hope being that the school will have accreditation from the ABA by 2012. If that plan succeeds as hoped, UMass may just have found a "diamond in the rough" that could be quite profitable well into the future.

In the state of Massachusetts, there are currently nine private law schools, and the cost of following the dream of a law degree can be exceptionally high. Currently, law school graduates can pay more than $140,000 for their education. Law school tuition ranges from a few thousand to more than $30,000 per year. Add living costs to tuition, and the total expenses greatly increase.

"The ability to pay thousands of dollars in loans after graduation is difficult for recent law graduates," said Massachusetts attorney Angela Downey. "I believe this proposal would greatly benefit the state and those who would otherwise not be able to afford a law education."

The proposal being considered by UMass is an alternative to a similar plan hatched five years ago. In 2005, the UMass system approved a proposal to bring the law school under the umbrella of UMass Dartmouth's continuing education program. The proposal went to the Massachusetts Board of Higher Education, where its hopes were crushed by board members, who questioned whether the structure of the proposal was legal.

"The staff at Franklin do a really good job. Obviously it's not as good as home-cooked meals, but for what it is, they seem to give a good effort. I wish they would incorporate even more local produce, though."

"I think it's wrong that we are required to get a meal plan and eat at DCs. I prefer to avoid the DC altogether. It is not healthy. The only reason I go to at all is because my friends are going."

Memorial held in honor of transgendered

JAIMEN KAMIENSKI/COLLEGIAN

To mark the Transgender Day of Remembrance on Thursday, Nov. 19, supporters marched down Rt. 9 and South Pleasant St. while carrying ceremonial candles.

Following Kosovske was Reverend Louis Mitchell, a co-founder of Recovering the Promise Ministries, a worship group based out of Springfield, Mass. Mitchell introduced himself as a transsexual man. "We need to see ourselves as more than one or two, we need 'usness,'" Rev. Mitchell said. "We need express sorrows, anger, frustration and fear."

The next speaker was Reverend Liza Neal, Director of Spiritual Life at Hampshire College, who shared her pride in those who had lost their lives. "The people they were and the courage they had to live in the world fear and violence," she said. "No one is free when we are oppressed; it is violence for all of us."

Neal expressed her frustration with both heterosexual and homosexual gender roles. She said transgender people were "beautiful and inspiring, and ahead of their time" with their "life without label."

After the speakers concluded, they opened the microphone to the audience for personal stories of loss and perseverance in transgender lifestyles and read the names of all those killed in gender role violence.

"With this memorial, I hope it will bring all transgender people together, to remember lost ones, celebrate life and remind the public of the need for equality," said Gunner Scott, the executive director of the Massachusetts Transgender Political Coalition, in a telephone interview. "A focus will be on transgender women of color that are often targeted."

Scott has a personal connection to the cause. In 1998, a close friend was murdered because of her gender orientation in Boston. He said that afterward, "the Boston Herald disrespected her in their coverage by referring to her by a name and gender she no longer identified as. In reaction we held a protest on Sept. 1, 1998 which was put on by the Queer Revolt." According to Scott, it was at that point when he decided to become involved in the cause.

Under the 2005 plan's continuing education structure, the proposed law school would have been able to keep all the tuition and fees because it would have been expected to be self-sufficient. Now, the current plan has changed this mindset, abandoning the continuing education structure in the hope that it will pass this time.

The current idea, proposed by UMass Dartmouth Chancellor Jean MacCormack, would finally provide residents of the Commonwealth with a public law school option, with Massachusetts joining the list of 44 other states that have already offered this alternative.

The proposal of a public law school would save students thousands of dollars per year over private schools. The law school would charge $24,000 a year in tuition and fees, and along with tuition cuts, the school is willing to offer scholarships to qualifying students who commit to serving public interest law for four years after graduation. These scholarships would cut their tuition in half.

Some critics are skeptical about the idea of a public law school. In an economy where the current public higher education systems are struggling to stay afloat, some question the creation of a public law school at this particular moment. Proponents of the proposal insist that taxpayers would not have to shoulder the burden of paying for a public law school, however. Instead, proposal suggests that the cost of the law school would be covered by increasing enrollment over five years, and by investing millions from equity to win accreditation.

UM panel examines influence of 20th Century black poetry

Sonia Sanchez, professor at eight universities, founder of African American studies at San Francisco State and guest on the Bill Cosby Show, read a piece from an anthology in which she was published regarding the language and evolution of black poetry in the 20th century. Part of her reading touched upon the power of derogatory language towards African Americans.

"The act of speaking words has the power to change the world. What we do is show people the possibility of seeing themselves in a freedom mode," Sanchez said, mentioning the role of a poet in relation to his or her audience. She also talked about how poets always write about their parents and shared a poem that she wrote for her father. She told the audience of the importance of forgiving your parents, before noting that "you can't make movement and change happen in the world if you can't forgive your parents."

Askia Toure, political activist with the Student Non-violent Coordinating Committee's Atlanta Project, and retired professor of African studies at San Francisco State University, was the last speaker of the night. Toure read an excerpt from his poem "Cry Freedom," which was written to identify a new black artist and activist generation. "Cry Freedom" was originally penned as a response to a demonstration at the United Nations, which protested the assassination of Congo's Prime Minister Patrice Lumumba. The poem is itself dedicated to a young activist who died in prison after the protest.

"True liberation fighters imagine a world," said Toure, "and then work with their comrades and people to create that world."

Letisha Harris, a student at the UMass, originally from Jamaica, says that she was inspired by the panel of "powerful, charismatic speakers." Harris said that she could relate to the speakers, and that they touched upon issues that she and her family deal with in everyday life. Harris was in awe of Sonia Sanchez's strength as an African American woman, and she said she was surprised that Sanchez came out and openly disagreed with another member of the panel.

Jenny Otero, a worker for Women of Color Leadership, was also inspired by the panelists. "I was really looking forward to Sonia," she said. As a writer herself, Otero was struck by Sanchez's comment on how speaking words has the power to change the world. Otero said that she felt she had been called out for action, and that her responsibility as an educated young woman was to speak for those who don't have a voice.

The night was brought to a close with a brief question and answer session in which the panelists responded to audience members' questions. The panelists fielded some interesting questions, such as what President Barack Obama's inauguration meant to them, and how the black arts movement has influenced other minority groups.

Sanchez plans on teaching an African American studies class at UMass Amherst in spring of this year, and believes it is important for the new generation to educate themselves about the past generation's struggles so that this generation can change the future. According to Sanchez, the generation of the 20th century attempted to answer the question, "What does it mean to be human?" She went on to add that young people must continue to search for the answer to this question, and fight to educate themselves so that they can act as a voice for those in the world that are less fortunate.

Loving the Aussie land

Solmaaz Yazhida

In less than three weeks, I will be back in the United States. For the last 13, I have been living, working and studying in Australia. With this "back to reality" feeling looming, it's hard not to think about what reality means for me. As someone lucky enough to have this opportunity abroad, I'll share some things I've learned.

It is vital to travel to better understand the world. A good portion of you reading will stop and move to an editorial that will tell you something you didn't know. "No shit, Sol. I'd love to see the world."

Problem is, you're busy working towards a major that will hopefully put some money in your pocket. Busier doing the math of how your minimum wage paycheck could ever cover your tuition bill. You're thinking, "Traveling would be great, if only I could afford it."

I get it, trust me. Having reached a point in life where graduation is looming and I'm scratching my head wondering how on earth my gleaming journalism degree is going to make me any money, I get it. What I'm saying is: It's a shame how many Americans don't get the opportunity to travel.

I think it is important for Americans to realize that their world is not the only scenario available. There are other ways to live, ways many of us have never imagined or thought possible.

Health care for all. Many Americans have been fighting for it. We're one of the only industrialized countries without it. It's a sense of humanistic security, a promise that if, alas, something happens to your health, you could be focused on medicine, not money.

Mandatory voting. Every voice, literally, counts. What's strange is, at the thought of everyone having to vote, you'd think there would be a dangerous number of people voting for the wrong, uninformed reasons. Surprisingly, I have seen different. Sure, there will always be the bunch that doesn't care and never will, but so many of the Aussies I've met know more about US affairs than I do. Australians seem to always know what's going on. They read newspapers and follow world sports religiously. Oh, and they hate Bush.

There are other ways to live, ways many of us have never imagined or have thought possible.

Vacation time. Say it with me now. Work in Australia is not life. Fridays are as casual as a bottle of champagne passed around the office. Consistent breaks for "tea" and customer service that doesn't earn a tip means a much more laid back environment for workers and patrons alike. Shops close by five and believe it or not, everybody deals. Month-long vacation time from work makes room for beach vacations to Thailand and getaways to Fiji. Life is kind of nice.

No guns. Strict gun ownership restrictions leaves very few with means to a pistol. What it means is a safe city. Ask almost any Sydneysider and they'll tell you the streets are safe. Not including the occasional "My friend Cherie got her purse stolen at the McDonalds in Kings Cross," you rarely hear stories of muggings or stabbings. The best part? Not a gun in sight.

Public broadcast without food stamps. A channel that doesn't bank on audience count. Their version of our PBS is fully funded by the government. But wait, won't that mean the government will take charge of the conversation? Won't they censor what they will and control the public agenda? Grassroots organizations like the "Friends of ABC" make damn sure this doesn't happen.

There are two important things to keep in mind now. First, I'm not saying Australia is ideal. Far from it, if you ask me. The government still avoids a shameful past of forced assimilation and a denial of rights to the Aborigines. The country lags behind on anti-discrimination legislation. They don't celebrate Halloween.

Second, I love America. There are things about home that could never be the same here or anywhere else. We have plenty to be proud of and rightfully so. I could sit here and name off patriotic praises or I could simply say what I'm honestly missing. I love you, orange cheese, cheap beer, winter snow. I love you Taco Bell, keg parties, football. I love you the most, friends and family.

So what's my point? I am afraid that Americans live in the bed they've made, thinking it's the only way to live. So I ask you this. What if a little ruffling of the sheets, energy to put up a pillow fight, some "movement," let's call it, could make things a little better, easier, happier? What if it would help you to sleep at night? In a blink, I'm headed home with ideas of a better life for Americans, urging you to consider it. So go ahead, jump on the bed.

I miss you, America. Mama's comin' home.

Through the desert to wisdom

GLOBAL PERSPECTIVES

Mike Fox

The trip started as a pipe dream. A coastal Chilean city where a James Bond movie was filmed, the world's largest salt flats and the center of the exploration of the northern Argentine desert were all about 300 miles from each other. So I figured that with a week and a half I could have a sojourn through some of the most inhospitable terrain on Earth and emerge from it with a "clear" perception of everything about life.

So when a free week came up, I left Buenos Aires on a plane headed north, ready to make the trip work. I wanted to travel as far as possible to be able to say that I made it there and then return. I wanted to push the limits of where it seemed possible for me to be. When I arrived in the city of Salta, Argentina, rich with Colonial heritage, I booked passage on a two-day tour through the province. For the rest of the day, I debated whether it was a good idea, since I could just ride cheap busses through the region instead.

An hour after leaving the city, I was riding through the Andes Mountains at altitudes of 10,000 feet, admiring what I saw on either side of the road. Throughout the trip, we would stop to hike, take photos or simply marvel at the high altitude vistas.

The most magical of these scenes was a chapel at the highest elevation of the ride. We walked along a cliff to the chapel with clouds drifting past us. We looked down at the path and saw miles of roads weaving along the cliff, down into the farms and villages below.

At the end of the tour, after I said good-bye to my companions, the tour guide gave me advice on how to continue further into the deserts north of the city and left me with the message, "nunca olvides nada," or, "never forget anything."

I continued north to a small village on the traditional tourist route through Purmamarca, Argentina. As I rode the bus through the night, it was obvious that I was the only person not from the area.

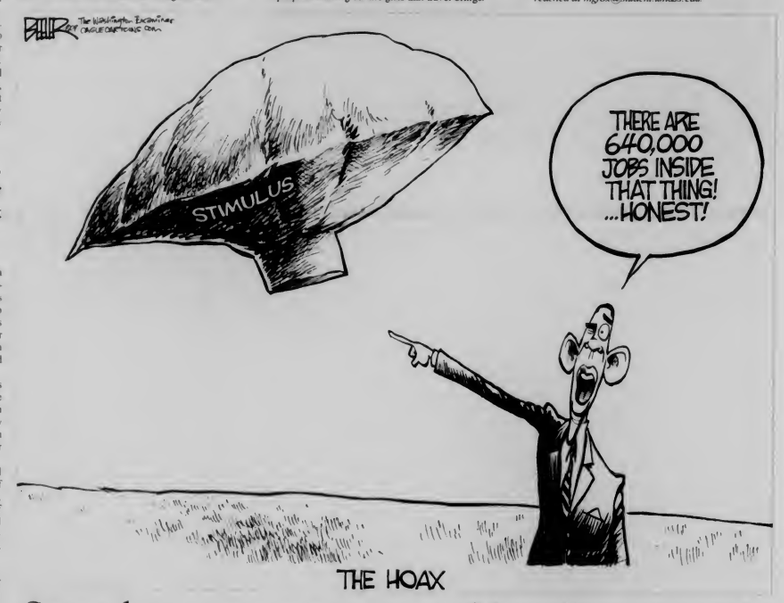
She invited me to join them and we shared several hours of cheap wine and beer, conversation with the singers and sharing road stories

I arrived at the village after dark and could only make out the faint outlines of its famous mountains. Few people meandered down the dimly lit streets flanked by adobe buildings.

After booking a room for the night, I followed the faint sound of music to a little bar where a table of Argentines and backpackers were listening to a folk duo. I went in, ordered some wine and empanadas and started to write before being interrupted by an old lady who was playing hostess at the other table. She invited me to join them and we shared several hours of cheap wine, beer and conversation with the singers, sharing road stories. I bought a recording from the singers, who had circled a specific song dedicated to people like me, people searching for the gifts that travel brings.

The next day, I discovered that the village was nestled in a canyon, surrounded by ridges of innumerable shades of red, orange, yellow and blue. I split a taxi with another tourist to ride out to the Salinas Grandes, the world's third largest salt flats. It was a desolate plane stretching far into the horizon that it was able to create illusions of perspective.

I passed through Tilcara, an overly developed tourist town, until I arrived in Humahuaca, a town with a heavy native population that serves as the gateway for the even more sparsely populated Andean highlands. When I arrived, I hopped on a random bus that seemed full of adventure (read: incredibly run down and without a working speedometer).



What followed was the bus ride from hell. The bus climbed up dirt Andean roads that hugged cliff sides. It made its descent at night in a lightning storm. The PVTA seemed pretty good at the moment.

However, the bus eventually arrived at an Andean Shangri-La called Iruya. I spent the next day hiking through the valley with a group of Spanish and Argentine backpackers.

Returning, I had to deal with a four-hour layover in Humahuaca. I realized something important. It's not about the destination; it's about the scenery along the side of the road. It's about everything and everyone you see and meet in between. That's where the true lessons of travel come from; from others, more so than from within.

I looked at the little TV in the convenience store where I was waiting. ESPN was broadcasting a Boston Celtics game back home. I have one month left to experience everything in between home and my destination. One more month to learn what's left on the road.

Stimulus costing taxpayers $1 million per job

Alex Perry

The $787 billion stimulus package Democrats forced on us in February has been a failure and, based on recent news of fraud, borders on disaster.

For most Americans, it's hard to notice that the government took $787 billion to "stimulate" the economy at the beginning of the year. It's hard to see the "stimulation" going on when the unemployment rate has now risen to 9.5 percent. Some would argue that we need to give the stimulus package time, but that's not a good argument. We were told in February by National Economic Director Larry Summers that, "You'll see the effects begin almost immediately." Nine months later, the only effects I'm seeing are rising debt and unemployment.

It raises the question: Where would our country be, had our government not gone on a spending spree? Well, how about we go by what Barack Obama told us would happen.

When the Obama administration was trying to gather support for its stimulus package back in January, there was a report published by members of the administration entitled, "The Job Impact of the American Recovery and Reinvestment Plan." The report was intended to show whether or not a stimulus package would be necessary in order to solve the country's economic problems. It included data that indicated what the administration believed the unemployment rate would be if no stimulus package was created, and what would happen if the proposed stimulus was passed.

The report concluded that without a stimulus package the United States would see its unemployment raise to 8.5 percent in 2009 and would peak at 9 percent during 2010. But it also concluded that if the stimulus was passed the unemployment rate would peak at no more then 8 percent in 2009. This information was one of the primary reasons Democrats were insistent on rushing the stimulus at the beginning of the year. They told us the stimulus needed to be passed immediately in order to avoid the dreadful projections from the report. President Obama said that the stimulus would, "go directly to... generating three to four million new jobs." It was either stimulus or nothing. That's what our government argued on Capitol Hill. Imagine an unemployment rate of 8.5 percent. Democrats weren't about to do nothing.

Now, here we are in November and the unemployment rate is 9.5 percent. That is 0.5 percent higher than the Obama administration projected unemployment would peak at if the government did nothing.

Really? Wasn't it Obama and his supporters who were telling us all through the campaign that this was the worst economic crisis since the Great Depression?

I think we would have been better off using market-based solutions to help the economy recover rather then spend $787 billion we don't have.

One argument Democrats are now giving in defense of their stimulus is that no one knew how bad this recession was. Really? Wasn't it Obama and his supporters who were telling us all through the campaign that this was the worst economic crisis since the Great Depression? It sounds like they thought this was the biggest disaster of all time and now they are trying to tell us they didn't think it would be this bad. Who are these guys fooling?

Don't forget the jobs saved argument either. Obama told us that we'd save three to four million jobs. Well, according to the infamous Recovery.gov website, which is intended to allow Americans to track the money spent in the stimulus package, all that money has only created/saved 640,329 jobs thus far. For those who like numbers, that translates to $1,229,055.69 per job created or saved. How efficient.

Unfortunately, though, as it turns out, the true number of jobs created or saved is not actually 640,329. As has been reported by many local newspapers that have been investigating the stimulus being put into action, the number of jobs that have been reported saved/created by Recovery.gov is significantly off. According to those papers, approximately 75,000 jobs included in that 640,329 total haven't really been created or saved. Whn asked about this, Obama said that this bogus job creation was a "side issue."

A side issue? I thought transparency was one of the focal points of Obama's campaign last fall. Now we find that all this alleged transparency involved with the stimulus is anything but and it's now a side issue? This constant hypocrisy is growing tiresome.

The stimulus package, like most other government programs, is failing to accomplish any of its goals. The jobs the administration said were going to be saved haven't been saved and unemployment has risen to a level beyond what we were told was tolerable in February. Often times, we were told by Democrats that, "we can't do nothing." But since doing nothing was never an option put on the table by anyone, I think it could have been a good one. Looking back now, I would rather we had done nothing, saved $787 billion and had unemployment peak at 9 percent than be in the mess we find ourselves now. The fictional "party of no" seems like it would be the smartest party on Capitol Hill at this point.

'New Moon' premiere stirs frenzy

Nora Drapalski
Collegian Staff

By 10:30 on Thursday night, the main lobby of Cinemark in Hadley was packed with fans of the "Twilight" series, all eager to see the premiere of "New Moon."

Two Twilight fans dying to see the new movie, Brittany and Hanna, were waiting in line for their seat and had been there since 9 p.m. that evening.

Like so many others, Brittany was introduced to author Stephenie Meyer's series by last year's film release, "Twilight." Meanwhile, Hanna, in true "Twilight" fan form, has loved the series since reading the books.

The fans first in line claimed that a real fan would have been with the series from the start, and certainly would have attended the premiere last year, too. These die-hard fans have a pretty critical idea of what a Twilight fan is, partly due to their personal experience.

Sarah from Belchertown was eager to share her love of the series with those around her at the premiere. A repeat premiere-showing attendee, Sarah knew how Thursday night's event would go down.

Her 3:30 p.m. arrival at Cinemark guaranteed her position as first in line. Joined at 4 p.m. by a fellow "Twilight" premiere attendee, who was also named Sarah, the two were prepared for the long wait ahead until 11:30 p.m., when Cinemark began the process of seating people in the theaters.

The massive crowd was divided into four rows in the beginning (by the end of the lines, it was just a chaotic mess). Movie-goers lined up according to their ticket times: 12:01, 12:05, 12:10, or 12:15.

When Cinemark employees started seating people for the 12:15 showing before the 12:05 and 12:10 showing, the anxiously awaiting crowd began to get a little stressed. Groans and angry shouts erupted from people who had been waiting for over 3 hours. Unfortunately, the two lines waited for almost 15 more minutes until they were admitted into the theaters.

Cinemark was prepared for the massive amount of people, though. Four employees were consistently going back and forth within the theater, making final preparations for the showings. The concession stand had an additional four employees working quickly to serve lines consistently made of 20-plus people. For those who had previously ordered their tickets online and needed to pick them up, a worker was in the crowd directing them to the box office, where more employees distributed tickets.

Following Bella's devestating breakup from vampire, Edward, viewers are forced to choose loyalties between her two beaus. They tend to fall into one of two campst team Edward and team Jacob.

For many fans of the 'Twilight' saga, Jacob's (Taylor Lautner) buff bod prominetly displayed in the latest film held the greatest appeal. Launter is rumored to have gained 30 pounds of muscle mass for the role.

Unfortunately, any "Twilight" fans who forgot to order their tickets ahead of time were turned away, since all four showings had sold out days before the premiere.

Cinemark had set up posts connected by caution tape to separate the crowd into four lines within Cinemark's designated area. In the mall outside where hundreds of fans were milling around unsure of what to do, Cinemark had set up tape markers on the ground in an attempt to continue the lines. As more people packed into the small area though, the markers disappeared under the packed feet of fans as they squeezed into the small space.

In this mob outside were five University of Massachusetts sophomores waiting for the 12:15 showing. Anita, Matt, Kelsey, Zoe and Emily were hoping that "New Moon" would prove to be a better film than "Twilight." Seniors Kristina, Mari and Kelly were also disappointed by the first movie, claiming, "I liked it, but the books were better." Kelsey agreed, and wanted more action and drama, "like a real movie."

The general consensus of the crowd was, as this group put it, that "they could have done better" with the first film. Expectations were high as many fans waited for almost three hours to see "New Moon." All hoped the movie would be worth the wait, although some admitted they would see the movie regardless of how good or bad it was.

Allison, a junior at UMass, said that she was most looking forward to seeing what influence the new director, Chris Weitz ("The Golden Compass," "About a Boy"), would have on the film. Weitz was one of the hot topics among fans who were eager to see Catherine Hardwicke replaced.

Lyn, Sheila and Sarah, teachers in the Belchertown school system, were highly disappointed with the previous movie, and hoped that New Moon would be better. Lynn criticized the director of Twilight as being "too wrapped up in herself," and found that when comparing the movie to the book, the film was lacking.

But it is the Volturi, the ancient vampire elite, that, according to Allison, "makes it or breaks it for the next movies." Indeed, the Volturi were on the minds of almost all fans waiting for the premiere, including Sarah and Taylor, freshmen students at UMass who arrived at 4 p.m. Fans were expecting a spectacular performance from these characters, who hold a considerable role in the rest of the series. Michael Sheen ("Frost/Nixon," "Underworld") was an exciting addition to the cast as one of the Volturi characters that many fans were dying to see.

Although almost everyone, especially siblings Amanda and Karl, indicated an interest in seeing better special effects – let's face it, the first movie's effects were downright dreadful – the main factor that fans of almost every age and gender were looking forward to was the stunning appearance of Taylor Lautner's abs. Seniors Kelsey, Mari and Erin simultaneously squealed "Taylor Lautner shirtless!" when asked what they most anticipated from the new film. Tiffany, another fan, said that although she's a follower of Team Edward, she couldn't deny she was a fan of Jacob's body for "New Moon."

Thursday night's premiere of "New Moon," which nationally gained a profit of over $72 million, was certainly the place to be for devoted fans of the series. With the atmosphere full of excitement and love, the premiere was worth the wait and lack of sleep.

Oprah announces the 'time has come' to leave her daytime show

By Chuck Barney
Contra Costa Times

On Friday, Oprah Winfrey announced that she is ending her daytime talk show because "it's time to leave." The earth continues to shudder.

It's colossal news, of course. After all, who will now advise us on the proper books to read? Who will tell us what presidential candidate to support? What diets to try? What products to buy?

Without Oprah in the afternoon, won't we all be lost?

OK, so I exaggerate ... Just a little. But since Oprah delivered the news that she will step down from her daily pulpit on Sept. 9, 2011, a lot of people have tried to wrap their brain around what it all means. A lot of windy observers have tried to gauge the immensity of Ms. O.

She has been called the "queen of daytime television," but that title is way too puny for a self-made woman who has spread her incredible clout to all forms of media.

An icon? Sure. A saint? Let's not go there. More popular than Jesus? John Lennon tried that one, and it blew up in his face.

But Oprah is the closest thing to a religion that television has to offer. Her followers don't just respect her. They revere her. Over the years, they have been encouraged, enlightened and inspired by her. And, occasionally, they've even bagged some free bling from her.

TV Guide once proclaimed that Oprah has "the biggest heart that television has ever seen." Her critics might add that she also has the biggest ego. Both sides would have to agree that she has the biggest bank account.

And so, her departure down the road is going to create a gaping chasm in daytime TV. It's going to be one that Ellen DeGeneres, Tyra Banks, Rachael Ray or any other pretender to the throne can't possibly hope to fill. In this fractured media world, there will never be another Oprah. Count on that.

All of which makes you wonder: Why would she walk away? Why would Oprah abandon the priceless piece of television real estate that serves as the linchpin in her vast empire and has made all of her other endeavors possible?

Of course, it's not as if she's actually leaving. She just has bigger fish to fry. Not content to just run her own afternoon gabfest, she wants to be the boss of her own cable channel – fittingly dubbed OWN (Oprah Winfrey Network).

It might not quite be the future you had envisioned for Oprah. Perhaps you pictured her in the White House – or ruling the global masses from a mountaintop among the clouds.

But it does represent a stupendous risk, even for someone with as much juice as she has. Will her popularity and Midas touch be enough to carry an entire channel? Can she maintain cultural relevance without the mass exposure that broadcast television provides her on a daily basis? Will Tom Cruise ever turn her couch into a trampoline again?

No matter how things turn out, it promises to be a compelling next chapter. Her devotees surely will follow her with rabid zeal, while her detractors will root for some kind of come-down.

And, as usual, all eyes will be on Oprah.

The reigning queen of daytime TV has decided to end her talkshow to pursue plans of developing her own cable network.

Friday 'Fun and Laughter'

By Sam Butterfield
Collegian Staff

Montreal indie rockers Land of Talk brought their tight, fast-paced act to Northampton's Iron Horse Music Hall Friday night, drawing a solid crowd of devoted fans to promote their new EP "Fun and Laughter."

The set lasted just under an hour and the group played just one song from the new release, "May You Never."

The band came on a bit after the show's scheduled 10 p.m. start, but when the trio, which occasionally employed a fourth member, emerged, they rocked hard.

The set opened with a cover of Pop Off Tuesday's "See My Ghost," with faint, almost distant droning guitar synched well with singer Elizabeth Powell's wispy voice.

From there, the band transitioned to a loud, fast rendition of "Corner Phone," with Powell wailing away and a barrage of high-energy guitar and fast-paced drums.

Next was the smooth, melodic, yet heavy, and downward-slanting "Magnetic Hill," where the band, for the first time in the set, used background vocals and brought on a second guitarist.

Next was "Sea Foam," the opening song to the band's first EP, "Applause Cheer Boo Hiss!" With a tempered, slow building guitar and a well-timed snare drum, which stayed in the background until the song kicked into full gear, and distant vocals at the song's start, the track may have been the band's best on the night.

After the song's slow, melancholy start, it ratcheted up into one of the band's loudest, most thrashing pieces as Powell wailed, "why would we / so close to / stay inside / scared, locked / to never come out," on the chorus.

Next was "Some are Lakes," the title track off of the band's first album. It was a loud, ripping piece with droning, downward guitar and a steady, smooth breakdown before the chorus, where Powell mused on true love. "We've seen how sick we both were / but I've got you for my life / and I'll love you like I loved you then I'll die," she sang.

Next, was the only song from the band's new EP, "May You Never," which was distinctly louder and more intense than the recorded version. For the first time, the band used a synthesizer and a delay pedal, feeding back their first few notes throughout the song, which developed into a louder piece more reminiscent of the band's earlier work.

Powell's shrill voice ripped throughout the piece, as the band used a four-piece format, incorporating the synth.

After a brief interlude where the group gave out copies of their EP to anyone whose first name started with B, the group segued into "It's OK," which featured a wispy, contemplative synth and faint, minimal vocals and light drumming. "It's OK" was definitely the band's slowest, quietest piece, but they found a way to incorporate a hand cymbal and back and forth between Powell and the backup vocalist.

Last was "Young Bridge," a loud, happy song with fast tension progressing into a perfectly timed chorus set to heavy bass drums.

"You're a sweet angel, house devil / leadin' so right / you're a sweet angel, house devil / leadin' so right," Powell belted in characteristic smoothness.

While short in duration, the set packed a powerful punch and left Land of Talk's devoted crop of fans pleased with the work while less than thrilled with the amount. The band shared the bill with Boston-based Surprise Me Mr. Davis, with whom they share a drummer.

The band's new LP "Fun and Laughter," on Saddle Creek, is in stores now.

Minutewomen split Wildcat–full weekend

W. BASKETBALL from page 8

Jones shot missed short, and the Minutewomen were handed their second loss of the season.

"Our lack of execution at the end we didn't come up with the board, and [Nicole Jones] fouling – is just what it came down to," Dacko said after Friday's loss. "It's a hard one to let go because you were right there and you played a hard road game, but they fought back and we just had some breakdowns."

The Wildcats played a zone defense in the first half that forced UMass to hit shots from behind the arc. Once the Minutewomen successfully adjusted and took a 35-26 lead at halftime, UNH coach Kristin Cole switched her team into man-to-man defense in order to stifle UMass' offense.

Early in the contest, the Minutewomen fell behind 7-2, but were kept in the game when Meghan Zullo hit two 3-pointers to rally UMass into an 11-10 lead with 13:05 remaining in the first half. Zullo finished the game with 14 points, making 5-of-9 shots from the field.

"I thought that we handled the zone very well," Dacko said. "We knew that they were going to play a 2-3 zone and we shot well enough to get them to pull them out of it, they went to man-to-man and surprisingly enough, that's when we stopped executing."

UMass had a 17-point lead two minutes into the second half, but that margin was cut to four points with 7:54 left in the game.

"We took too many quick shots on offense when we had the lead and when we should've exhausted the clock," Dacko said.

Dancila tied Zullo as UMass' leading scorer with 14 points as well. Similar to the team's first game against Boston University, she was fouled by UNH with 39 seconds left in regulation and UMass down 56-55.

The sophomore again showed ice-cold resolve as she hit two free throws to put UMass up by one and time winding down. UNH gave the ball to Candace Williams and she missed a lay-up with less than 20 seconds left, but after another missed lay-up and a rebound, Jill Mcdonald was fouled by UMass' Jones as she went for a loose ball.

With 12 seconds left, Mcdonald hit two free throws and put her team up by one for the final possession of the game. Mcdonald played a large role in the Wildcat's win as she finished with 10 points and nine rebounds in the game.

as well, as it piled up 99 yards and three scores. Christopher contributed on the ground as well with nine carries for 33 yards and a touchdown.

Nelson rushed in his third touchdown of the game 5:40 later to make the score 45-38, keeping UMass in the game, but a 10-yard rush by Miguel Maysonet with 1:41 left in the game put it out of reach.

Uncharacteristically, UMass' defense struggled to stop anything, while the offense found ways to put points on the board. With one turnover – an interception in the third quarter – Woodward (19-of-30 for 277 yards) and the offense protected the ball but could not keep up with the points put up by Hofstra's offense, after falling behind in the first half.

Hofstra got on the board early with the opening drive of the game, after the Pride's Cory Christopher dropped back and found Aaron Weaver from five yards out for a touchdown. Christopher found success with some deep passes on the 11-play, 79-yard drive, completing three passes of over 13 yards to move Hofstra downfield.

The Minutemen responded with a 7-play, 65-yard drive of their own led by Nelson and Woodward. Woodward found Emil Igwenagu for a 30-yard reception to put UMass inside Hofstra's 5-yard line. After a false start by Vladimir Ducasse, Nelson went nearly untouched from 7-yards out to tie the game at seven.

UMass created its only lead of the game on its next drive after a 40-yard field goal by Armando Cuko. The field goal was the 31st of Cuko's career – the all-time high in UMass history – breaking the record of 30 set by Silvio Bonvini from 1985-88.

The three-point lead didn't last as the Pride responded with a 90-yard touchdown drive. Again Christopher found success with longer passes, completing passes of 17, 18 and 21 yards before quarterback Steve Probst had a seven-yard rush for a touchdown and a 14-10 lead.

Probst would help extend the lead to 11 on a 16-yard pass to Dennis later in the second quarter. The drive only took two plays after Christopher found Maysonet for a 47-yard completion.

Heading into the locker room at halftime the Pride would lead 28-10 on a two-yard touchdown run by Christopher.

Riley adds 17, looks to improve defense

David Gibbs. While Lang played just two minutes off the bench, Hill snagged four rebounds and had a block shot in nine minutes of play.

"Matt did some good things, he rebounded the ball but he just didn't finish," Kellogg said. "I don't know if that's rust or not playing or being injured all last year, he just didn't put those last couple put-backs back in the basket," Kellogg said.

Hill tore his Achilles in a loss to Memphis after playing 10 minutes, and saw action off the bench before his season-ending injury.

Center Hashim Bailey did not play against the Lions because of a pulled groin. Bailey, though, will also look to give center Sean Carter a rest at the center position later on in the season. The redshirt junior transfer from Memphis played in 14 minutes against the Big Red, securing three rebounds and had a blocked shot and a steal against the Golden Knights. While all of the Minutemen's depth is beneficial, both Riley and Gurley know that their role as sixth and seventh man respectively will help generate scoring opportunities and could be the difference between winning and losing games.

"I think that's both mine and Freddy's role is, is to come in and provide some offensive lift off the bench, provide leadership, and make sure that when we come in the game, the score doesn't change, it goes up in our favor," Gurley said.

Harris gets help off of bench

eight minutes and hit a 3-pointer.

Kellogg said he saw many positives in Hill's game, but the fact that he has limited action in games might have been the reason for his 0-for-2 shooting night. Both shots came on follow-ups.

"He just didn't quite finish, and I'm not sure if that's rust or not playing or being injured last year," Kellogg said. "He just didn't put those last couple put-backs right in the basket."

However, forward Terrell Vinson (14 points, 6-for-8 shooting) succeeded in impressing Kellogg with his best scoring night of the season. The freshman wasn't the only Minuteman to have a career night.

The Maroon and White had a variety of contributions, with five players finishing in double-figures for scoring.

All of those players except Harris finished with season-highs. Riley took nine 3-pointers for the third time this season and scored 12 of his 17 points from beyond the arc.

Now that he feels more comfortable scoring, he believes he needs to become a better defender before he becomes the type of player that Kellogg expects.

"I can score, but I feel like my defense is the most valuable thing that I can bring to the team if it's a lot better," Riley said of what he can do to improve.

Kellogg said that, despite winning the game by such a big margin, he found times where the defense still had its lapses. Until Gurley went on a surge late in the first half, Arkansas-Fort Smith kept the game close, even with bad shooting.

The game started as a back-and-forth affair early on with four different lead changes. The Lions' biggest lead of the game was four points, but UMass responded without much of a struggle and took the lead for good with nine minutes, 10 seconds left in the half after forward Vinson took a fast-break to the basket and put the Minutemen up, 17-16.

A combination of poor first-half shooting (33 percent) and Gurley's surge gave the Minutemen a commanding lead at the half.

The Lions came out of the locker room with a run of their own and cut the deficit to 12 points, but UMass later went on a 9-0 run and kept the game out of reach.

The Minutemen conclude their home schedule in the Legends' Classic on Tuesday against St. Francis before heading to Atlantic City, N.J., to face Rutgers and either Michigan State or Florida.

11. St. Bonaventure (15-15, 6-10)

Winning 15 games was a big jump from the two the Bonnies won the year before, and they may win more this year … but not many more. St. Bonaventure has last season's A-10 Rookie of the Year in forward Andrew Nicholson but will also rely a lot on incoming youth this season.

12. Saint Louis (18-14, 8-8)

There is a serious lack of experience on the current Billikens squad. Coach Rick Majerus has one junior, four sophomores, eight freshman and zero seniors. It's a rebuilding year.

13. Fordham (3-25, 1-15)

The Rams barely get the nod above George Washington. The two teams could be really be interchanged. Both will finish at the bottom of the A-10 again and miss out on the tournament. The only question is which will be the worst. Fordham will get guard Brenton Butler back after he played in only seven games last season.

14. George Washington (10-18, 4-12)

The Colonials get the final spot simply because of what they lost compared to Fordham. Losing three of its top four scorers from last season will definitely hurt and is why Fordham gets the nod for "best of the worst."

Minutemen defeat Lions in 2nd game of Legends Classic

Gurley, rest of bench score 44 points in win

By David Brinch
Collegian Staff

In order for any basketball team to be successful, it must have a bench it can rely on to generate offense when the starting five is not in the game, or struggling to create opportunities.

The Massachusetts basketball team displayed how it can effectively score through its depth, contributing 44 points in a 94-68 victory over Arkansas Fort-Smith Saturday night.

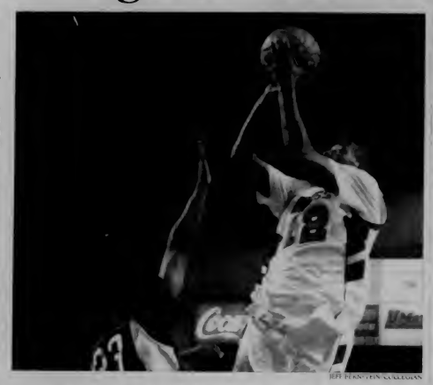
Redshirt junior Anthony Gurley played 24 minutes in his sixth-man role, scoring a game-high 21 points on 8-of-12 shooting and added five assists.

"I thought he gave us a great boost off the bench when we were a little stagnant in the first half," Kellogg said. "Ricky [Harris] was making some decent plays but when he's not in the game or scoring, who else do you go to, and Anthony did that in the context of the offense."

Gurley was patient, didn't force shots, and was able to score in transition, as the Minutemen had 17 points in transition and 19 off of turnovers.

"I was just going with the flow and just playing the game and just trying to knock down open shots, and thankfully, the ball just happened to go in tonight," Gurley said.

Gurley was not the only spark off the pine, with freshman guard Freddie Riley adding 17 points in 19 minutes, including going 4-of-9 from 3-point range. While Gurley was more complacent in scoring off the bench, Kellogg, along with Riley, felt that some of the freshman's shots were forced, and that he wants to improve on his shot selection and his defense.



"A couple of shots I made were bad shots, they just happened to go in, but I'm a lot more confident now," Riley said.

Riley had 12 points against Central Florida in his collegiate debut, and had eight against Cornell. Even with the questionable shooting, Kellogg feels that Riley will continue to provide scoring opportunities off the bench for UMass.

"He took a couple of shots that I shook my head at, but when they went in, I said 'great shot, Freddie,'" Kellogg said. "He gave you a little of what he is going to do here, maybe not this year, but definitely in the future."

Along with Riley and Gurley, freshman Javom Farrell, junior guard Gary Correia, and redshirt sophomore forwards Trey Lang and Matt Hill provided depth when freshman forwards Terrell Vinson and Sampson Carter needed a break. Farrell had four rebounds and had two points and two assists in 14 minutes, while Correia had three points and four assists in 18 minutes for starting point guard

Despite 40 second-half points to go along with hot shooting (54.5 percent), the Lions struggled to cool down the Minutemen, who finished the game shooting 54.5 percent. Gurley finished the night with a game-high 21 points.

"I thought he gave us a great boost when we were a little bit stagnant in the first half," UMass coach Derek Kellogg said of Gurley's performance.

One of the areas where the Minutemen were most effective was in the paint, where they finished with 54 points. Center Sean Carter (13 points, eight rebounds) shot 5-for-7 from the field to go with three free throws.

"He did some good stuff," Kellogg said. "When you're playing Division II teams like that, you need your big guy to be dominant and really change the complexion of the game and I thought he did that."

Without redshirt junior Hashim Bailey (groin), the Minutemen had to find other big men to relieve Carter inside. On the rebounding end, redshirt sophomore Matt Hill recorded four rebounds in nine minutes, which is the most he's played since last year's season opener against Arkansas-Monticello where he played

Atlantic 10 up for grabs in 2009-10

Jeffrey R. Larnard

The Atlantic 10 is not what it used to be. It's not that it's now a weaker conference than in past years, but a lot of familiar faces have left the conference, making the title up for grabs more than it has been the past two years.

Xavier dominated the regular season for the past two years and Temple rose in the conference tournament to win two straight A-10 titles, yet neither is favored to win the conference in the preseason polls, or by myself. Here's a look at how I see the conference finishing in conference play in 2009-10, with each team followed by their overall and A-10 record in 2008-09.

1. Dayton (27-8, 11-5)

The Flyers have been picked to finish top in the standings at the end of the season and have even started the season at No. 22 in the ESPN/USA Today Coaches Poll. This is a team who advanced to the second round of the NCAA Tournament before falling to Kansas. With four returning starters, led by junior guard Chris Wright who averaged 13.3 points per game and 6.6 rebounds, Dayton has reason to believe they can advance even further this year.

2. Richmond (20-16, 9-7)

The team has two of the better guards in the conference, and the return of center Dan Geriot, who was a scoring threat for the Spiders in the two seasons before he missed 2008-09 with a torn ACL, makes Richmond have reason to believe this season.

3. Xavier (27-8,12-4)

Xavier is still good and they very well could end up at the top of the conference again, but they lost their coach Sean Miller, who left for Arizona, and Derrick Brown, who left for the NBA. The only senior on the team is Jason Love. The bright side for the Musketeers is Jordan Crawford, the team's transfer from Indiana. After sitting on the bench last season, the sophomore is ready to play. Crawford could be the difference between Xavier being at the top of the conference or at the bottom.

4. La Salle (18-13, 9-7)

With four starting seniors returning and a top-50 recruit in 6-foot-10 center Aaric Murray, the Explorers have a nice mixture of teammates to help them fight for a top spot in the A-10.

5. Duquesne (21-13, 9-7)

The Dukes lost in the A-10 Championship game last spring, but return a ton of experience this season. Seven-foot transfer Marakinyo Williams from Kentucky will be a nice addition to forward Damian Saunders and their 3-point threats, Bill Clark and Jason Duty.

6. Charlotte (11-20, 5-11)

After a disappointing season last year, the 49ers will bounce back, especially with the return of Shamarr Bowden whose season was ended early to injury. Charlotte still made the A-10 Tournament as the No. 12 seed, but will grab a better seed this March.

7. Temple (22-15, 11-5)

Replacing three-time A-10 leading scorer Dionte Christmas won't be easy. Yes, Temple won two-straight A-10 Tournaments despite being a middle-of-the-pack seed, but a lot of that was because of Christmas' play, and there are questions as to who will take on that role.

8. Rhode Island (23-15, 11-5)

The Rams are another squad who have to deal with big-time losses to graduation (Jimmy Baron and Kahiem Seawright) and because of this will slip in the standings. URI has a lot of youth, but maybe not enough experience.

9. Saint Joseph's (17-15, 9-7)

Similar to Temple, the Hawks will have to deal with a huge loss in Ahmad Nivins, the 2009 A-10 Player of the Year. But the difference from Temple is that St. Joe's has fewer players who can step up to fill the loss.

10. Massachusetts (12-18, 7-9)

UMass returns guard Ricky Harris, whom the team will lean on, and is showcasing a lot of youth from Derek Kellogg's highly touted recruitment class. The Minutemen will need some pro-

Hofstra torches UM in shoot-out victory

Woodward gets start under center in finale

With 500 yards and four touchdowns through the air, Hofstra spoiled the Massachusetts football team's hopes of finishing the 2009 season with a winning record with a 52-38 win Saturday afternoon.

Hofstra	52
UMass	38

The 52 points given up by the UMass defense were the most given up all year as the Pride (5-6, 3-5 Colonial Athletic Association) used a pass-heavy offensive attack to score at will against the Minutemen (5-6, 3-4 CAA).

UMass fell behind early and faced a 28-10 deficit at halftime, but was able to cut the lead to seven on two occasions in the fourth quarter. Both times, however, Hofstra responded with a touchdown drive of their own to hold off the Minutemen.

Trailing 38-24 heading into the final quarter, Scott Woodward, who got his first career start at quarterback in his final career game, engineered a 92-yard drive in two minutes, 59 seconds to pull UMass within one score. After a 50-yard rush by senior Tony Nelson (16 rushes for 103 yards and three touchdowns) put UMass into the Pride's territory, Woodward moved the ball downfield before rushing into the end zone from 13 yards out.

Cory Christopher (38-of-50 for 484 yards passing and three touchdowns) found Christian Dennis a little over two minutes later with a 15-yard completion to extend the lead back to 14.

Christopher found success deep down field all game, completing numerous passes of more than 15 yards. The Pride's other quarterback, Steve Probst, also found success, going 7-for-9 for 88 yards and one touchdown. Aaron Weaver was their favorite target on the day, catching 15 passes for 191 yards and one touchdown, while Dennis grabbed five passes for 78 yards and two scores.

The running attack of the Pride did its damage

Jones lifts UMass over Villanova after missing game-winner against UNH

Sophomore Nicole Jones redeemed herself in the second game of the weekend for the Massachusetts women's basketball team by recording career highs with 22 points and 12 rebounds in Sunday afternoon's 55-47 victory over Villanova.

UMass	55
Villanova	47
UNH	58
UMass	57

Jones had great success against the Wildcats' (2-1) defense, as she contributed heavily to UMass' 24 points in the paint. The center bounced back with the stand-out performance after missing a hook shot with time expiring in the first game of the UMass' (2-2) weekend slate against New Hampshire on Friday night.

"Nicole Jones is the same one who fouled at New Hampshire and gave New Hampshire the opportunity to go to the foul line, and she certainly redeemed herself today," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said.

UMass' defense held Villanova's leading scorer, Maria Getty, to two points in the game. Getty averaged 12 points per game coming into the matchup. But through an aggressive defensive effort from Diatiema Hill and Kim Benton, the Minutewomen limited the guard's scoring opportunities. Hill also stood out by adding 12 points and eight rebounds in the win.

"I think our bigs came out and played a great game of basketball," Dacko said. "And I think we controlled the tempo and the boards."

Though Nova's Heather Scanlon, Laura Sweeney and Tia Grant finished with 12 points each, the Minutewomen evaded a comeback by the Wildcats by contesting shots and rebounding in the second half. Scanlon and Sweeney also finished with nine and eight rebounds respectively.

At halftime, Nova was up by three, but UMass showed its mettle by sustaining a comeback and holding off the Wildcats.

With two minutes, 47 seconds to play, Nova had cut the UMass lead to two points on a Grant 3-pointer. However, after a jumper from Hill and a block by Jasmine Watson on the ensuing possession, the Minutewomen stretched the lead for good.

Although UMass' leading scorer Kristina Danella was held to just seven points on 2-of-10 shooting from the field, the sophomore added seven rebounds and three assists. Through four games this season, Danella is averaging 14.5 points and six rebounds per game.

The win came after the Minutewomen suffered a last-second 58-57 loss on Friday night against UNH (2-2) that came down to the final possession for the Minutewomen.

UMass' Jones caught an inbounds pass with 2.3 seconds left on the clock and drove into the lane for a hook shot as time expired.

Ethnobotanist Chris Kilham drinks jungle water from the bark of a vine in Pucallpa, Peru. The bark, known as "cat's claw" is one of the examples of medicinal plants the students will study.

UM professor brings students to Amazon

Participants delve into medicinal use of plants

By Alyssa Creamer
Collegian Staff

They are pretty sure this is how it happened.

Chris Kilham, a University of Massachusetts ethnobotanist who has spent the past dozen years venturing back and forth from South America, studying Amazonian rainforests and their medicinal plants, was enjoying a usual morning yoga session with his wife, Zoe Helene. Helene and Kilham began discussing and virtually stretching out ways Kilham could alter his one-credit UMass course known as "The Shaman's Pharmacy," which teaches about the effects of specific medicinal plants. The couple wanted to come up with a way to make the class more "hands-on" for the participants.

"What if we take the students into the Amazon?"

This 'what if' question posed on that morning stuck and sparked Kilham's efforts in the fall semester to turn the course into a three-credit expedition that will take 16 students to the jungles of the Peruvian Amazon. Students from Mount Holyoke College, Smith College and UMass will fly out with Kilham, Helene and UMass plant and soil sciences Ph D-candidate Zoe Gardner on Jan. 5 to reside on the borders of the Amazon until Jan. 14. The trip costs approximately $3,000 per student, and $2,600 of the cost is due by Dec. 3.

An informational meeting was held by Kilham on Nov. 23 to discuss the logistics of the trip with the 16 students intending on participating. Once in the Amazon, the students will spend their days doing various activities, such as hiking through one of the rainforest's canopy walkways.

"The real amazing thing is the canopy walkway in the primary rainforest. Also, I hope to do projects to help people in the neighboring villages. The professor mentioned he is looking into it, but is still working out the details," said Smith freshman Lauren Maghiozzi, who will be attending the trip.

Kilham, who is known to many as the "Medicine Hunter," has spent the aftermath of what his wife insists was his "hippie, college days at UMass" dedicating himself to a career in discovering, testing and studying the effects of medicinal plant life as an ethnobotanist – a person who focuses on the effects and uses plants can present to humans.

"Ethnobotanists are interested in the human aspect of plants," said Helene. "It's sort of like being Indiana Jones as opposed to just being somebody who sits and studies flowers. [Kilham] is definitely a scientist, too, and he can hang with the scientists and talk science."

In addition to his research of plants, Kilham has spent a large portion of his time working in the Amazon, developing close relationships with many of the native shamans living in the rainforest. A shaman, which has often been seen in literature as being called a 'witch doctor,' refers to the native villager who is entrusted by other villagers as an information resource for health suggestions and

Budget Task Force rekindles efforts to stabilize UM funds

By Herb Scribner
Collegian Staff

When the University of California's Board of Regents voted to raise undergraduate fees for its students by 32 percent on Thursday, it was clear that the economic freefall of the past 18 months is beginning to take a major toll on both public and private institutions of learning.

Barring another injection of federal stimulus money, the University of Massachusetts will itself be facing down a large budget cliff in the coming months and years. In the meantime, Chancellor Robert Holub has retained the Budget Planning Task Force (BPTF) that was brought together last year, and rekindled its efforts in advising the UMass administration.

"We'll probably see some effects of this [economic situation] as early as summer 2010, with the full impact emerging over the next two years," said task force chair and linguistics professor John McCarthy.

"In collaboration with the BPTF, I am trying to put the campus on a sounder financial basis," Chancellor Robert Holub said. In recent months the Chancellor has been working closely with McCarthy, who has been heading the charge to increase revenue for the school before the economic landscape worsens.

"I have worked well with the BPTF [so far]," said Holub. "I have accepted most of their recommendations, and meet frequently with Professor McCarthy to discuss the recommendations of the task force. I don't foresee any changes in this relationship in the coming year."

The BPTF is primarily looking at altering certain aspects which the school itself controls, rather than things that the state has control over, such as the amount of funding coming from Beacon Hill. The Task Force's focus has evolved of late, as it now looks to work on cost savings, entrepreneurial activities and financial aid fees.

"The BPTF advises the chancellor about ways of dealing with the ongoing budget crisis," McCarthy said. "It also serves as a way for the central administration to disseminate reliable and complete information about the budget." McCarthy went on to explain that the focus of the BPTF is to increase revenue and change the costs of certain aspects of running and maintaining the University.

The Cost Savings Committee, chaired by Robert Pollin, has been given full leadership by McCarthy and the BPTF in trying to reduce expenses. Pollin is a professor of economics at UMass, as well as the co-director for the Political Economy Research Institute (PERI).

Many students at UMass are expecting fee increases, which could soften the financial pressure put on middle-class students and protect the poorer students if it is paired with more financial aid packages. This aspect is likely to be handled by the financial aid and fees subcommittee, chaired by Carol Barr, associate dean for undergraduate programs at the Isenberg School of Management.

"We feel it is a high priority to maintain access for students from lower-income groups," said Holub. "We will continue to devote a considerable percentage of fees to financial aid."

According to Holub, UMass has contributed 30 percent of the 50 percent increase in financial aid seen at the University over the past five years.

McCarthy noted that the increase in fees is already in effect, yet it has been covered by the rebate many students received this past fall. Fees and other financial aid changes for the poorer students are also already in effect. Some of these financial aid fees that will affect students will come from the proposed increased out-of-state enrollment. By recruiting more out-of-state students, who pay more to attend the University, UMass plans on adding some extra revenue.

The Entrepreneurial Activities Subcommittee will also be looking to spread its initiative, focusing on improving the profitability of UMass' online courses and five-year masters programs.

"The administration is trying to proceed as quickly as possible on plans like increasing online courses," said McCarthy. Online classes are

UMass swimming takes third

The UMass swimming and diving teams each placed third in Boston University's Terrier Invitational this past weekend. Jason Cook led the diving team with two wins, while the swim team had 22 top-five individual finishes.

By Daniel Herberholz
Collegian Staff

It was a busy weekend in Boston for the Massachusetts swimming and diving teams.

School records were broken in three different events as Jason Cook led the diving team with two more victories, and the swim team earned 22 top-five individual finishes.

With dive in Cambridge for the Harvard Invite, the swim teams both earned third place showings at Boston University's Terrier Invitational.

The women rode three broken records to the bronze, two by sophomore Chelsea Downing and another by freshmen Amina Meho.

Downing went, according to women's coach Bob Newhart, "under the mystical barrier" in the 500-yard freestyle. Her pacing to a 4:58.58 finish took fourth place on the day and knocked almost three seconds off of the previous Minutewomen record, held by Karin Sonnwald from 1994-1995 (5:01.17).

Downing also broke the 1650-yard freestyle record in a third place finish (17:24.56), and Meho snipped a whole second off of last season's 50-yard freestyle record for sixth on the day (23:55). Downing also notched fifth in the 400-yard individual medley (4:31.59), one spot ahead of stellar freshman Julie Magyar (4:32.85).

The women's other top-five finishes included senior Elizabeth Walsh's fourth-place finish in the 200-yard freestyle (1:53.51), junior Rachel Borden's fifth-place finish in the 100-yard breaststroke (1:05.62) and Meho's fourth-place showing in the 100-yard freestyle (52.55).

Newhart's performer of the week was junior Gillian Bank, who swam personal bests in 100- and 200-yard backstroke, 100-yard butterfly and in four relays.

"We had 44 lifetime bests and 27 times in the school's top 10," Newhart said. "This was just the tip of the iceberg."

Newhart also highlighted the women's performance at night, saying 70 final times were faster than the daytime preliminary races.

"This was a great dress rehearsal for big meets later in the season," said Newhart. In leading up to the Atlantic 10 Championships, he said they "got there now and can now get even faster."

The women's 514 points put them in third behind host BU and Yale University. Boston University also took first on the men's side, followed by Boston viewed as a large potential source for earnings, which is something the BPTF is looking to encourage.

"Some [online classes] are very well designed and increase access for individuals who are distant from campus or employed and unable to attend during the day," noted Holub.

The task force hopes to encourage more students to take online classes, as well as fix the unit structure of these classes, as a way to help improve the school's budget.

"Many students can only take online courses for a variety of reasons. Others prefer to do so," said Holub. "Education is accomplished in a variety of ways in our times, and most studies have shown that learning does not suffer in online courses." While unsure of what the fee structure will look like, Holub explained that "online courses are a source of revenue for many colleges."

With all of these changes on the way, the BPTF is looking at even more areas as a way to help the school in the economic crisis, including improving the indirect costs on grants, creating a more effective development plan, offering a reduction in capital costs and altering the maintenance and administrative costs to be more efficient.

"We need to balance the budget with a combination of revenue generation and reductions in expenditures," Holub said. "I'd love to see more revenues, which would make our task of managing the campus easier."

"No meetings of the entire BPTF are currently scheduled. That may change soon, but at this time only the subcommittees are meeting regularly," McCarthy said.

McCarthy has been a professor for 21 years, and now specializes in linguistic theory. He received the University Distinguished Teaching Award twice during his career.

"The goal of all of these actions is to maintain quality and access to courses despite the biggest reduction in state support that we have ever faced," McCarthy said. "To the extent that we can succeed in these goals, students will benefit."

holistic medicines.

"In a tribal community, a shaman is a healer who knows the medicine people need that can be found in nature. He is a community advisor, who also gives insight into spiritual issues. A shaman is almost a combination of a doctor, therapist and minister, you could say," Kilham said.

"The Amazon rainforest is the greatest pharmacy in the world," said Kilham. "You can get [pharmaceutical] drugs if you want them, but when you can have the healing power of truly effective plants found in the rainforest, most people who live there don't bother with [pharmaceutical] drugs. [The natives] do rely on the shaman, but also most people in the area are familiar with the plants of the rainforest because they grow up within this environment. Just as most of the people of New England can identify a pine tree, elm tree or a dandelion, naturally, most of the people of the Amazon can identify and know the uses of a number of plants."

Although Kilham does not feel as though he has had trouble in his excursions over the past 12 years communicating with the natives, a medicinal expert named Segundo Inuma will be a constant companion and guide for the students on the trip.

"He's amazing," said Kilham of Inuma. "He will be our contact to other native people in the region. He speaks excellent English and Spanish, and has knowledge of the native dialects."

"Sharing this experience with the students is kind of a way to open them up to a world," said Kilham. "Since most of the students going on the trip have an interest in medicinal plants, these students will be in an environment in which plant medicine is a big deal."

JUSTIN KELLOGG/COLLEGIAN

Kilham is surrounded by the Amazonian rainforest as he hikes down a canopy walkway. His students will experience the same sights in January.

Kilham believes that even people who are not plant experts have made many great contributions to medicinal plant science and have had "many great adventures." As such, although the course will directly explain prominent plant life within the Amazon as the students come across it, the students are not required to have extensive previous knowledge of medicinal plants.

He did, however, make several suggestions to students about plant guides that would be most useful on the trip, citing that Dr. James Duke's "Amazonian Ethnobotanical Dictionary" has been a great resource for him during his personal trips, as it not only gives the biological name, but also the native names of plants. He also told the students that he would be e-mailing them a list of plants that they are likely to discuss during the trip, which they'll be able to cross-reference information about on Leslie Taylor's Rain-tree.com website. Rain-tree com features an extensive database about plants and their medicinal uses.

Some examples of plant life they will examine include "cat's claw," which is the bark of a vine that relieves pain and inflammation, as well as enhances immunity. They will also spend time looking at a tree sap informally known as "dragon's blood." It is used to heal damaged skin quickly.

During the trip, students are also likely to experience a lifestyle change as their lodging will not provide hot water for showers, bedding any more glamorous than cots topped with mosquito nets or modern laundry facilities.

Kilham encouraged students to remember that recording devices can help make the experience more memorable, but there are slim odds of being able to recharge digital camera equipment as access to electricity will be scarce. To that end, access to commercial stores will be non-existent for these students.

"It's quite dangerous," said Helene. "There are poisonous snakes, and they are everywhere. They are aggressive, and they will take you down. There are alligators, crocodiles and poisonous spiders. It has its dangers, because we're going to the heart of the jungle. The mosquitoes are like science fiction down there, but that's what makes this an adventure."

"I'm really excited to be going on the trip," said UMass junior plant and soil biotechnology major, Kirsten Nuttle. "I'm not afraid because it is the last place on Earth that hasn't changed as much as others have from human society. And humans are scarier than nature."

"I've done a lot of camping, so I don't worry about bugs," said UMass junior biology major, Seth Rowley. "I think it will be fascinating to learn about the plants found in the rainforest. There's a chance this might be a one-time experience in my life, especially because the forest is depleting. I think it will be an amazing experience."

As far as students' safety is concerned, Kilham has prepared for the worst, but is expecting the best. In gaining permission to conduct this trip, he has also been granted the confidence of UMass' International Programs Office and plant and soil sciences department as UMass.

"It wasn't too difficult to get permission from the University," said Gardner. We had to provide them with reassurances about the students' safety and the academic quality of the trip. But the trip has been something that both [Kilman] and the department [of plant and soil sciences] have wanted to do. Students are always asking for field experiences, and they know that Amazonia is an amazing place to learn. It is a rare opportunity." Gardner is currently writing her thesis in a book titled "American Herbal Product Association's Botanical Safety Handbook, 2nd Edition." It will be a reference guide documenting plant life that has scientifically-proven medicinal qualities.

Gardner also held individual interviews with the students to ensure that they would be able to handle "rustic" living conditions. "We've got a really good group of students going," said Gardner.

"UMass was great," said Kilham. "The faculty groups we had to gain approval from were more or less like 'You mean, you really are going to go to the rainforest?' We didn't encounter any resistance of any sort. They asked the important safety questions, but once those details were settled, the faculty just wanted to hear stories about what we would be doing."

It is Kilham's belief that many people want to find a solution to the environmental destruction of Amazonia, and that by showing students the effects of healing experiences and taking them into the rainforest to research medicinal plant life, "the students will be turned on to the greatest rainforest in the world. And all of these activities involving people traveling to the Amazon to gain insight from native shamans and learning about medicinal plant treatments can help keep the Amazon going while giving people valuable experiences."

"I read Chris' book 'Tales from the Medicine Trail' and loved it," said senior anthropology major, Samantha Parsons. "I transferred to UMass partially because I couldn't believe he taught here."

According to Blueplanetbiomes.org/amazon.htm, a website dedicated to displaying information about Amazonia, "The Amazon rainforest, also known as Amazonia, is one of the world's greatest natural resources. Because its vegetation continuously recycles carbon dioxide into oxygen, it has been described as the 'Lungs of our Planet.' About 20 percent of Earth's oxygen is produced by the Amazon rainforest." According to Kilham, the Amazon's resources have been steadily depleting, and approximately 50,000 species of creatures are lost annually.

UM, fraternity help 4-H run food drive

By Jessica Bonheur
Collegian Staff

During the month of November, the Asian-American Fraternity, Lambda Phi Epsilon, at the University of Massachusetts has been partnering with the UMass Extension and 4-H program in support of the 4-H club's annual food drive.

Lambda Phi Epsilon, whose principles as a fraternity focus on wisdom, honor and courage, reached out to the UMass Extension and 4-H club to partner up and follow through with plans to expand on their mission of community service.

The president of Lambda Phi Epsilon called and met with the 4-H club on Monday, Nov. 16. The fraternity helped the 4-H club clean out their office by removing machinery and files and expressed interest in joining forces in the food drive.

This is the third annual food drive for the brothers of Lambda Phi Epsilon, and they're expecting to collect 11 tons of goods, which is approximately 22,000 pounds of food. Last year, the 4-H club collected more than six tons of non-perishable goods.

Thomas Waskiewicz, a 4-H educator in the UMass Extension program, said that the brothers of Lambda Phi Epsilon were "great to work with," and that the members of the 4-H club are "enthusiastic and motivated youth working to benefit the UMass campus and 4-H program across the state."

Waskiewicz stated that each year they increase the amount of food raised as need increases. As part of their partnership, Lambda Phi Epsilon has scattered donation bins all around campus for students in the UMass community to actively participate in the spirit of giving back. The food donated will then be given to local shelters, such as the Amherst Survivor Center and the Food Bank of Western Massachusetts in Hatfield, Mass., as well as other shelters serving people in need this holiday season. The food will be delivered the first week in December. Waskiewicz says that the need is greater than ever, explaining, "They [the shelters] are getting demands from even people with two incomes that are struggling with food costs and energy costs, not just the homeless." The 4-H program has also partnered with Cumberland Farms, with donation bins in their stores across the state.

In the future, 4-H plans to reach out to other fraternities and sororities on campus, furthering their agenda geared towards providing services to the community.

MATTHEW HARRISON/COLLEGIAN

The UMass Extension, 4-H club and Lambda Phi Epsilon are encouraging students to donate non-perishable goods to their food drive.

Waskiewicz said in the past, 4-H, which stands for head, heart, hands and health, has donated time to visiting patients in Shriner's Hospital in Springfield and nursing homes. The group has also collected survival packets for individuals that have been in homeless shelters. The survival packets usually include items such as socks, toothpaste and other essentials. The 4-H program has also worked with animal rescue groups, animal shelters, blood drives and possesses an extensive list of community service involvement. They will "continue to reach out as need emerges," said Waskiewicz.

The 4-H program was started in 1902, making it 107 years old. One of the founding locations for the 4-H program was UMass Amherst, known then as the Massachusetts Agricultural College.

UMass Extension is part of the UMass Outreach program. According to its website Umass.edu/outreach, the UMass Outreach program focuses on the idea that "the relationship of the University of Massachusetts Amherst to the communities, groups and individuals with whom it creates meaningful engagements is a dynamic and flexible one. Faculty members at the University increasingly work with community leaders, professional decision-makers and creative thinkers throughout the Commonwealth to build relationships of value to all partners."

Waskiewicz, a UMass alumni, has worked with the 4-H for 27 years. "We have a lot of faith in our UMass students," said Waskiewicz. He plans on partnering with Lambda Phi Epsilon in the future, and would like the fraternities and sororities on campus to reach out to 4-H programs across the state in not only food drive events, but also in situations in which 4-H members are working with young students to encourage them to take interest in college. These types of events are known as college tours, and according to Waskiewicz, these tours are to "build that link so that we can bring a diverse group of students from across the country to campus to show them the college experience" Future 4-H projects in the area will include developing programs for middle school students in Springfield. Current UMass students that would like to get involved can visit the website Mass4h.org or contact Waskiewicz at his office number (413) 545-0611.

Children or e-children?

Thomas Moore

As a junior at the University of Massachusetts, I find that my breakfast conversations have moved from noon closer to 8:00 a.m. over time. They have switched locations from the crowded Hampshire Dining Commons to a desolate apartment. But the most staggering development over the past couple of years has been a cataclysmic shift in the topic of discussion. No longer are we just recapping the previous day's results in the sporting world, but moving onto topics like getting married and having children. This has been quite the wake up call.

I could always B.S. a thermometer by holding it up to a light, but there was never tricking the back of my mother's hand.

Now listen. I'm still a college student, and single at that, so I don't expect the stress of marriage and children to add too much heat to my fire any time soon, but it's never too early to start thinking about it. I don't have the experience to speak with wisdom about relationships, marriage or having children, but I've been equipped with a working brain long enough to come to the conclusion that the notion of starting a family is overwhelming and scary.

This fear isn't just from the fact that having a child is an incredible responsibility, or that the projected cost of raising a single child is $291,570 for middle-income families, according to the United States Department of Agriculture, but by the extremely heavy reliance on technology as a "third parent" in raising our children.

Now I don't think that all technology is evil, but I've been seeing a scary trend that is starting to appear in the commercial industry. Take for instance the "Thermofocus 5-in-1 Non-Contact Thermometer." This new product created by Kidz-Med is a "state-of-the-art 'no touch' thermometer [that] takes your child's temperature accurately without touching their skin." It seems like a harmless product, but the dependence on such a tool may lead to a disconnect between a parent and their child. Pointing a laser at a child's head may be more accurate when speaking in hundredths of a degree, but what happened to touch? I could always B.S. a thermometer by holding it up to a light, but there was never tricking the back of my mother's hand.

What seems to be avoided by such an invention is the spending of enough time with your child to notice a difference between their normal temperatures as opposed to a dangerously elevated one. But I think that's a price that I'll pay to avoid not being able to detect my child's temperature one day because the batteries for my thermometer laser gun died.

More than just reading a child's temperature, another product named "Safety Mate" is available for parents and acts as an "interactive talking first-aid guide for family, baby, child or infant emergency." The small gadget folds open and resembles a children's book with buttons that illustrate symptoms ranging from allergic reactions to falls and bone injuries. But what if the batteries run out (maybe just buying better batteries would be the solution to all of this) and the Safety Mate isn't available to walk you through how to take care of your child? What we're seeing is an arguably unnecessary reliance on technology in the event of an emergency where prior research as a responsible parent on basic emergencies should be sufficient.

It's like a professor letting you take an exam with your textbook – you can get all the answers right, but you're not actually learning anything. Some would argue that you're not even a student at that point. Could the same be said about a parent using a Safety Mate come "test time?"

Maybe it's one thing to be relying on technology a little bit to help raise a child, but it's another to let technology take the wheel when it comes to educating a child. That's right – robot teachers. The Sun Newspaper reported earlier this year that a robot invented by Hiroshi Kobayashi will start teaching students as soon as it passes a trial term at a Tokyo primary school.

I don't care if the robot has 18 motors that can "create expressions including happiness, surprise, fear, disgust, sadness and even anger," children should be taught by humans. This may seem a bit hypocritical considering most of my learning comes from browsing Wikipedia and YouTube.com, but a robot that "is multilingual, can do roll calls and set tasks from textbooks" is not a substantial replacement for a human instructor. With this trend, robot babysitters will hit the market right before robotic surrogate parents.

Now I know that the majority of readers aren't in a place where they're seriously preparing to have children, but I think that breakfast conversations and pillow talk may be migrating in that direction in the future for some of us. As responsible adults, I don't think it's too soon to bring the topic into the light. I speak to future moms and future dads by asking you to remember that raising a family always has been and should always be a human-to-human relationship, not a human to computer or human love triangle.

Subversive pinko turkeys

Chris Amorosi

My loyal readers, or reader, may remember my column from a year ago concerning the holiday of pre-Thanksgiving. In that column, I reflected on the wholesome and American origins of the holiday. For instance, pre-Thanksgiving begins five days before Thanksgiving to commemorate the deportation and marginalization of the Five Civilized Tribes from the South to Oklahoma. We eat a bird called "turkey" because Christopher Columbus insisted that the colorfully-plumed animals were, in reality, Asiatic sultans to the west of India. We eat corn because it is the only food to survive the trial by ordeal of boiling.

All of this has passed into historical fact thanks to my efforts. Indeed, the tradition continues in my apartment, and we are on day two of pre-Thanksgiving as of this writing. We bought a 25-pound turkey that will last us well into this week. Corn, mashed potatoes, squash and all the staples revitalized with space-age, microwave-oven technology quite unlike anything used to cook turkey or witches.

But something was wrong during that first feast. The feeling first occurred to me as I cut the deliciously seasoned turkey breast, with seasoning both above and under the skin, and doled it out to my apartment-mates and guests. My eyes twitched when someone asked me to pass the cranberry sauce. And as I was served pumpkin pie, bile rose in my throat. At first, I ascribed these feelings to overindulging in apple cider and not liking pumpkin pie.

As I lay in bed, thinking about Pilgrims, freedom and fusillades blasting the Wampanoag to bits, it struck me.

To think that the most important founders of America – pale-skinned English fundamentalists who arrived late – could have planted the seeds of socialist tyranny.

Every guest got an equal share of food regardless of how much work he put into the meal. One of my roommates didn't help at all because he was at a sports tournament. At the table, I could ask for more food and someone would provide it to me for free. If the food was not in reach, someone would pass it to me without a thought. The communal nature of it all where property was given freely and generously, not sold.

A specter is haunting Thanksgiving: the specter of communism. All the powers of America's conservatives should enter into a holy alliance to exercise this specter: Palin and Beck, Boehner and McConnell, House Republicans and Senate Republicans.

This entirely original realization shook the stupefied drool from my chin. To think that the most important founders of America – pale-skinned English fundamentalists who arrived late – could have planted the seeds of socialist tyranny. Seeds, having Biden their time for centuries, bear the fruits of Obamanation in this 21st century.

The idea that America was founded on the basis of cooperation and sharing makes me sick. Upon further reflection, I should expect no better from English settlers by way of the Netherlands. It would take coddling by a National Health Service and then a thorough inculcation in pot subculture for anyone to set sail for Virginia and end up so deep in the blue states that one could marry homosexually and share an insurance policy.

Did you know that Thanksgiving is a federal holiday? I may want law regulating people in the privacy of their bedrooms. I may want Moses' law enshrined on the lawn of every courthouse. But I certainly don't want the government telling me when I can and cannot go to work. Forced vacations and government-mandated feasting? Sounds like some bizarro world Soviet collective farm in reverse. No thank you, comrade! I think vacations should be left entirely to the demands of the free market and not ruled and regulated by bureaucrats.

Consider the crowning event of every Thanksgiving Day: The triumphal Stalin-esque parade put on by Macy's department store in Manhattan. Macy's, whose logo prominently features a red star and whose business model attempts to socialize various types of stores into subordinate departments. Traditionally, the final float in Macy's parade is a giant Santa Claus. Santa, a man dressed in red who dispenses toys to every child regardless of wealth. Santa, the harbinger of the next insidious holiday based on selfless giving. As Glenn Beck would astutely note, if you rearrange the letters in "Santa" you can spell the word "Satan." But that is a topic for a future defense of our great land.

FIVE REASONS WHY WE'RE THANKFUL IN 2009

1) The zombie apocalypse didn't happen.

2) The "Bush" was trimmed.

3) Dead celebrity jokes.

4) We have a new Recreation Center to work off the holiday food.

5) We can use "go green" as an excuse to regift an ugly sweater.

Let us give thanks where thanks is due

Eric Magazu

This Thursday, if not earlier, many of us will be heading home to visit with family and friends for a hearty Thanksgiving dinner. This is the tradition that most of us share as Americans. The day after Thanksgiving is known as the kick-off shopping day for the holiday season.

It is not uncommon at this time of year for people to get on their high horse and lecture their fellow Americans on the original meaning of these holidays. It is not uncommon for these same people to engage in the very same behavior that they are criticizing. They will suggest that they too are inevitably drawn into the popular culture and must comply.

This is not really true. If a person truly wants to make a change in the world, they can do it with a strong desire and genuine self-discipline. One of the most fundamental quotations among our age group is Mahatma Gandhi's "Be the change you wish to see in the world."

This Thursday, if not earlier, many of us will be heading home to visit with family and friends for a hearty Thanksgiving dinner. This is the tradition that most of us share as Americans. The day after Thanksgiving is known as the kick-off shopping day for the holiday season.

It is not uncommon at this time of year for people to get on their high horse and lecture their fellow Americans on the original meaning of these holidays. It is not uncommon for these same people to engage in the very same behavior that they are criticizing. They will suggest that they too are inevitably drawn into the popular culture and must comply.

This is not really true. If a person truly wants to make a change in the world, they can do it with a strong desire and genuine self-discipline. One of the most fundamental quotations among our age group is Mahatma Gandhi's "Be the change you wish to see in the world."

Perhaps there is a lot of crass materialism and superficiality at this time of year. However, there remains deep value in our assemblage into our family units.

This quotation challenges our typical assumptions about politics. Often we feel deep in our souls that we should vote for a democratic candidate because they care for "poor people." However, if we really examine Gandhi's quotation, he is not calling on us to ask of our politicians to make a change, but he wants us to make a change in our own lives. What Gandhi really wants of us is that we should go out into the world and care for poor people. Are any of us going to have poor people over for Thanksgiving or Christmas dinner? Think about it.

Now, a lot of what Americans do during this time of year is actually not as debased as the critics will tell us. Perhaps there is a lot of crass materialism and superficiality at this time of year. However, there remains deep value in our assemblage into our family units. Even if we do not bring poor people into our homes for Thanksgiving dinner, the time with families is quite valuable. Sharing gifts with our relatives and friends helps us to celebrate and be glad about the past year. There is absolutely nothing wrong with this at all.

As for the people on the high horse making lectures, I am one of them. Yet I myself engage in many very selfish pursuits. Therefore, I want put out the disclaimer that I am a hypocrite. Nevertheless, I believe firmly there is value if we look to the traditions that underlie the upcoming Thanksgiving holiday.

Many of the traditions behind Thanksgiving have very religious undertones. Many of the early gubernatorial proclamations for a "Day of Public Thanksgiving and praise" make reference to "our Lord Jesus Christ."

One such example is John Hancock's 1791 Massachusetts Thanksgiving Proclamation. In John Hancock's proclamation that year (the same John Hancock that signed the Declaration of Independence and was the governor of Massachusetts during this time), published in the statewide newspaper, the Columbian Centinel, it says boldly:

"I have therefore thought fit to appoint, and by the advice and consent of the Council, do hereby accordingly appoint, Thursday, the seventeenth of November next, to be observed as a Day of Public Thanksgiving and praise, throughout this Commonwealth – Hereby calling upon Ministers and People of every denomination, to assemble on the said Day – and in the name of the Great Mediator, devoutly and sincerely offer to Almighty God, the gratitude of our Hearts, for all his goodness towards us…"

Based on other portions of the publication, "the name of the Great Mediator" appears to be reference to Jesus Christ. It seems truly that the purpose of Thanksgiving is to thank and to elevate God for all of His great blessings upon ourselves and upon our nation.

It is considerate to think about this, because most of our other solemn civic and national occasions tend to honor human beings for their great sacrifices. Either they may be our war veterans or our war dead (Veterans' Day, Memorial Day), our great leaders (Martin Luther King, Jr. Day, Presidents' Day), and even our workers (Labor Day), but, seriously, what about God himself, the source of life abundant?

In our day of rampant secularism and materialism, it is indeed proper for all of us, myself included (as I am knee-deep in materialistic pursuits), to truly reflect upon the greatness of the created Universe that we owe all of the credit to God. As an undeserving people and nation, we benefit over and over again from the great mercy and compassion of a great and awesome God. This is truly an enormous cause for all of us to offer up extraordinary thanksgiving and praise.

The moral imperative for health care

Matt Kushi

Moral purity has been the catalyst of change throughout the history of the United States of America. This path has not always been on the conscious level of our nation's leaders, but it's defined what the United States represents within the rest of the world.

The land of the free and the home of the brave. A line from our very own National Anthem and one that sums up what America is all about. Our country is known for its progressiveness.

The track of this country's very own history is what makes the mountainous divides that we have put between ourselves concerning health care even more trivial.

We all are aware that much of 2009 has been spent arguing over the issue of whether health care reform, especially the public option, is necessary and beneficial towards the advancement of the United States. There are those that say yes, it is the only way to go, and there are those that say that no, the government is trying to dictate our lives.

Let us step back and evaluate the situation. What do we know of the current system? What we know is that somewhere around the vicinity of 46 million people, according to the White House's statistics, currently do not have health insurance. This is because they are not eligible to be covered or they do not have enough money to buy health insurance. It is often these people who cannot afford health insurance that are in the direst need of its services.

How can we silently listen to and ignore the suffering screams of a fellow person in need?

We also know that at the current rate of progression, health care costs will be rising in the coming years.

This, in turn, will lead to health care expenditures rising and affecting even more of our already wounded economy.

This is unacceptable. Not only are we not supporting the very people that make up our country, we are crippling our country unnecessarily.

How can we call ourselves the country of equality when we can't respect a fellow man's health? How can we turn our backs on our brothers and sisters when they need someone to lean on the most? How can we silently listen to and ignore the suffering screams of a fellow person in need?

We are more compassionate than that. I know we are. I have seen our country come together and bond in times of pain. We have lived as a country of one instead of a country of 50 so many times that I cannot and will not accept the reasoning that now we can't help a countryman stand.

We know the bill that is currently in the Senate proposes health care that would cover most people in this country.

You would not have to worry about being uninsured if you are unemployed, or about not being able to afford health insurance.

You wouldn't have to worry about what would happen if you are seriously injured but can't afford to go to the hospital. In turn, this would lessen that financial burden of rising health care costs.

For those that oppose health care reform, I have a question: What are you going to do once you graduate college and are no longer covered by your parents' insurance? Do you have a plan? Are you going to be able to get a job right away that has benefit? Many of us are not sure about any of this. Once we are off of our parent's plan, will we be able to get coverage? If this health care bill is passed, we would be covered.

For those that reason the issue of health care reform is all about the government trying to dictate every action that we partake in, let me say this: I will respect your feelings, but I must disagree with them.

Just because a government tries to be a little proactive in your life does not always mean that they are trying to control your life. The overall function of the government is not here to tell us what to do. Rather, they are here to serve as a shoulder to lean on when we need their support.

Many of the social programs of the past 50 years serve this purpose. If a person needs help, there are resources available to help them. They are not meant to be shoved down that person's throat.

Health care reform is not just a political issue, though its fate is ultimately controlled in the realm of politics. No, health care reform is a moral issue as well. The consequences of the actions that we take on this matter do not fall on anyone but ourselves.

Again, we fall back to the question of where our morals are situated and what equality means to all of us. From where I stand today, health care reform is necessary. It is the right thing to do.

For better or worse, Stephenie Meyer's "Twilight" saga is an unavoidable phenomenon. The film adaptation of "New Moon," the second installment in the series, opened Friday, Nov. 20 to massive crowds. With an estimated $140.7 million earned opening weekend, there's no dawn in sight for this box-office bloodsucker. Yet the numbers don't tell the whole story – to get the full picture, you needed to experience the winding lines of screaming tweens all clamoring for a pass into this season's hottest cinematic attraction.

The main storyline is the love triangle between Bella Swan (Kristen Stewart), vampire Edward Cullen (Robert Pattinson) and werewolf Jacob Black (Taylor Lautner). As evidenced by the scores of "Team Edward" and "Team Jacob" t-shirts within the crowd, each are an appealing choice to Bella and to audiences. Who wouldn't want to be in her shoes – to be able to choose between Pattinson and the cute-but-still-technically-jailbait Lautner?

To his credit, Lautner and his pack of werewolf buddies remain shirtless throughout most of the movie, and are easy on the eyes to say the least. Pattinson, on the other hand, comes off as pasty and sickly-looking, but a choice selection for a young girl who isn't so rosy-cheeked to begin with. While the roles of Edward and Jacob are relatively flat, Pattinson and Lautner fill them out nicely.

Stewart is somewhat bland, but brings a strength and spunk to the character of Bella that is not found in Meyer's books. Bella's clinginess and constant need to be rescued do not come across as strongly in the films, thanks to the combined efforts of director Chris Weitz and screenwriter Melissa Rosenberg. Michael Sheen, Jamie Campbell Bower, Christopher Heyerdahl and Dakota Fanning make nice additions to the cast as the Volturi, the venerable rulers of the vampire world.

"New Moon" is one of the weaker books of the saga, serving to set up the Bella-Edward-Jacob love triangle and (spoiler alert) Bella's eventual transformation into a vampire. The film has little substantial plot, and the three main characters spend most of their time pining away and making bedroom eyes at each other. The humor is, for the most part, as corny and painfully awkward as the teenage hormones that run rampant throughout the film.

The screenplay rarely strays from Meyer's original story. The film opens with Bella's 18th birthday, an event she marks with some measure of melancholy because the immortal Edward will remain 17 forever.

An innocent paper cut at her birthday party sends Edward's brother Jasper into a bloodthirsty frenzy, and Edward and the Cullens leave town to protect Bella, with Edward denouncing his love for her.

Bella is left moping, friendless and – in a nod to the original "Twilight" hunted by vampires who are seeking revenge on the Cullens.

She finds solace in her friendship with Jacob, but he too becomes distant and tells her to stay away "for her own good," though she later discovers that he has reluctantly turned into a werewolf.

In Edward's absence, Bella becomes reckless, as she revels in the visions of Edward that she has when in danger. An instance of cliff-jumping causes Alice Cullen to believe that Bella is dead, and Edward, realizing that he can not live without Bella, sets off to Italy to provoke the Volturi, which, as he explains to Bella, is one of the only ways that a vampire can die.

While the literary merit of Meyer's books is debatable, she certainly knows how to tell a story that will captivate audiences. The draw of the romance novel genre is the reader's ability to live vicariously through the story's female protagonist, and Meyer's books and their film adaptations allow audiences to do just that. Oscar-worthy it is not, but the "Twilight" series, in a whole, makes for a wonderful piece of escapism.

Bella Swan (Kristen Stewart) is caught between a rock and a fangy place as she becomes the object of obsession for vampy Edward (Robert Pattinson) and buff Jacob (Taylor Lautner) in "New Moon."

With songs bemoaning unrequited love, Glasglow, Scotland natives Camera Obscura successfully hearken back to the saccharin pop of the 1960s while cultivating a style all their own.

Scotch, kilts and plenty of kitsch

Glasgow-based indie-pop group Camera Obscura will bring their melodic melancholy to the Pearl Street Ballroom tonight. Formed back in 1996 by unassuming frontwoman Tracyanne Campbell, Camera Obscura did not record an album until 2001. The band has been steadily building buzz ever since their debut, "Biggest Bluest Hi-Fi," hit the scene.

Featuring the same folk influence, sad-eyed spaciness and big orchestration of their previous works, Camera Obscura's fourth album, "My Maudlin Career," links the band even more to the sound of 1960s girl groups.

Heart-wrenching string melodies abound on the album, which was released in April, with modern indie flourishes like the now-commonplace glockenspiel. Campbell's sweet, subtly accented vocals tell stories of either unrequited or disappointing love, often with a sardonic edge that makes all the sweetness taste a little saccharin.

But the saccharin is genuine. It tastes like a frustration with her own role in the musical melodrama she's composed. The unabashedly romantic harmonies contrast splendidly with her often bitter lyrics.

The music video for "Hey Lloyd, I'm Ready to Be Heartbroken," the opening track from their third album, "Let's Get Out of this Country," switched between static shots of Campbell's pout and a pair of dancers moving dynamically through a colorful shopping wonderland. The music correspondingly yearns as a soap opera organ interjects sorrowful interludes.

Camera Obscura somehow manages to present all of this weepy sweetness while remaining consistently fun to listen to. The arrangements are all tight, simple and effective, and the production is big and heavy on the reverb.

The music may be a comment on the blandness of pop music love, but it is still the visceral and emotional experience it ought to be. The cloying sense of insincerity is betrayed by a beautifully lush sound, structured cleverly and concisely.

And, perhaps since Campbell's compositions are so perfectly simple in structure, Camera Obscura's live performances tend not to deviate too far from the studio recordings. So there will be no noisy freak-outs or self-indulgent feedback to be found here – nothing but the good stuff.

Opening for Camera Obscura will be Papercuts (all the way from San Francisco, Calif.), who have an indie-pop sensibility similar to the headliners. They are touring in support of their new album, "You Can Have What You Want," which has been drawing warm reviews and comparisons to Grizzly Bear and Beach House.

In an interview on ABC earlier this year, Tracyanne Campbell admitted to struggling with massive stage fright – so if you do go see the show tonight, try to be as nice as the music. Tickets are $18 at the door, which opens at 8:30 p.m.

Deadheads hit NoHo

By John Shaver
Collegian Correspondent

Northampton was alive Friday night as renowned cover band Dark Star Orchestra brought the Grateful Dead back to western Massachusetts. With the Donna Jean Godchaux Band and Jeff Mattson as their opener, the night was filled with sounds of music flashbacks.

Donna Jean appeared on stage and played a short set, its small backing band jostling to grab the attention of the few people who had begun to file into the club. The majority of those in the venue were at the bars or trying to get through the mob to the will call table. Donna's band began the set with a Loretta Lynn cover, but quickly seemed to lose their bearings. Jeff Mattson, the lead guitarist for Godchaux's band and Dark Star Orchestra, was very quiet throughout and ended his five-song set with "Mighty High" while Lisa Mackey from Dark Star Orchestra followed suit with backing vocals. A few people broke out in scattered applause for her performance but by and large, most seemed happy that she was done.

Dark Star Orchestra then made their debut, the lights dimmed and a cloud rose in the air, as the crowd made their way to their seats. Opening with "Dark Star," the Grateful Dead cover band followed with "St. Stephen" and unlike the previous band, the fans seemed to love it. As they got through the classic Dead tune, the energy of the Calvin Theatre rose and kept rising until they finished the first set. An unexpected song choice came midway through the first set with the Jerry Garcia tune "I'll Be With Thee." The excitement hit a crescendo, a peak of magnificent highs and sensational vibes before closing it with "Mighty Quinn," a quaint ditty that did not fail to rouse the spirits of a crowd already swept up in excellent cheer.

The bar and the nearby seating area buzzed with energy after the set. The morale of the general population in the Calvin Theatre seemed much better after Dark Star's first set than after the Donna Jean Godchaux Band's set. After a decently long set break, they came back fining in the second set with the first two tracks off of the album "Blues for Allah" from 1975. They started out with the funky "Help On the Way" with Jeff Mattson delivering his best performance of the entire show. Mattson's counterpart from the opening band, Donna Jean, came out to give some real authentic Grateful Dead vocals. They went into the jam "Slipknot" and then erupted into the Dead classic, "Franklin's Tower." Godchaux came back out for this tune, giving Dark Star Orchestra five vocalists for the choruses as well as the crowd who was going crazier than any other part of the show.

Dark Star Orchestra went into the tune "Cryptical Envelopment," and the Calvin started to calm down a little bit. Dino English and Rob Koritz went into an extended drumming and synthesizer jam, which came to an end as the rest of the band rejoined them and went into the "Spanish Jam." After a significant length of time of instrumental songs, they went into "The Other One" and finished "Cryptical Envelopment."

They started to tease the crowd with a possible "Brokedown Palace," but then went into the slow and steady "Sing Me Back Home." The band then played "One More Saturday Night." This bluesy tune made the Calvin go absolutely crazy.

They left the stage and thanked Northampton for their hospitality. Many lighters went up in the air all across the Calvin as the house lights stayed low and the stage was lit in blue. Dark Star Orchestra came out again for one last song. They ended their show with "Let it Rock" by Chuck Berry, a song the Jerry Garcia Band used to play once in a while. This old-time rock 'n' roll song got the crowd going for one last time until they said goodbye for the night.

The buzz after the show was not only for the Dark Star Orchestra's performance, but also that the band announced their tour for early 2010, including a gig at the University of Massachusetts' Mullins Center on Saturday, Feb. 19., which will include members of the original Grateful Dead line up, Bob Weir and Phil Lesh.

The night was filled with classic Dead tunes and good times had by all. UMass student Nikki Escalada said that this show was much more entertaining than the night after in Lowell, Mass. "The night was awesome," Escalada said. "People raged to the set harder in Northampton than in Lowell. The whole night was great."

men's side, followed by Boston College's 751 points, just 10 ahead of UMass ahead of UMass.

"We should have had second [placed]," said men's coach Russ Yarworth, "but we left some points on the deck."

The final race of the day, the 400-yard freestyle relay by juniors Chris Howard and Trevor Ziegler, freshman Pete Sacco and senior Juan Moliere shipped the men from second to third on a disqualification.

"They just had a bad exchange," Yarworth said. "Howard came in too slow and Ziegler jumped out too fast."

"We left some points in the pool and on the deck," Yarworth said about that relay and Joey Shordon's 400-yard individual medley disqualification.

Shordon, however, also had three top-three finishes. He and freshman Jorge Fortun took first and third in the 200-yard freestyle, with times of 1:40.93 and 1:42.24, respectively. Fortin also placed second in the 100-yard backstroke (50.81), just ahead of fellow Minuteman, senior Andrew Willbrant (51.72) and three spots ahead of fifth-place Ziegler (52.64). Willbrant and sophomore Kyle Jennings took fourth and fifth in the 200-yard backstroke by finishing two-hundredths of a second apart (1:53.42 and 1:53.44, respectively).

Shordon also had a second-place 500-yard freestyle (4:31.63) and a third-place finish in the 1650-yard freestyle (15:54.34).

Moliere's bronze showing (20.72) in the 50-yard freestyle topped an event in which five Minutemen placed in the top eight.

Junior Brian Schmidt earned second in the 100-yard (58.20) and third in the 200-yard breaststroke (2:10.86), and Ziegler and Moliere came in together at third and fourth (46.24 and 46.26) in the 100-yard freestyle.

Senior Michael Berthaume earned two top-five finishes, with third place in the 100-yard (49.95) and fourth place in the 200-yard butterfly (1:54.64).

"We swam better than expected, with kids popping off best times," Yarworth said.

Meanwhile, at Harvard, sophomore Jason Cook continued to win in a season of victories. In the one-meter, Cook rode a final round score of 343.45 to a final score of 639.55 and a first-place spot. Juniors John Clark and Adam Duffield and sophomore Conor Dunn took fifth through seventh behind Cook.

"I just went out there and enjoyed the guys," Cook said, adding that he is beginning to work on new dives to improve his performance this season.

Cook and Duffield earned a one-two finish in the three-meter event, with final scores of 740.15 and 621.05, respectively.

Sophomore Hannah Swift led the women's side with a 474.60, fifth-place showing in the one-meter dive.

The diving teams travel to Lewisburg, Pa., for the Bucknell Invitational on Dec. 4-6. On Dec. 5, the men's swimmers will be in New Haven, Conn., to face Yale, and the women will head back to Boston to race Northeastern University.

The UMass men's swimming and diving team placed third over the weekend. The diving team is next in action at the Bucknell Invitational, while the swimming team faces Yale.

Freshman Terrell Vinson attacks the basket against Cornell. The forward has started all three games for UMass this season and scored 14 points to beat Arkansas-Fort Smith.

emphasized that although he's going to have to deal with mistakes early on, the expectations aren't going to be any lower.

"I need a lot of these young [players] to step up and maybe be better than they're supposed to be early on," Kellogg said.

To some respect, he's gotten flashes of how good his freshmen can be in UMass' first three games of the season.

After struggling in his first game against Central Florida, forward Terrell Vinson put up double figures in the Minutemen's two-game stretch against Cornell and Arkansas-Fort Smith.

He has started all three games this season and recently showed Kellogg that he can play away from the basket as well as inside.

Javorn Farrell is a player who Kellogg knows isn't the most talented out of his freshmen, but is still a leader in practice and has a work ethic that he hopes will catch onto the rest of them. He's been praised for his maturity because he doesn't get nervous over games and his comfort on the court.

However, Farrell feels the problem with the newcomers as a whole is that while they all play hard at certain times, it's not at a level of consistency that it takes to win games, and that includes himself.

"I feel that we all play at a certain amount of intensity at certain times but I feel like we all need to play with a high level of intensity at all times, which is a lot of intensity," Farrell said.

Guard Freddie Riley ran into this problem earlier in the season. Kellogg often criticized Riley's lack of shot selection and his intensity on defense.

In the first game of the season against UCF, Riley scored 12 points, but went 4-for-11 on plenty of tough shots.

He has since shown flashes of the type of player Kellogg hopes he can become with his ability to drive to the basket. During UMass' current home stretch, Riley has done a better job of making the extra pass and taking fewer shots.

Now Riley feels that he needs to make strives defensively before he becomes the type of college basketball player he hopes to be.

"At first it was tough getting adjusted to all the strength and the speed and everything but now I think I'm fitting in well," Riley said prior to the game against the Big Red.

The Minutemen are just days away from heading to Atlantic City, N.J., where they are guaranteed to play Rutgers and either Florida or Michigan State in perhaps their toughest game of the season.

Kellogg knows his young team is going to be tested there and for the rest of the season, but he feels that as long as the younger players continue to work hard, his patience will pay off.

"When you have a great attitude and have some God-given ability, and you've worked at it, you're going to be a good player at some point," Kellogg said.

UVM faces brutal schedule

fully it carries over to define who we are. We just have to be able to stay ready for whatever is thrown our way over the course of the evening."

Like the team's recently lowered rankings, the Catamounts' low standings in Hockey East statistics aren't something that gives pause to Cahoon, who is preparing for a team that has been consistently competitive in the conference in recent years.

"Vermont is a very disciplined team and they stick to a game plan," Cahoon said. "They play start to finish. If you don't break that rhythm they get into, then they can really shut an opponent down. Very defensive oriented, they manage to work real hard to score their goals. They have great goaltending and they're particularly tough to play at home."

Where the Minutemen appear to have a legitimate advantage, though, is on the power play.

The man advantage has been the weapon of choice for the UMass offense so far this season, with the Minutemen converting 26.5 percent of the time.

Though not as potent as earlier in the season when it was scoring upwards of 30 percent of the time, the UMass power play will be a major factor against a Vermont team that ranks dead last in the conference in power play scoring and net goals with its special teams. In the season, the Catamounts have scored only five goals in 41 power-play chances.

The Vermont penalty kill has also been suspect, surrendering goals on 23.5 percent of opportunities. UMass, meanwhile, has killed 82.4 percent of penalties this season, including 17 of the last 18.

Maine hands UMass second home loss

By Herb Scribner
Collegian Staff

In the two back-to-back overtime games that the Massachusetts men's club hockey team competed in this weekend, one resulted in a win and the other in a loss.

Maine handed the Minutemen (13-3-0) a 4-3 loss at the Mullins Center, marking the second loss on home ice for UMass. The Black Bears (7-6-0) maintained the Minutemen offense which has been active this season.

"We learned from it, and we're going to move on from there," UMass coach Robert Talloni said.

Maine dominated the first period of play, scoring two goals within the first nine minutes. UMass came right back, however, with two goals scored by assistant captain Julian Maleski and defender Craig Charest. The third period brought more scores, as Maine netted one right after the break.

As assistant captain Reed Powers skated up towards the goal, he noticed teammate Christian McCracken up ahead. With a swift pass, Powers gained an assist as McCracken netted the tying goal for UMass, sending the game into overtime.

"He was able to rifle a shot that got right past the goalie," Talloni said. "He's got a flat shot that hits 110 miles per hour."

In the overtime period of play, Maine successfully scored the last goal to win the contest.

"They had fast-skating players, maybe a little bit shorter, not a whole lot of weight, but they're fast and their work ethic was very good," Talloni said.

Captain Alec Goolsby, who leads the Minutemen in goals scored, did not find the back of net in the game. The same could be said for senior Reed Powers who also failed to provide any goals, despite being the second-leading goal scorer on the team.

"There are no excuses, they beat us fair and square," Talloni said. "We wish it would have went the other way, but they got to that loose puck a little quicker than we could."

The night prior, UMass earned a successful victory in an extra period of play in its 5-4 win over Bryant.

Minutemen forward Chris Stella put UMass on the board with a goal nine minutes into the game. After the Bulldogs (4-6-0) scored a goal of their own, Stella netted another score to retain the Minutemen lead.

Bryant then went on a tear, scoring two goals before half-time. Forty seconds after the half-time break, Maleski was able to score a goal to tie up the game.

"We're very proud of the way he plays, his skill level, his rank as captain and the way he handles the team," Talloni said. "He's a great person."

Five minutes passed before Bryant scored another goal to regain the lead, which was once again lost after forward Nicholas Crowley assisted Cusano with the much-needed goal. With neither team attaining a lead, the game was sent to overtime.

"They [Crowley, Cusano] saved the game for us, they got us into overtime," Talloni said. "When you go into overtime, anything can happen. We knew if we could get into overtime we could win."

With less than a minute left in the extra period, Cusano passed the puck to Matthew Coughlin who scored the game-winning goal for UMass.

"It looked like a hullet," Talloni said.

The Minutemen will take a two week break from play, before setting up the Mullins Center for Military Appreciation night on Dec. 4. UMass will compete against the United States Coast Guard before returning to regular season play the following night, where it will take on Connecticut for the first time this year.

UMass' Javorn Farrell drives into the lane against Cornell in the home opener for the Minutemen. The freshman has played well this season, averaging 3.7 points and 3.3 rebounds per game in 13 minutes off the bench.

UMass seeks a second victory

By David Brinch
Collegian Staff

Massachusetts basketball coach Derek Kellogg and the rest of the Minutemen will have a lot to be thankful for with a victory over St. Francis College tonight at the Mullins Center at 7 p.m.

UMass is coming off a 94-68 victory over Division II Arkansas-Forth Smith, their first win of the season, and Kellogg could be even happier with back-to-back wins heading into the Legends Classic Championship over the weekend, where they will face Rutgers on Friday and either Michigan State or Florida on Saturday.

"I love coaching these guys and I love being around them, it's just hard when you have so many young guys and inexperienced players," Kellogg said.

Redshirt junior guard Anthony Gurley paced the Minutemen (1-2) with 21 points off the bench against the Lions while adding a career-high five assists, while senior guard Ricky Harris had 18.

"Anthony really gave us a great boost when we were a little bit stagnant in the first half," Kellogg said. "Ricky was making some decent plays, but when he's not in the game or scoring, who else do you go to, and Anthony gave us the boost that we really need from him, and he did it kind of within the context of the offense."

Freshman Freddie Riley also provided a lift off the bench, adding 17 points, including going 4-of-9 from 3-point range. The Minutemen will look to capitalize off a still winless Terrier (0-3) team that is coming off a 10-point loss to Canisius College on Saturday after falling to Boston College, 72-44, on Nov 17.

The Terriers were picked to finish seventh out of 12 teams in the Northeast Conference, and have a lot of veteran leadership in forward Nigel Byam and center Herman Wrice. However, Kellogg realizes how long the road is for his young team, and will not look past the match-up with the Terriers, who only have one freshman on their team, while the Minutemen have five and two transfers.

"We obviously have a long way to go, and until we get to where there are no defensive breakdowns and we take care of the basketball every time on offense, we'll be a work in progress," Kellogg said. "But I do see some signs that this team is going to, at some point, and who knows really when, do some good things."

After sitting out the first two games for violating team rules, the Terriers welcomed back junior guard Ricky Cadell, who was suspended for two games for violating team rules. Cadell earned Second Team All-Northeast Conference honors after averaging 15.3 points and 3.4 assists per game. Cadell led the team with 22 points against the Golden Griffins. The Minutemen will want to pressure Cadell into taking bad shots and generate scoring from center Sean Carter and Terrell Vinson.

Through their first three games, the Terriers have been outscored a total of 219-177, and average a total of 16.7 turnovers per game.

Along with Cadell, the Terriers are led by Akirm Bennett, who is averaging 18.5 points per game, along with seven rebounds and four and a half steals per contest. After taking on the Minutemen, the Terriers will open their NEC schedule against Central Connecticut State on Dec. 3 after taking on Colgate Nov. 28.

Freshmen already maturing

By Adam Miller
Collegian Staff

When it comes to putting together a basketball team, inexperience cuts two ways. On one hand, a coach knows that there is plenty of time to get the new players accustomed to the system and there is usually plenty of promise.

On the other hand, there are plenty of frustrating moments the coach has to go through before that promise turns into productivity.

Such is the case with the Massachusetts men's basketball team.

UMass coach Derek Kellogg brought in five freshmen through recruiting, all of whom are versatile and capable of playing multiple positions. He feels that all of his new players are capable of accomplishing a lot, but they have much progress to make before getting there.

"These guys have been recruited and are good players, but it's going to take a little bit of time for them to realize how hard you have to play," Kellogg said following the Minutemen's exhibition win over Dowling.

One of Kellogg's projects is Raphiael Putney, a 6-foot-8 inch forward listed at 180 pounds, although he said he is actually 20 pounds lighter. In fact, Putney hopes that he can push 175 by the end of the season after going through his current diet and weight program.

Kellogg believes that Putney could be great for his team's offense once he puts on the weight, which he sees as something that will happen naturally as he moves through his college career.

"Sometimes the maturation of coming to college for those kids is that they put on some weight," Kellogg said.

Putney has yet to see a minute of action during the regular season and may end up redshirting while he takes a year to mature.

The four other newcomers are having a chance to perform often during the season. Since the start of the preseason, Kellogg

UM travels to face Vermont

By Nick O'Malley

Coming off of its overtime win against then-No. 9 Yale, the Massachusetts hockey team looks to continue its hot streak and close the two-point lead held by New Hampshire and Boston College atop the Hockey East standings.

The No. 11 Minutemen (8-2-0, 6-2-0 HEA) enter the matchup against the No. 18 Catamounts, who dropped in the USCHO national rankings this week after splitting last weekend's series with Boston College, winning four out of their last five games and climbing in the rankings.

However, for UMass coach Don Cahoon, rankings are not a big factor heading into Tuesday's game or any matchup.

"Every team we play is capable of beating us and we're capable of beating anybody we play," Cahoon said. "Rankings don't really have a lot to do with how the game is played out. [Vermont] is a good team, but so is every team we play."

Statistically, the Catamounts (4-4-1, 3-3-1 HEA) are far from the most dazzling team on UMass' schedule. Vermont currently ranks seventh in the conference in scoring offense (3.00) and eighth in scoring defense (3.44), scoring 0.70 less goals per game than the Minutemen while giving up almost over a goal more per game.

What the statistics fail to show, though, is the grueling schedule that Vermont has played up until this point. After opening up the season with back-to-back games against then-No. 1 Denver and splitting the series, the Catamounts notched a win over then-No. 14 Boston College to start off a string of seven-straight conference games in which they went 3-3-1.

Six of Vermont's nine games this season have been against ranked opponents, including three games against BC and a tie against then-No. 8 UMass-Lowell. UMass, on the other hand, has played just two ranked opponents so far this season, winning games against then-No. 2 BU and last week's win against Yale.

Cahoon isn't letting his team get complacent with the recent wins, though, as he and the Minutemen focus on the Catamounts.

"Last game is last game," Cahoon said. "It's nice that we played as hard as we did and determined as we did, and hope-

UMass celebrates after scoring a goal at the Mullins Center. The Minutemen face their second straight nationally ranked opponent tonight.

Minutemen look to continue road success

By Jay Asser
Collegian Staff

With two nationally ranked opponents on the schedule for Thanksgiving week, the Massachusetts hockey team will look to continue its success on the road against Vermont at Gutterson Fieldhouse on Tuesday night.

Leaving with a 4-3 overtime win over then-No. 9 Yale at Ingalls Rink in their last contest, the No. 10 Minutemen are now 3-0 away from home this season. The two previous victories for UMass (8-2, 4-2 Hockey East) were against Providence and Niagara.

UMass coach Don Cahoon isn't concerned with the success his team has had on the road and is focused on the game, not the venue.

"It's good to win just in general," Cahoon said. "I don't think we're going to get into counting the numbers. We have one game to play and we have to be ready to take care of business."

After beginning the year with seven of their first 10 games in the friendly confines of the Mullins Center, the schedule will even out for the Minutemen, playing their next eight games on the road, including five games against Hockey East opponents.

The UMass offense, which ranks eighth in the nation, averages over four goals per game, while allowing nearly three scores away from home.

Though the No. 18 Catamounts (4-4-1, 3-3-1 HEA) are toting a .500 record, they are 2-0-1 in the few games they've played on their own ice this season. Last year, Vermont was tough at home as well, holding a 9-6-4 record.

Two of the three opponents the Catamounts have faced at home have been nationally ranked teams. Against then-No. 12 Boston College, Vermont handed the Eagles (5-3-2, 4-3-2 HEA) their worst loss of the year in their season opener. The Catamounts battled with then-No. 8 UMass-Lowell, coming away with a 3-3 tie in the River Hawks' (8-2-1, 4-1-1 HEA) only draw this year.

Catamounts rested

Along with home ice, Vermont will have the advantage of being fully rested with a nine-day hiatus since its last game against BC.

The Minutemen have not had more than five days off between games since October and have dealt with injuries all season, although they are finally healthy and at full strength now.

Cahoon isn't so sure that the extra days off for the Catamounts will be beneficial as much as it could slow Vermont down.

"I don't know if it's an advantage to not play for nine days, as opposed to being out of rhythm," he said. "It's hard to get into game rhythm and it's something that could sometimes take a little while when you haven't played in a couple weeks."

Braun filling stat sheet

After Will Ortiz and Michael Lecomte had their four game point streaks snapped against Yale last week, Justin Braun is the only UMass skater with an active streak heading into the matchup with the Catamounts.

Though he is one of the conference's top defenseman, the senior boasts a strong offensive game, adding to the bevy of talented defensemen for UMass.

"We have some defensemen that jump into the play, and I think that's a product of system of play and also a product of their skill level," Cahoon said.

In his last four contests, Braun has recorded three assists and a goal, leading the Minutemen to a 3-1 record over that span.

Braun is one of three UMass skaters with double-digit points with 11 this season.

"He always does a good job for us and I think he's raised his level a bit as he's had to do a little more," Cahoon said. "We just encourage him to be as good as he can be and he's a great college player."

82 UM buildings deemed historic

Munson Hall has benefited from its official status as a historical asset of the Commonwealth, since it has been able to avoid certain modifications. This is the first part in a three-part series examining the recent fate of historic buildings on the University of Massachusetts campus.

University and preservation group work to identify assets

By Michael Phillis
Collegian Staff

Eighty-two new University of Massachusetts buildings have been added to Massachusetts' "Inventory of Archaeological and Historic Assets of the Commonwealth" list – raising the total number of UMass buildings on this list to 105, according to Preserve UMass, a group that advocates for the preservation of historic architecture on campus.

The firm Finhorn Yafee Prescott, which documented all buildings on the UMass campus that were 50 years old or older, completed the historical survey in partnership with the University.

According to Jim Cahill, director of Facilities and Campus Planning at UMass, the survey cost less than $200,000, and was completed to give a current assessment of the University's historic assets.

UMass is regularly involved in new construction, renovation, repair and demolition, and renovating of buildings on campus.

This historical survey is meant to act as a professional assessment of the historical value of structures that are subject to this process.

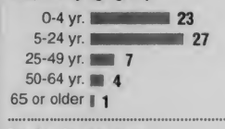
Free H1N1 vaccines to be offered this week

University Health Services and the town of Amherst will be hosting free walk-in H1N1 flu vaccination clinics beginning this week. The first clinic will take place Wednesday, Dec. 2, from noon until 6 p.m. at the University of Massachusetts Campus Center Auditorium. A second clinic will follow on Saturday, Dec. 12 from 11 a.m. to 2 p.m. at the Bangs Community Center, located at 70 Boltwood Walk, Amherst.

The clinics will be open to those ages 6 months to 65, and will be provided at no cost while vaccination supplies last.

The Centers for Disease Control and the Massachusetts Department of Public Health have recommended vaccination for everyone in the virus' target groups, including those who have had a recent flu-like illness. However, anyone who is currently ill and has a fever cannot be vaccinated. For more information about what groups are most at risk, see the graph to the right.

Forms and information will be available at the door, but to save time at either of the clinics, one can plan ahead of time. First, download the registration form and vaccine information from www.umass.edu/uhs or www.amherstma.gov. Then, photocopy both sides of your insurance card.



Be sure to bring the completed form, your insurance card and card copies to the clinic.

Food Bus Drive starts

Beginning today, students can donate canned goods at the front of UMass Transit Services buses. All proceeds will go to the Amherst Survival Center.

The University of Massachusetts Transit Services has announced that it will sponsor its second-annual Food Bus Drive beginning Nov. 30.

Collection bins will be placed near the front of all UMass Transit Services buses, and will remain there between 7 a.m. and 5 p.m. Food donations must be canned goods or other non-perishable food items.

All proceeds will be donated to the Amherst Survival Center.

The donation drive began last year when UMass bus drivers came up with the idea.

UMass Transit Services collected some 350 pounds in 2008, according to a UMass news and media relations press release.

The Survival Center has been in existence since 1976, offering a variety of programs to give residents what the group's site calls "basic needs."

The center's free services include a food pantry, a soup kitchen, a drop-in health clinic, a free store and other basic functions. The organization's site says the center serves more than 3,000 people a year.

The drive ends Friday, Dec. 18. The Amherst Survival Center is located at 1200 North Pleasant Street for those interested in donating or volunteering.

Amherst Police Dept. receives $17,000 grant

New funds will be put toward equipment and radar units

By Nick Bush
Collegian Staff

Amherst Police Chief Scott P. Livingstone announced on Tuesday, Nov. 24 that the Amherst Police Department has been named the recipient of a $17,000 grant from the federal Executive Office of Public Safety and Security's Highway Safety Division.

The grant is intended to fund law enforcement agencies in their efforts to provide staff for ongoing motor vehicle programs, including "Click it or Ticket," and "Over the Limit, Under Arrest."

Amherst Police suggested that the money will be put towards the purchase of safety equipment (including public awareness signs for traffic safety), speed monitoring radar units and modern accident reconstruction equipment.

The funding comes at a time when law enforcement agencies across the country are working to minimize the effect of the global economic downturn on their continuing initiatives, despite massive budget cuts in nearly every community.

The grant also likely reflects the large student driver population of the town, which has unique consequences on the task faced by law enforcement.

"As we struggle with budget challenges and substantial reductions in state and federal

Local EDMC brings the party to the Valley

Electronic Dance Music Community garners rave reviews and a successful track record

By Sam Butterfield
Collegian Staff

Sometimes it's hard just to dance. That, at least, is the philosophy of the University of Massachusetts Electronic Dance Music Community (EDMC), which formed several years ago to let electronica lovers across the area groove at their hearts' and the music's thumping tunes.

According to founding member and co-leader of the Community Adam Liderman, the group began as a collection of EDM (Electronic Dance Music) lovers in the area, but evolved over time to fill what the group's members felt was a void in the Pioneer Valley's electronic dance scene.

"UMass EDMC's purpose quickly evolved into filling what, at the time, was, and still is to a certain extent, a gap in the Five College music scene," Liderman said by e-mail. "Additionally, we were one of the group sought to arrange events that would allow those not of drinking age to attend."

The Community is student-operated and includes members from all of the Five Colleges and other schools across the state. Liderman said that the group now boasts 620 group members.

As the lawyers' ranks swelled, the group's leaders realized the time had come to move on from house parties featuring house music to a bigger venue.

"As the parties grew larger, the need for a legitimate venue rose," said Liderman.

In April 2008, the party went legitimate, as the Community passed away at Diva's in Northampton with its first-ever party at a club, conveniently labeled PULSE, which drew some 300 eager rock-and-rollers.

After PULSE's raging success, the group has gained more and more clout since throwing 10 more parties at Diva's, in what has now turned into a monthly Five College event. The group continues to throw house parties in the area, as well.

Liderman elaborated that he and other members of the group now work to promote their parties, which he believes accounts for the increase in myelsewhere.

PULSE is now the Community's smallest bash, still drawing about 300, while the group's largest source, RISE, has risen in status to include 700 attendees.

UMass EDMC's events are strictly 18-plus and have attracted sponsorship from a variety of pro-dance organizations such as Roxy Styles Lingerie, Rockstar energy drinks, Red Bull and CampusLIVE.com.

Liderman said that the Community is not only a body for planning dance parties, but is also something of a social network for sharing information between would-be partiers.

"The UMass EDMC group operates as both an event planning body as well as a board where members inform others of upcoming parties and music," he said.

The group says it does not work to promote third-parties' interests but instead is strictly an organization for planning epic dance gatherings. The body's Facebook page speaks to that effect, printing in its mission statement that "there are no upcoming DJs or amateur record labels trying to push their product here; this group is solely an attempt to organize all of those who love Electronic Dance Music (EDM) in the Five College area."

The group also stresses that it hopes to create a lively community of electronica-enjoyers centered on just that: a common love of techno, rather than social status or trendiness.

"We want to create an online community," according to the group's online mission statement, "don't add this group like a notch on your belt of humorous or fashionable groups."

"We are trying establish a real community in which people can find others who love the same music you do; we want members to spark up conversations, exchange pictures from past parties or events, perhaps even get some people together to meet up at an upcoming show," the statement goes on.

Lastly, the Community hopes to function as a central portal for those in on the Five College area's electronic element.

"As you all know, the dry nightlife situation at UMass could use a group to put on some proper events," the mission statement continues, "we want to create a place where all lovers of EDM can come to and call home, be they incoming freshman looking to connect or past graduates looking to stay in the loop."

One might have been able to blink and miss any of the group's parties thus far, but probably not the next event they will put on – titled BLINK, and set for Dec. 4 at Diva's.

The UMass Materials Research Science and Engineering Center is now accepting applications from high school students interested in getting laboratory experience working with polymers.

The University of Massachusetts Materials Research Science and Engineering Center (MRSEC) is accepting applications from high school students interested in gaining first-hand laboratory research experience.

The Center will give the students the opportunity to work on polymer research in the lab in the 11th year of the ASPIRE program, which will start next January and February.

The program consists of a series of experiments and laboratory-based discussions conducted by UMass graduate students in the Polymer Science and Engineering Program designed for high school students.

ASPIRE meets for five straight Saturdays, with this year's session kicking off Jan. 9 and concluding Feb. 13.

According to the ASPIRE page on the Polymer Science and Engineering website, the program's goal is to give high school students introductions to various disciplines of science they would not be exposed to in the classroom.

Students who wish to enroll in the program need a recommendation from a local high school science teacher, and space is limited to 15 students per year.

The department advises students and their families who wish to participate in the ASPIRE course to attend the department's once-monthly outreach lecture, which is given for kindergarten through grade 12 students, to get an introduction to the department and learn about its functions.

Seniors are given highest priority for enrollment, but juniors and sophomores may also apply to participate.

Application forms can be found on the program's website at Pse.umass.edu academics programs_courses aspire.html, and can be faxed to Greg Dabrowski, ASPIRE and Outreach advisor, at 413-545-0082.

History embedded in the walls of UMass

Old Chapel is the only building on the UMass campus to make the United States Department of the Interior's national registry of historic sites.

Constructed between 1885 and 1886, South College occupies a prominent site on campus across from the DuBois library, and could require such a large amount of funding to bring up to date that it has been targeted for possible demolition.

UMass. Larson was a wildlife biology professor at UMass, and retired in 2000.

"In 2007, the University published a booklet, of what they called 'legacy buildings' on campus," Larson said. "They had a chart showing which ones were slated to be repaired and which ones were going to be torn down."

Larson and Preserve UMass, however, thought that the assessment did not properly take into account the value of historic architecture on campus.

According to Larson, "[decisions] were being made by people who didn't have any training in the background [of historical architecture]."

What Larson and Preserve UMass began advocating for in 2007 was that a professional assessment of historical assets should be a part of the debate when deciding which buildings to keep and which to tear down.

In a September 2008 article in The Bond Buyer, a daily newspaper which covers public finance, Chief Financial Officer of the UMass Building Authority Steve Dansby said, "We're looking forward to a fairly aggressive next five years worth of improving the infrastructure of the University and taking care of some of the deferred maintenance issues."

As the new construction was set to break ground, decisions concerning which buildings to keep and which ones to let deteriorate became important.

For any of the 105 buildings now on the state's list, the University must file its construction plans with the Massachusetts Historical Commission before breaking ground.

Once the University files its plans with the state, the two parties negotiate what should be done to remedy the loss of the historical asset. Not all historic assets are created equal, however.

"Every building doesn't have the same historical significance ... There are some things that make some buildings more historically significant than others and that is one things that this survey is attempting to identify."
–Facilities Director Jim Cahill

"Every old building doesn't have the same historical significance," Cahill said. "There are some things that make some buildings more historically significant than others and that is one thing that this survey is attempting to identify."

"University Apartments is a good example," Larson noted. "That set of buildings is on the inventory because it is 50 years old. Nobody is going to complain about it being torn down."

If the building is of a higher value, the negotiation might result in UMass, for example, fixing a roof.

The University did this for Wilder Hall, going as far as Indonesia to get the right tile because that building is the "first building in the United States to be built as an academic landscape architecture program," according to Larson.

Legally, there is little protection for any of the buildings at UMass other than the regulation that UMass must file its plans and negotiate with the state.

Having buildings documented professionally allows institutions like UMass to advocate for their survival because their historical significance is officially on record.

Larson helped Einhorn Yafee Prescott do some of the research for the survey. A "Form B" is produced for each building that meets the only criteria required for a building to be on the list: age.

Each form has past and present pictures of the building, historical information, and a history of the University in brief.

The Form B for the "Art Barn," a house-like structure on campus that was built in 1911 shows Larson's input most prominently.

The description of the structure's history says, "Although now known as the Art Barn, the building continued to have a research-related function until at least the 1960s, when the basement contained a live beaver collection by... Joseph S. Larson."

One of the options on the Form B is to nominate the structure to a national registry of historic sites maintained by the Department of the Interior.

Buildings can be nominated as a group or individually. Only one building on the UMass campus has made the national list by itself: the Old Chapel.

Fifty-four buildings have been recommended for the national list as a historic district, meaning that their significance together reaches the national level.

Having a building on the national list raises the negotiating power of the state, according to Larson.

Money is always a factor. Some projects can or cannot be done on campus because of constraints with the budget.

There are some small code exemptions that can be granted if a building is on the state list.

"Munson Hall is an example," Larson said. "Under the state public access law, the front of the building would have had to have wheelchair access ramp provisions."

The state gave UMass a waiver so that they did not have to build wheelchair accessibility onto Munson Hall because they would have, "destroyed the character of the building."

According to the Building Condition report, the costs to keep up some of the buildings are high.

One high-cost project that the University had classified as "dispose and replace," in the 2007 report was South College, an old brick building across from the W.E.B. DuBois library.

According to South College's Form B, the building was constructed between 1885 and 1886, and housed classrooms, administrative offices for deans, provosts, and even Henry Hill Goodell's president's office.

The UMass administration's 2007 report said that South College renovations mainly needed to update fire codes, coming in at approximately $15.5 million.

According to the recent survey, "South College occupies a prominent site on the campus upon which a new structure would serve better the academic program."

Larson and Preserve UMass says they are looking to find "common ground."

In cases where a building with high historic value, such as South College, may be demolished by the University, Larson believes that the historic assessment allows these kinds of decisions to be made professionally by people that understand historic assets.

"Now whether a building is significant or not has been decided upon by a professional assessment," said Larson.

Michael Phillis can be reached at mphillis@student.umass.edu.

(Editor's Note: This is the first part in a three-part series examining the recent fate of historic buildings on the University of Massachusetts campus.

The next two articles will be published in print and on DailyCollegian.com on subsequent days, beginning Wednesday, December 2 and continuing on Thursday, December 3.)

grant funding, we are fortunate to be awarded this grant," said Chief Livingstone in a press release Tuesday.

We are committed to the safety of this community and will continue to be diligent about educating the public about safe driving, especially seatbelt usage."

According to the press release, in the fiscal year 2009 the Amherst Police Department issued 144 citations or warnings to persons for not wearing seatbelts, including eight for improperly restrained children.

Amherst Police also criminally charged 124 persons with operating a vehicle under the influence of alcohol, with 11 of those persons being charged for the second or subsequent time. Last year, the APD handed out a total of 5,686 motor vehicle citations, with a total of 6,739 violations.

You don't usually expect to see a picture of your ex-girlfriend from high school on the front page of the paper, you really don't expect the headline next to her photo to read, "Is $300K the price tag of a 21-year-old?"

Through the article in the Daily Hampshire Gazette, I found out that University of Massachusetts senior Hannah Coler is suffering from a "potentially deadly autoimmune disease."

The problem is that her insurance does not cover the stem cell treatment that is covered by some other insurance companies. She is covered under the company UniCare. The treatment is estimated to cost $300,000.

Her father now has to try to figure out how to gain enough media attention to get the treatment for his daughter.

Whatever your opinion on health care, it is all too easy to forget that it deals with real people in life or death situations.

He has reached the point where he is asking for donations to raise the money for the procedure himself. According to the Gazette, he is thinking about suing UniCare but, with the possibility of litigation being drawn out, he is worried there won't be enough time.

Hannah's disease is described as progressing rapidly and she has a 50-50 chance of surviving the next five years. The disease, called diffuse scleroderma, makes the skin harder and then moves its way to the internal organs, hardening them as well.

The Gazette mentioned the attorney who is helping the Coler family, David Becker, who had the same disease and was helped by the same treatment that could be provided to Hannah, if the insurance company would pay for it.

In the end, this is what the health care debate comes down to. People like Hannah fighting to get care and being undercut by a deeply flawed system.

The insurance company made a decision that was based on the bottom line. Hannah's disease affects a small portion of one percent of the population and I can only assume the company decided that her treatment could be exempted, therefore saving them $300,000.

This is exactly what a death panel looks like. The company made a decision based on profits, the result of which could kill a UMass student.

The trial that Hannah was recommended for, "Scleroderma: Cyclophosphamide or Transplantation" (SCOT) received praise from Becker, "I think they should be providing coverage because this is medically necessary and potentially life changing." According to the article in the Gazette, when Becker needed the procedure done, his insurance paid for what he called a "medically necessary" procedure.

The insurance company replied to Hannah's request for coverage by saying in essence that the coverage was still experimental and not medically necessary.

Congress has been talking for months now and the public seems to be tiring of the debate. It is, however, important to keep in mind that this debate is not simply about policy but instead it is meant to alter an incredibly important and personal aspect of someone's life.

There are some good proposals embedded in the thousands of pages of legislation. No longer should you be able to be denied coverage because of a preexisting condition, drug prices should be negotiable. Most importantly, insurance companies desperately need regulation because they are dealing with people's lives directly.

Think the system is okay like it is now? Then there needs to be explanations for situations like the one in which Hannah is in. Right now, her disease is in the beginning stages. It's harder for her to move around the house, it is more difficult for her to play an instrument and she feels tired more often.

In all likelihood, life will only get more difficult for her as time progresses.

Whatever your opinion on health care, it is all too easy to forget that it deals with real people in life or death situations. Altering the debate in order to achieve political gain is intolerable; saying government wants to kill people because they are going to discuss end of life care with patients is unfounded; and making people believe that the other side is directly working against freedom is laughable. If people weren't so frequently making these kinds of charges allowing the uniformed to believe its misinformation.

Until some of this legislation is passed and people like Hannah are able to get the treatment of which there is much evidence could save their life, people will suffer and that suffering could be in the form of a 21-year-old UMass student living with a drastically shorter life expectancy than she could have had if she had been born with an extra $300,000.

In an email, Hannah said, "It's enough that we have to deal with these terrible diseases, but on top of that, we have to fight for treatment that could either relieve some symptoms or even halt the disease?! It's just ridiculous. I need to focus on my health, not on anything else."

Hannah had to receive news that most of us could not imagine having to live with. Adding to her situation is the fact that the bottom-line of an insurance company might mean the difference between whether she lives past five years or not.

Whatever your beliefs, people like Hannah should never be in the situation she must now face. In America, we take care of each other better than this.

'Tis the season for thefts

Alyssa Creamer

Unfortunately for several students living off-campus, as they went home for Thanksgiving break to slip into the bliss of turkey and stuffing-filled family fun, burglars were slipping into their empty apartments to steal everything of value.

An article written by AOL.com editor Tom Krazeutler in 2007 stated that the Federal Bureau of Investigation believes "400,000 burglaries occur between November and December each year."

College students are not left out of that statistic. It is logical to assume that since students are a known target for area thieves, their apartments become even more of a temptation during times when everyone knows they are packing up to spend the weekend at home for the holidays. Plus, young adults tend to be targets for robbers as they often have expensive electronics. Laptops, iPods and mini-dvd players aren't very difficult to bag or pocket, either.

That being said, being a University of Massachusetts student makes you less inclined to want to go home over break with all this talk of students' vulnerability to crime. So here is how a student can protect his or herself from being a victim.

My dad always says this weird phrase "A locked door keeps an honest man out." I think the punch line is that the potential scheming little thief remains (relatively) honest if you lock your doors. I mention something as sensible as locking doors not because a lot of students don't lock their doors, but because it matters if students are locking their doors with the right lock. It is a good idea to install a deadbolt into your front and back doors. Faced with a credit card, normal locks pop and fail to protect your possessions. When a deadbolt is faced with a credit card, the card quivers and snaps or something. Or well, you get the point. Deadbolt wins. And they aren't that expensive to install.

Another good idea for when housemates are all about to go home for the holidays is to let trusted neighbors know to keep an eye out for anything sketchy. If it had been snowing while you were away, it is also not a bad idea to offer to pay someone trustworthy to clear up the driveway a bit. That way, if a burglar sees a plowed entrance to the house, the dirty thief is less likely to assume the students have gone away.

It is unlikely the burglar will be holding your things ransom so that you can Jean-Claude Van Damme your way to him, beat him up and claim your prizes.

If you don't trust your neighbors because they are the sketchballs of the street, ask friends in the area to check things out every now and then. Maybe giving them a key just to have someone in the house at some point during the day might make thieves more wary about entering a house that doesn't seem as deserted as it really is.

Additionally, if you live in wooded sections of Amherst, ask the landlord if it'd be cool to place motion-activated lights around the front and back doors to your apartment. You could go all out and tag your windows with the sensors too. Your house could have so many, it might even look festive. Okay, so I'll drop the sarcasm, but in all seriousness, if you get rid of dark places for burglars to lurk in by lighting up your house, you're less likely to be broken into.

Another idea might be to record loud barking noises to go off your stereo at all times while you're away and place an obnoxiously large "Beware of Dog" sign on your window. And it's unnecessary to actually own a vicious watchdog. A person who thinks breaking into others' homes is a great idea, most likely isn't anyone wise enough to know you're lying but might be smart enough to know getting mauled by a dog isn't fun.

Say you just walked in after Thanksgiving, your house was broken into and half your treasures are gone. You're a victim, it's true, but there are a few smart measures you can take to try to get your things back.

It is unlikely the burglar will be holding your things ransom so that you can Jean-Claude Van Damme your way to him, beat him up and claim your prizes. Therefore, take inventory of the items that are missing on your house and try to remember any distinctive features about your possessions so that you can alert the cops to the robbery and what your former possessions consist of. Then for the next few months bookmark Ebay and Craigslist and watch over those sites to see if any of your stuff appears to be getting sold.

Getting your stuff stolen is already a terribly sad moment. If it happens to you, try not to be too down on yourself for not locking your doors. Society's bigger problems are the people who steal, not the people who become victims as a result of absentmindedness.

All I can say is that if this were a movie, UMass kids would catch the bad guys like Jean-Claude Van Damme does. He's the man.

The global warming fabrication situation

Alex Perry

The fun we've all been having pretending global warming exists may be coming to a close, after some of the most influential scientists and academies behind it have been caught discussing fudging data via e-mail to hide global cooling this past week.

For those unaware, last week, computer hackers obtained e-mails from the Climate Research Unit at the University of East Anglia. The authors of these e-mails are scientists and academics that have made a contribution to the world's climate change debate as they have worked with the U.N.'s Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change.

The global warming issue is not just a joke being thrown around at coffee shops by liberals with their Macintosh laptops.

The e-mails seemed to have a general theme; The authors involved know that the global warming argument is flimsy at best and they need to deceive others into buying their theory. One of the e-mails published by the Washington Post said outright, "We can't account for the lack of warming at the moment and it is a travesty that we can't."

The way that translates to me is: "There is global cooling going on and it's a shame because we have spent a lot of time and money trying to prove there is global warming."

There is plenty more in the e-mail bag where that came from. An e-mail published in a British Newspaper called The Guardian read, "I've just completed Mike's Nature (a science journal) trick of adding in the real temps to face each series for the last 20 years (from 1981 onwards) and from 1961 for Keith's to hide the decline."

That e-mail shows the burning desire these scientists have to keep the global warming myth going even though data shows, as I have written before, that the world is undergoing global cooling. They are trying to deceive us. They are even willing to use "tricks" in order to change data to better serve their purposes. This is not what scientists are supposed to be doing. Hiding data from other scientists or twisting data does not help researchers accomplish anything. But there is no evidence to suggest humans are causing climate change and these people know it, so this is what they have been doing.

We are all hurt by the actions of these scientists who continue to insist that the theory of global warming is factual. For one, we've all clearly been lied to. Global warming has been rammed down our throats for years in classrooms and in the media. Most people don't even consider it a theory anymore, it is simply accepted as reality. Even more importantly, liberal politicians also take man-made global warming as fact. We constantly hear warnings of the need to do something now or else the world is going to burn. Liberals are now making their best effort to help global warming enthusiasts.

I'm talking about the cap-and-trade bill that is going to be pushed by liberals in our government in the coming year. The bill is designed solely with the purpose of stopping man-made climate change. The plan is to use cap-and-trade to significantly reduce carbon emissions in this country because the current belief is that these carbon emissions are causing global warming. The problems with this though, are three-fold.

For one, carbon emissions haven't been proven to cause global warming. We know this because the earth is cooling while simultaneously the world's carbon emissions have risen. Second, the taxes that are going to be imposed via the current projected cap-and-trade bill amount to approximately $600 billion in higher energy taxes. During an economic downturn, families can hardly afford the price of electricity and gasoline, but that is precisely what would worsen as a consequence of this bill. In addition to this, if our government passes this bill but doesn't get the other nations around the world to agree to impose similar cap-and-trade rules, our already struggling domestic businesses will be put at yet another disadvantage in the global market. Outsourcing is entirely possible as a result of this bill if firms find that it will be cheaper to operate in other countries than it is in America. Our government forcing jobs to leave our shores is the last thing we need right now.

That's why the details from all of these e-mails matter. The global warming issue is not just a joke being thrown around at coffee shops by liberals with their Macintosh laptops. The belief in global warming has real world consequences because nations around the world are considering the creation of major laws to make sure humans are not causing climate change. If our government moves forward with a cap-and-trade bill, all of us are going to be hit with higher taxes every time we go to the pump and every time we flick a light switch. And for what? The science is flawed and everyone who is doing the research can see that – including the people who are pushing it on us. If global warming can't be proven, let's stop pretending it does.

You can't buy what's really important

If the idea of running to a mall to be one of the masses of pushing crowds, spending what has been projected to be $683 dollars apiece this holiday season leaves you cold, you have other options. You can join the protest of Buy Nothing Day.

Kathleen Broadhurst

The concept of Buy Nothing Day is simple. On a symbolic day, people across the country can opt out of consumerism. This year, as in years past, Buy Nothing Day was Black Friday, one of the single biggest shopping days of the year.

The message of Buy Nothing Day was probably lost in the stampede and the sound of cash drawers opening and closing. However, I think that it brings attention to an important cultural trend: American overconsumption of goods and the drift away from real values.

Holidays like Thanksgiving and Christmas have become valued for their profit producing abilities rather than their deeper meaning. The shift is indicative of a greater cultural phenomenon, of valuing corporations above citizens, of trading life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness for work, debt and the pursuit of a paycheck.

It could be said that with the way the economy has been looking for the last year or so, they best thing we can do would be to shop. I challenge that notion.

Why should we devote our lives to a system that doesn't benefit us and is set up for the benefit of a powerful two percent elite? How many mothers and fathers worked hard for years of their lives for companies that laid them off when they started to go under?

Why should we devote our lives to a system that doesn't benefit us? That is set up for the benefit of a powerful two percent elite?

How many of those companies received bailout money, which saved them from going under? How much of that money did your mother or father, or any of those who lost their jobs, see?

While mega-transnational corporations took tax dollars and bought yachts and beach-resort vacations, thousands of families lost their homes. Why should we spend our money in support of a system that hurts us?

Those that are fortunate enough to be employed don't have much to be thankful about either. Americans work an average of 46 hours a week, with four weeks of vacation (including holidays). Maternity leave is shorter here than almost anywhere is the industrialized world. Our health is poor, our happiness is low and our divorce rates are high. We've traded in our time for money.

Economies, whether in the form of bartering or stock trading have always existed and there have been many kinds throughout history. With all the options and all the brilliant minds, is corporate consumer Keynesian capitalism the best system we can come up with? Can't we think of something that doesn't have built-in crashes? That isn't programmed to fail?

I believe that we can find a new way of organizing business and trade, a way that values people, increases the quality of life and gives workers time to live. Buy Nothing Day therefore is not as much about feebly "sticking it to the man" as it is about forming solidarity with others who want a better life. It is a statement as much to yourself as to those around you that you support active change.

So, next Thanksgiving, eat with your family and remember to be grateful for all the things that money can't buy. Then on Black Friday 2010, join the movement, help raise awareness, eat leftovers and buy nothing.

'Assassin' a definte kung-fu classic

Korean pop star Rain shines in debut

By Andrew Sheridan
Collegian Staff

For over a millennium, the nine clans of the ninja have existed in secrecy. Living in the shadows, these powerful families have disciplined their stealthy warriors in the deadly arts and preyed on the weak as the world's most elite assassins. They live without pain or fear, move without making a sound and kill without leaving a trace.

In the Wachowski brothers' new film "Ninja Assassin," the secret world of the silent killers is brought to the light of day, and what ensues is stylized cinematic brilliance.

The plot of "Ninja Assassin" is simple: An innocent Europol agent named Mika Coretti (Naomie Harris) digs a bit too deep into a series of political killings, and finds herself the target of the deadly Onuzu clan. While the clan may be after her, rogue ninja Raizo is after them, and the unlikely pair team up to pursue their mutual goals.

The old formula of the "killer with a conscience" has been worn out over the years, but the execution is fresh and effective. The first hour of the film is interspersed with flashbacks, telling the story of how Raizo parted ways with the society of assassins and began his vendetta, and this method works naturally into the story at large.

While it is well executed, the plot is predictable and not very impressive. That's not exactly the point, though, now is it? Unlike previous collaborations between director James McTeigue and the Wachowskis, which include "V for Vendetta" and the "Matrix" trilogy, "Ninja Assassin" doesn't supply any literary themes or social commentary. While just as stylish as its peers, this latest film relies less on plot and more on bloody violence.

The second half of the movie more or less eschews character development, diving head-first into the ninja-on-ninja action. Korean pop star Rain is cool as ice in the lead role of Raizo, displaying impressive martial prowess in his Hollywood debut. Despite the obvious use of special effects and CGI, his athletic ability cannot be ignored, and this is not likely to be the last time we see the performer on the big screen.

Combat sequences range from over-the-top Kill Bill-style bloodbaths to intense encounters between top killers. While the best of the stylized action is a cross between "Enter the Dragon" and "300," it verges on gimmicky when mysterious ninja abilities are demonstrated without explanation. It seems at times that the film doesn't know whether it wants to be a realistic kung-fu matchup or a Naruto-esque magical ninja romp.

One rule that is certainly followed throughout the film is the Inverse Ninja Law, wherein the more ninjas the protagonist faces at any given time, the easier each individual ninja is to kill. As the movie progresses, the body count ratchets up significantly, with wave after wave of opponents falling under the stylized wrath of Raizo's chain-blade.

Inconsistencies aside, the action in "Ninja Assassin" is heart-pounding. It starts off with gallons of blood and ends much the same way, with the intervening plot serving only as motive for the ever-escalating violence.

First and foremost, this film must be recognized for what it is: a flashy kung-fu flick. Those who are looking for the next sweeping drama this Oscar season would be well advised to go for something starring Viggo Mortensen or De Niro. But judged on its own merits of style and action, this tale of violence and espionage is one of the best of the year.

Andrew Sheridan can be reached at usher1@student.umass.edu.

While at times over-the-top, the latest Wachowski brothers' film "Ninja Assassin" is an action packed joy-ride held down by a predictable and unimpressive plot line. Korean pop star Rain pulls off some amazing stunts in the lead role as Raizo.

Commemorating what would have been his 75th birthday, "Good Rockin' Tonight" is a box set of CDs compiled with a variety of Elvis Presley's hit songs from when he reigned as the King of Rock n' Roll.

The King still reigns today

"Good Rockin' Tonight" reintroduces music of rock legend Elvis Presley to a new generation

By Mark Schiffer
Collegian Staff

On Aug. 17, 1977, a very sad and confused southern boy was found dead in his hotel room. Whether you believe it was the result of too many prescription pills, or simply too many stresses related to touring, it was without question a loss that had a powerful cultural impact worldwide.

It was at this point when the myth of Elvis became completely cut-off from his actual music. And it was at this moment when his then quite kitschy image prevented him from having seemingly any musical relevance at all. Elvis is currently associated with screechy blue-haired queens in Memphis, who place wreaths on his grave while discussing how they've seen him in their hotel rooms. Hopefully with the Dec. 9 release of "Elvis 75: Good Rockin' Tonight" celebrating what would be Elvis' 75th birthday – all this will change.

For the first time, this box set will introduce this generation to the entire basis of the Elvis legend. We've seen the idea behind Elvis deconstructed, discussed and evaluated in film, literature and even the hordes of impersonators he inspired. However, many people of this generation have, up until recently, viewed him, and consequently his music as well, as dated relics of yesteryear. The release of this box set may change all that.

For most, the music contained on "Elvis 75: Good Rockin' Tonight" needs no introduction. The early years are always going to be remembered as the peak, and the later over-orchestrated pop covers are always going to be dismissed. The key is to listen for the never-changing persona.

He never stopped being the nice southern kid who played "Love Me Tender" on an acoustic guitar. He didn't know anything of social change, yet when the record producers put him in the studio to sing "In the Ghetto" he put his heart and soul into it, for better or for worse. While that song certainly isn't ever going to be remembered as a high point in Elvis' career, it carries its own kind of desperate charm. For that matter, so does much of the later material contained in this box set.

You can hear him lost in a studio filled with female backing singers and endless orchestras, unsure of where exactly he fits in. This is especially noticeable on his late-in-life rendition of "Unchained Melody." The cascading pianos and angelic choirs threaten to overwhelm, but through it all we can hear the last gasps of life from the last days of a legend.

We can hear the promise in the early recordings, and see it fade as time goes by. The box set follows a logical chronological progression, and with the accompanying essay by Grammy-winning music writer Billy Altman we are given the full tale of Elvis's personal life and musical career. The essay reads as a breathless account from a fan who knows every Elvis tale, and has read every biography. It is a valuable part of this wonderful set.

Certainly, the voice comes across as maudlin today. But there never really feels like a moment that it could be any other way. Every song was Elvis being Elvis. He knew no other existence. Sometimes he was jubilant. Sometimes he was melancholy. Sometimes he was lustful. At all times, he was Elvis.

Nintendo video games appeal to all ages this holiday season

The popular video game company offers a good selection of titles just in time for the holidays

By Andrew Katz
McClatchy-Tribune

This holiday season, Nintendo is offering big lineup of new titles and updated fan-favorites.

"Our aim, during the holiday season and throughout the year, is to get Nintendo products into the hands of as many people as possible," said Denise Kaigler, vice president of corporate affairs for Nintendo of America. "We have so many different fun options for games of all tastes and level of experience that we're confident everyone will find something to enjoy."

Notably, the must-have title on any fan's wish list, "New Super Mario Bros. Wii" ($50, rated E) combines smooth, clear graphics with updated moves that Kaigler said will "resonate with longtime fans of the 'Mario' franchise."

Launched Nov. 15 as the first true multiplayer "Mario" game, it has all the running, jumping and coin-collecting as its cousins, but new features, such as the ability to include up to three other players in the adventure, combine competition with cooperation to form an innovative title with a classic feel.

Other enhancements like the propeller suit, which shoots characters into the sky with the simple shake of the motion-sensitive Wii controller, and the option to hinder or assist other players' performances also boosts the possibilities in the timeless game.

The Wii console's price dropped by one-fifth on Sept. 27 to $199, and Nintendo hopes the change will entice more consumers to try the gaming experience, along with the release of new titles like the much-anticipated "Wii Fit Plus" (rated E).

Featuring more than 20 workout routines, strength exercises, yoga stretches, balance forms and obstacle courses, "Wii Fit Plus" aims to help you burn off those extra holiday calories.

With the assistance of a virtual trainer, players can create and customize routines specific to their body types or goals, set the number of minutes they prefer to complete each exercise and view the results of their hard work afterword.

"Our research shows there are 50 million Americans thinking about becoming gamers," said Cammie Dunaway, executive vice president of sales and marketing for Nintendo of America. "This more affordable price point and our vast array of new software mean many of them can now make the leap and find experiences that appeal to them, whatever their tastes or level of gaming experience."

"Wii Fit Plus" shows users an estimate of how many calories users burned during their workouts and notes the number of calories in everyday foods to encourage healthier eating habits.

"'Wii Fit' got millions of consumers off the couch and into video gaming," Kaigler said, "and 'Wii Fit Plus' continues in this tradition of helping people enjoy their workouts even more."

At $20 for those already using the Wii Balance Board, the title costs less than a month at most local gyms. The game-and-board combo comes to about $90.

Some new colors for existing products also may be attractive gifts: The Wii controllers are now available in black, in addition to classic white. And the Nintendo DSi portable consoles now come in white and pink.

The update to the Nintendo DS, originally released in April in black and blue, is encapsulated in a sleeker body, with larger display screens, built-in cameras and options to play music. The changes have transformed the convenient gaming solution into an everyday unforgettable, much like a cell phone.

Priced at about $170, the DSi has wireless Internet connectivity and brighter images that come in handy when playing games like "The Legend of Zelda: Spirit Tracks" and "Style Savvy" (both rated E).

While it's primarily targeted to the teen and tween markets, "Style Savvy" is the ultimate shopping simulator and can be enjoyed by gamers of all ages.

An amalgamate of business and shopping, players have the ability to own and operate their own clothing boutiques with an inventory of 16 in-game designer labels and interact with customers to sell merchandise and generate a profit.

The game, which also lets users sync with up to three friends for a runway fashion show, costs about $30.

Other games recently released include "Lotto Frenzy" for the DSi (rated E) and for the Wii, "Call of Duty 4: Modern Warfare" (rated M) and "Band Hero" (rated E).

Test against Spartans comes at difficult time

onds left in the first half.

The Minutemen were down by 46 points with 2:14 left in the game. UMass then made a small dent in the Spartans' lead with 3-pointers by guards Gary Correia and Freddie Riley along with a last-ditch layup by guard Javorri Farrell. But the run was insignificant by then.

"[The Spartans] are a team and a program I inspire for our team to look like at some point," Kellogg said. "Maybe not at that level, but at least look that way and play that way."

Kellogg believes that besides MSU, having more skill at every position than UMass. The game also came at an inconvenient time.

The consolation game of the Legend's Classic was the Minutemen's sixth game in two weeks, which included a semifinal game the day before against Rutgers. It's the most games UMass will play in a two-week span for the rest of the season.

For a team as young as UMass, ending a schedule that grueling against the second best team in the nation isn't going to show promising results.

"I don't think we were ready for a team that good this early in the season, especially our young guys," Kellogg said. "I don't know if they knew the caliber of a Final Four team."

If there's anything the Minutemen can take relief in, it's that they are guaranteed not to play anyone as good as the Spartans the rest of the season. In fact, UMass won't even play a team getting Top 25 votes until Dec. 19 when it squares off against Memphis.

The Minutemen also lost a much less discouraging game to the Scarlet Knights on Friday, 83-75. Rutgers rode guard Mike Rosario for 22 points on 9-for-15 shooting and seven rebounds.

He scored 18 of his points in the first half to jump the Scarlet Knights (3-2) out to a 46-35 lead at the half.

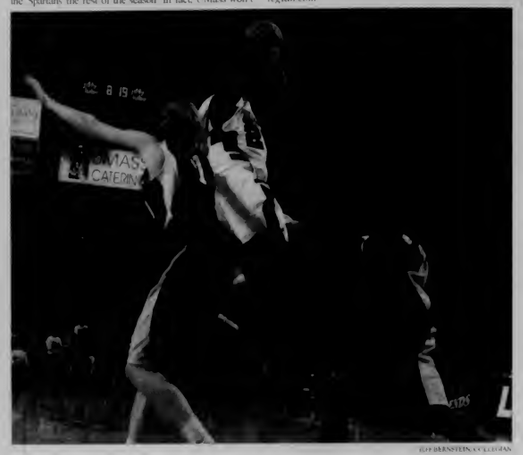
Guard Ricky Harris (22 points) rebounded from a poor first half with 20 second half points. But it wasn't enough to keep the Minutemen from snapping a two-game winning streak.

After being down 19 points, UMass cut the lead to four points with 1:32 left in the game with a 3-pointer by Harris. But late free throws prevented the Minutemen from coming away with the win.

"The way Ricky played in the second half is the way he needs to play all game," Kellogg said. "He's a senior and he needs to play like that."

Redshirt junior Anthony Gurley contributed 19 points off the bench.

UMass also welcomed back center Hashim Bailey, who sat out the two previos games with a groin injury. Bailey (two rebounds) played 14 minutes, but he picked up four quick fouls and had a limited contribution off the bench.



The Minutemen play its next game at the Mullins Center on Wednesday against Quinnipiac. The Bobcats come off a 13-point win against Maine on Nov. 24.

played 24 minutes and turned the ball over a team-high six times, while usual point guard David Gibbs played 14 minutes and had one turnover. The Spartans capitalized off of the miscues, scoring 28 of their points off of turnovers, while UMass scored 14.

"It worked for a while, but Michigan State is an experienced team that started getting up and jamming him and making the game hard, and our game plan for the first six minutes worked pretty well," Kellogg said.

Kellogg, who put in a zone defense during the shootaround, also used Bailey and Carter along with Gurley on the wing to start the game, and gave the Minutemen, as well as its future opponents, a different look.

Along with Vinson, who has started every game of his career so far, the trio of Bailey, Vinson and Carter combined for 10 rebounds in the first half, to the Spartans' eight.

"I thought we rebounded the ball decent for a while, I thought we did a few good things, but they were superior," Kellogg said.

Bailey, whose conditioning has been his main drawback, made the most of his start, seeing the most minutes (25) of his entire career at UMass. While scoring one point, Bailey finished second to Carter in rebounds (eight) and blocked a shot. MSU had five players in double-digits, but the starting five for UMass scored 48 points, despite turning the ball over 12 times.

In the loss against Rutgers on Friday night, Harris, Carter and Vinson all started, with Gibbs bringing the ball up and freshman Sampson Carter starting at forward.

The starters combined for 27 rebounds and 47 points, but accounted for nine turnovers against the Scarlet Knights. Kellogg is considering the possibility of shuffling his lineup again on Wednesday night, in order to take some of the load off Harris, keep Gurley scoring and continue to get rebounds and consistent play from Vinson, Carter and Bailey.

Minutewomen fall short against Miami

By Neil Carroll
Collegian Staff

Kristina Danella's 14 points and nine rebounds were not enough as the Massachusetts women's basketball team fell 63-57 to host Miami in the championship round of the Wyndham Miami Thanksgiving Tournament on Sunday night.

Danella, who compiled 35 points and 14 rebounds in UMass' two games over the weekend, earned all-tournament team honors along with fellow sophomore Nicole Jones. The forward finished the weekend with 24 points and 11 rebounds in UMass' 71-57 win over Rice on Saturday and loss to the Hurricanes (6-0) on Sunday night.

"We had some opportunities that we didn't score," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said. "So we were matching basket for basket, but there were a couple stretches that we came up empty-handed offensively and that was the tale of the game."

In the second round, the Minutewomen (4-3) had trouble matching up with Miami guards Shenise Johnson and Riquna Williams. Johnson, a former high school McDonald's All-American, had 15 points, six rebounds and four assists to go along with fellow sophomore Williams' 17 points, five rebounds and five assists.

The Minutewomen contained the scoring duo, but Miami freshman Stefanie Yderstrom picked up the slack offensively by making her first appearance in her young collegiate career. Yderstrom made 3-of-5 shots from beyond the arc, and finished with 11 points in the game.

"I didn't even see [Yderstrom] in uniform the day before," Dacko said. "That was a surprise, but I think for the most part the kids adjusted well defensively."

Miami	63
UMass	57
UMass	71
Rice	57

UMass trailed 24-23 at the half and was in the game thanks to the rebounding of Danella and the rest of the squad. Danella had seven rebounds in the first half alone to give UMass a 23-19 advantage in that category.

However, in the second half the Minutewomen were outrebounded, 26-17, as Diane Barnes finished the game with 11 rebounds for the Hurricanes.

"Our work is still on the boards and that's a work in progress, but I think all in all... we played pretty well and we put ourselves in a position to win," Dacko said.

With three minutes, 19 seconds remaining in the game, UMass' Jones stepped to the foul line and hit the first free throw in a one-and-one situation. UMass trailed by one point and never regained the lead as Miami took over.

Although UMass went 6-of-7 from the free-throw line in the first half, the second half was a different scenario. The Minutewomen made 9-of-13 attempts at the free-throw line in the second half and the missed shots were a contributing factor in the Miami victory.

The Minutewomen also missed timely lay-ups late in the game and fell victim to the Miami defense in the second half. Miami finished the game with 11 fast break points while UMass did not have any in the contest.

"We did get to the foul line and we didn't make out free throws," Dacko said. "So we had layups, we got some open looks at the basket, and we got to the foul line and it was just that two-minute period of time that we weren't able to capitalize on their mistakes."

UMass' victory over Rice was a different story. While Danella again led the Minutewomen, the team won by playing good defense against Rice's D'Frantz Smart and Jackie Stanley.

Stanley, the Owls' leading scorer coming into the game, struggled to eight points in the game thanks to staunch defense from the UMass forwards. Smart was also limited by the defense as Dacko imposed a tight pick-and-roll defense.

On offense Danella had 21 points to go along with seven rebounds, and junior Megan Zullo added 10 points in the win. Zullo, a transfer from North Carolina State, went 2-of-5 from 3-point range while coming off of the bench for UMass.

Zullo is now shooting 38 percent from beyond the arc, and looks to add her skills to the shooting talents of Danella, Kim Benton and Cerie Mosgrove.

UMass had a 13-point lead at halftime, but the Owls chipped into the margin until a few minutes left in the game. With 2:07 left in the game, and the Minutewomen lead at eight points, Rice coach Greg Williams decided to intentionally foul UMass in attempt to cut the lead.

UMass' Kristina Danella and Kim Benton iced the game with free throws to counter Williams' strategy, and eventually pushed the UMass lead to 14 points to end the game.

On Wednesday, the Minutewomen will travel to Boston to take on Northeastern at 12 p.m.

Danella contributing for UM at foul line

By Neil Carroll
Collegian Staff

Concentration and confidence is the mantra that the Massachusetts women's basketball team coaching staff tells Kristina Danella to think about when she steps to the foul line.

This year, as a sophomore, Danella already has taken 47 free throw attempts for the Minutewomen. She has almost 20 attempts more than the next player on the list, but what stands out is that, after the Wyndham Miami Thanksgiving Tournament, she has made 42 of those free throws on the season.

In UMass' victory over Rice on Saturday, coach Greg Williams applied a strategy where his team would intentionally foul the Minutewomen with less than two minutes to play even though the Owls trailed by eight. Williams' game plan backfired, as his team repeatedly fouled Danella, and she sunk every shot at the free-throw line.

Danella not only finished that game a perfect 12-of-12 from the free-throw line, but also went 9-of-9 in the championship game of the tournament. In fact, Danella is on a remarkable stretch, as she now has 31 consecutive baskets from the free-throw line this year.

"She's just a great shooter, and when you work hard and you fight, and try to get into the lanes, you're going to get fouled," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said of her team's leading scorer. "When you get fouled it's how you make teams pay."

With UMass down by three points and with less than 30 seconds to play in the team's home opener against Boston University this season, Danella pump faked her defender into the air and drew contact on a 3-point shot instead of shooting a clean jumper to tie the game. She then stepped onto the line and into the spotlight, with the game's outcome resting in her hands.

"I love that," Danella said comfortably when asked about the pressure. "I want to be the one shooting with the game on the line."

Danella then confidently drained all three free throws and sent the game into overtime, giving UMass the momentum to eventually pull a comeback.

A great free-throw shooter always has a set routine, and Danella is no different. She lines up in the middle of the basket by looking down into the nail in the court's floor, aligns her right foot inches further forward than her left, spreads her legs just tighter than her shoulders' width apart, spins the ball with both hands, takes a dribble with her right hand and simply shoots.

She led New Jersey's Shore Conference with .84 percent free-throw shooting in her high school career, but the mark dropped to 74 percent in her freshman year at UMass. This year, Danella not only improved her percentage to 89 percent, but is also making free throws more consistently with more attempts.

Danella doesn't think her efficiency improved because of any main difference in technique or practice, but thinks that she always shot well. Dacko also denies having any major effect on Danella's shot by practicing.

"I'm not taking any credit for her free throws," Dacko said. "She does it, and she's earned it, and it's really what they do mentally."

This year Dacko has given her more freedom on offense, and Danella (15.5 points per game) has learned to draw fouls when driving to the hoop – a technique she modeled after WNBA star Diana Taurasi.

"Last year, I wasn't a driver and all Coach Dacko wanted me to do was shoot," Danella said. "So now that she said I can drive, I went back to my old ways and it's working so far."

Spartans overpower Minutemen

MSU goes on 30–3 charge in romp over UM

By Adam Miller
Collegian Staff

Since taking the head coaching job, Derek Kellogg has always wanted the Massachusetts men's basketball team to play a national schedule against the country's top teams.

But as No. 2 Michigan State's 106-68 drubbing over UMass (2-3) on Saturday proved, it's going to be a while before the Minutemen can compete against a team on that level.

The Spartans (5-1) scorched UMass, shooting 58.6 percent from the field and 63.6 percent shooting from 3-point range. Guard Chris Allen led the Spartans with 18 points while Anthony Gurley scored a game-high 24 points for the Minutemen.

UMass	68

UMass	75

Despite the game being lopsided, UMass can at least take credit for participating in some history. MSU coach Tom Izzo won his 341st victory to set the school record for most wins, topping his predecessor Jud Heathcote.

After losing to Florida by three points, the Spartans ensured that their coach would set the record in New Jersey.

The Minutemen had an 8-2 run early in the game, but MSU responded with 16 straight points, which turned into a 30-3 run to lead by 20 points with seven minutes, 33 sec-

Harris moved to PG, Bailey starts in return

By David Brinch
Collegian Staff

In its loss to No. 2 Michigan State on Saturday, there were a lot of firsts for some members of the Massachusetts basketball team.

Senior captain Ricky Harris started his first career game at point guard, center Hashim Bailey started his first ever career game in a Minuteman uniform and sixth man Anthony Gurley joined Harris in the front court for the first time in 2009, as second-year coach Derek Kellogg tried to find the right combination of players in order to beat a Spartan team that made the Final Four last season.

Harris started all 30 games last season, and has started 66 in his career, but never ran the offense until Saturday's blowout defeat to No. 2 Michigan State.

Bailey, who played in 16 career games so far, got the start in the middle, as Kellogg bumped usual center Sean Carter to forward alongside Terrell Vinson. Gurley started 23 out of 30 games last season, but has come off the bench so far in 2009.

While it was not the result the Minutemen were looking for, the starting five showed some rhythm as UMass got off to a quick start, going on an 8-to-2 run in the first two-and-a-half minutes.

But like the Minutemen's earlier opponents, the Spartans knew how to shut down Harris, who brought the ball up the majority of the time. Harris

UMass drops in OT

By Jeffrey R. Larnard
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts hockey team overcame an early three-goal deficit Saturday afternoon, but did not have a chance to over come two late goals by Brandon Wong as it fell in overtime, 5-4, at Quinnipiac.

The Minutemen took a 4-3 lead overcoming three first period goals by the No. 9 Bobcats — on Michael Lecomte's fourth goal of the season with six minutes, 46 seconds remaining in the game, only to have Wong score with 1:10 left to send the game to overtime. Wong then came through 2:18 into overtime to notch the game-winner and give UMass its first loss on the road this season.

Goalkeeper Dan Meyers got the start in net for the No. 10 Minutemen (9-3-0, 5-2-0 Hockey East) and gave up three goals to QU (12-1-0, 7-0-0 ECAC) starting with one 3:35 into the contest to Jean-Marc Beaudoin, before being replaced by Paul Dainton.

Just over 11 minutes later, the Bobcats' Mike Atkinson took a pass from Brett Dickinson and shot the puck past Meyers for his sixth goal of the season. At the 17:11 mark in the period, QU took a 3-0 lead on Scott Zurevinski's goal off an assist from Eric Lampe.

The deficit remained at three until 18:15 into the second period when Casey Wellman beat the Bobcats' goaltender Dan Clarke (28 saves) for the first time in the contest. Just under halfway through the final period, Will Ortiz brought UMass to within one after he fired a shot in after Lecomte's assist.

Wellman scored his ninth goal of the season and fifth of the week, 11 seconds after Ortiz's to even the game at three. Marcou and his brother Michael Marcou, assisted Wellman on the goal. It was the fifth time that Marcou assisted Wellman in UMass' last two games.

Lecomte received a pass from Ortiz at the 13:14 mark in the third period and fired a shot into the net, for UMass' first lead of the contest. The lead lasted 5:26 when Wong buried a shot off a pass from Zach Hansen to tie the game at four apiece.

Wong did the same 2:18 into overtime, as he scored the game-winner after receiving a pass from Mike Atkinson.

Beyond Wong's two scores, Dainton (28 saves) was solid after replacing Meyers (12), preventing any scoring by Quinnipiac from the start of the second period until Wong's score at the end of the third.

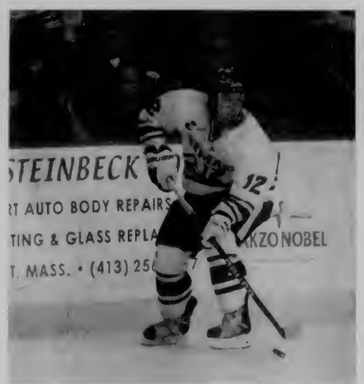
The Bobcats prevented the Minutemen, one of the best power play units in the nation, from having many power play chances, with only a charging penalty being called on Lampe. UMass had three penalties with the Bobcats going 1-for-3 on the power play. Lecomte was called for elbowing in the first period while Justin Braun saw four minutes in the box for separate hooking and interference calls in the final period.



Wellman and Marcou continued to play strong after both exploded in UMass' win on Tuesday over then-No. 17 Vermont. After Wellman scored a hat trick against the Catamounts, he notched another two goals on Saturday. Marcou followed his five assists game against UVM, with two more assists against the Bobcats.

1st period causing problems

By Jay Asser
Collegian Staff

Despite receiving contributions from the usual suspects, the Massachusetts hockey team couldn't dig itself out of an early first period hole.

The Minutemen defense surrendered three goals to No. 9 Quinnipiac in the first period as the Bobcats (12-1-0, 7-0-0 Eastern College Athletic Conference) pelted UMass goalkeeper Dan Meyers with 15 shots. The three-goal deficit was the largest of the season for the No. 10 Minutemen (9-3-0, 5-2-0 Hockey East), making it nearly impossible for UMass to pick up its third consecutive win.

Though the Minutemen eventually lost, 5-4, in overtime, they completed a comeback to take a lead in the game.

After the first period, UMass coach Don Cahoon made a change in goal, replacing Meyers with Paul Dainton. The junior started the first seven games of the season, and recently has been splitting time with Meyers after the senior returned from a suspension on Nov. 8 at Niagara.

In the previous game against then-No. 18 Vermont, Dainton started and played the entire game and allowed two goals in the process of making 27 saves.

As only a junior, Dainton has been one of the top goaltenders in the Hockey East, ranking in the top three for goals-average against, save percentage and winning percentage.

After Dainton entered the game, he stymied the Quinnipiac offense for the second and most of the third period, while the Minutemen scored four straight goals to take the lead.

In over 42 minutes of play, Dainton recorded 28 saves, 19 of which came in the final period.

For the UMass offense, familiar faces were getting the job done in leading the Minutemen back into the contest.

Sophomore Casey Wellman scored two goals while Will Ortiz added a goal and an assist. The two scores give Wellman a team-leading 11 on the season, placing him second in the Hockey East behind New Hampshire's Bobby Butler as the conference's only two double-digit goal scorers.

The two points recorded by Ortiz tie him with Justin Braun as UMass' third-leading point scorer with 13.

For the Minutemen, the loss marks the first on the road this season after beginning the year with four straight wins away from the Mullins Center, including two victories over ranked opponents.

The loss is also the first suffered by UMass to a non-conference opponent. The two previous losses came against Hockey East foes Providence and New Hampshire.

Power play struggling

The best strategy for opposing teams against the Minutemen this season has been to stay out of the penalty box. Though UMass boasts the highest scoring offense in the Hockey East, much of that is attributed to their conference-leading power play unit.

UMass has a 29 percent success rate in power play situations so far this season, while holding opponents to only 17 percent. In all three of the Minutemen losses, the offense has struggled in the power play, going a combined 1-for-7 on the man advantage.

Going forward, UMass will look to play physical and draw penalties to give their power play unit opportunities to put up goals.

UMass graduate heads to Los Angeles for million dollar game

If you play your cards right, you might get rich. At least it worked out that way for one University of Massachusetts alumni.

Brian Barboza, 2001, recently won $100,000 on a Pokerstars.net tournament. "Pokerstars Million Dollar Challenge," which aired on Fox. Based on his performance in the top five of contestants on the show was selected to fly to Los Angeles to play in a $1,000,000 tournament with the other top contestants and poker extraordinaire Daniel Negraneu.

Barboza said that while he had learned to play conventional poker as a child, his rise to the top of the online poker world had been a fast one.

"I didn't get on the site until March, I think it was," he said of his online experience.

"At that point, I kind of knew how to play. It's basically a free site. It's all fake money, and I picked it up for an hour here, an hour there," Barboza added.

Barboza said that he began practicing ardently when he saw an advertisement for a chance to appear on the renowned World Series of Poker tour, though that fell through.

From there, he was determined to poke into the top echelons of poker, and when his computer flashed with a promising pop-up ad, he was ready to make his break.

"I think it was in July," he said. "A window popped up

'TinkerPlots' for Mass. students

By Michelle Williams
Collegian Staff

A new style of learning called TinkerPlots is being tested within the coursework of Chestnut Hill Elementary, Fort River and Lynch Middle School in Holyoke.

TinkerPlots Dynamic Data Exploration is a software program developed by Key Curriculum Press. The program is designed specifically to get students between grades four and eight excited about learning from data analysis. Through the use of visual representations, students recognize patterns and can build a strong foundation in mathematics.

In a release, Cliff Konold and Craig Miller of the University of Massachusetts's Scientific Reasoning Research Institute said there is a need for higher "data literacy." Konold points out a desire for students to relate real-life situations to numbers.

"The health care debate is driven by interpretations of data, as is the debate about global warming. It's a new world, and today's young people need to learn to think in new ways and cultivate skills that allow them to understand and make sound arguments based on data."

The two U Mass professors have received a $1.7 million grant from the National Science Foundation to refine a new version of the TinkerPlots learning system. With the third version of this educational software, students in grades five through eight will learn new data literacy techniques. This new software is set to be implemented into Holyoke schools' curriculum in spring 2010.

The approach of the latest TinkerPlots design is to have kids feel they are playing a game and posing questions on relevant topics to the age levels.

Konold said, "We've found that using a computer-based approach is natural for encouraging students to build data sets that they're truly interested in or that seem like a game to them."

Examples of student work could include a student debate regarding whether they get too much homework in different grades. They would construct a data set, collecting data from peers on backpack weights and compare weights by grade to see if students in higher grade levels carry heavier workloads.

TinkerPlots currently has two learning systems within school systems across the world. Developed between 2000 and 2009, the first two programs are taught in the United States, Australia, Canada, Israel, New Zealand, Russia and Thailand.

UMass makes the Recreation Center official with ceremony

On Thursday Dec. 3, University of Massachusetts officials, including Chancellor Robert C. Holub, will hold an official opening ceremony for the University's new $50 million Recreation Center.

The opening ceremony is scheduled to start at 3 p.m. and will be held at the Recreation Center on 161 Commonwealth Ave. across from the Mullins Center.

Among the University's officials scheduled to attend the event will be UMass President Jack Wilson, UMass Trustee Henry Thomas III, UMass Building Authority member Robert Sheridan, Athletic Director John McCutcheon, Associate Dean for undergraduate programs at the Isenberg School of Management Carol Barr.

The three-level, 120,000-square-foot Recreation Center features weight and fitness equipment, a three-court gymnasium, a wellness center, an elevated jogging track, three multi-purpose rooms, locker and shower facilities, space for intramural sports and club offices for skiing, baseball, cycling, crew, fencing, ice hockey, lacrosse, volleyball, rugby and wrestling.

Additionally the exercise areas are equipped with 25 flat-panel televisions and electronic message boards, which display daily activity and exercise schedules for students.

The opening ceremony come one month after the University opened the Recreation Center Oct. 30 to undergraduate students, who have free membership.

CAMPUS PERSPECTIVES

What do you have to say about this UMass issue?

Historically, the UMass Alumni Association has lagged behind other schools in generating contributions.

Q: Do feel you will have a connection to UMass as an alumni?

Zach Fischer
junior
Marketing major

"They set up networking events, but I don't think I've ever been to one. The Alumni Association seems to be trying though. Memorial Hall always looks pretty dark and foreboding. I feel like only half of UMass actually likes UMass, so I think that could be a problem."

Kellie Burely
Communications major

"I worked calling alumni for the Annual Fund, and you could sense that people were not positive about it when you talked to them. Unless people had a personal connection through the sports teams or a scholarship, I don't think they will end up donating."

Jeremy Quinn
junior
Biology major

"Right now I do not feel a strong connection. I'm sure it's tough for them, considering that there are so many people here. If I was more involved with the Alumni Association, I might donate in the future, but I'd say it's unlikely I'll join."

Carrie Gaydos
junior
Comm. Disorders major

"I think that UMass doesn't establish as much of a community [as smaller schools] because it is so huge. I feel like I hardly hear about the Alumni Association."

Poker champ has eyes on $1,000,000 prize

By Nick Bush, Collegian Staff

On Thursday Dec. 3, Barboza will fly to Los Angeles to take part in the final round of the series tournament, which will feature five other top poker players vying with Daniel Negreanu for the million dollar prize.

when I was playing that said 'click here for a chance to be in the Pokerstars Million Dollar Challenge,'" and with that, Barboza's road to riches began.

"I won this pre-qualifier. It was like a 10,000 person tournament," he said.

From there, the producers of the Fox mini-series Pokerstars Million Dollar Challenge contacted the pre-qualifier winners and asked them to produce a video discussing why they deserved to be on the show.

Barboza and two friends made a short video, which Barboza said they did not take seriously, only to get a call back from the producers, who told him they enjoyed his video and asked him to fill out a questionnaire to appear on the show.

"About a week after I sent the video, I heard back from the Pokerstars people," he said, "they said they really enjoyed the video, sent me a questionnaire, and then I didn't hear anything for a month and a half, so I thought it was over," he added.

But the hand Barboza had been dealt was a promising one

"Finally I got contacted by one of the casting directors who said I was one of 12 who was going to go on the show," he furthered, and so his run to poker prominence began.

"Me and my two friends went out (to Los Angeles) the first week of October," he elaborated, continuing that he was unsure at first what to expect and highly nervous.

The sports marketing alumnus who originally hails from Raynham, Mass. was still in for more luck.

In the first round, the contestants play a celebrity, and Barboza's opponent was 2008 Playmate of the Year Jayde Nicole.

"She was pretty good," Barboza said of his photogenic foe. "I was pretty nervous that first round and almost lost. I kind of snapped out of it and won," he said.

Barboza explained that poker superstar Daniel Negreanu, a featured guest on the min-series, was allowed to advise him in the first round, but not to see his cards.

For his first round win, Barboza was rewarded with a trip to the Bahamas.

After he felled Nicole, Barboza was met by Pokerstars.net's pro poker player Vanessa Rousso, a tough opponent, for a pot of $25,000.

In the second round, Negreanu was not allowed to be in the room, but was able to inspect Barboza's cards over closed circuit television and advise him of his moves over earpiece.

Perhaps it was fated, but Barboza took round two and the $25,000 bonus and was faced with a decision go home $25,000 richer, or take on Negreanu himself for $100,000.

Barboza took the risk and went after the champion himself, and his decision paid off, as he felled the legend and took home the prize.

Thursday Barboza will fly to Los Angeles to play in the final round of the series, which features the show's top five winners vying for a chance to take on Negreanu for $1,000,000.

With any luck, and maybe a few good hands, one UMass alumni will head home to Bridgewater to his liquor wholesaling job a million richer. Talk about a jackpot.

Majoring in mad science

Shera Demchak

Dear University of Massachusetts College of Natural Science,

In the beginning of December, the UMass student population will be perusing SPIRE for the most popular and most engaging courses. Some courses filled before sophomores were even allowed to enroll, which can be rather frustrating for people, like my neighbor, who had her heart set on Art 280, Hand Building. Unfortunately, my heart is set on a course that doesn't even exist at UMass.

I am a science major. Specifically, I am a chemistry major. Some people major in science because they are good at math or memorization. They can be spotted a mile away with their pocket protectors and TI-83 calculators.

But I am a science major because science explains things that are intangible, perhaps just as intangible as liberty and justice. I know I am creative enough to be an English major, but I chose chemistry because it also calls for an imaginative mind. But, to my disappointment, no such classes that teach scientific creativity.

Mad science – science that employs zany and creative ideas – is a necessary discipline for any science major. Richard Feynman, a Nobel Prize winner in physics, said in his Nobel lecture in 1965, "If every individual student follows the same current fashion in expressing and thinking about electrodynamics or field theory, then the variety of hypotheses being generated to understand strong interactions is limited.

"On the off-chance that it is in another direction – a direction obvious from an unfashionable view of field theory ," he added," who will find it? Only someone who has sacrificed himself by teaching himself quantum electrodynamics from a peculiar and unusual point of view – one that he may have to invent for himself."

I am disappointed in UMass's chemistry curriculum because it does not host classes that expand a scientist's imagination.

Chemistry is the study of the intangible. It is the study of the particles that cannot even be seen with a microscope. The characteristics of atoms and molecules are deduced through experimentation. We can only imagine what an atom looks like. That is where imagination comes in. Sometimes, I just find myself looking up at the ceiling and wondering what a benzene molecule actually looks like.

I cherish moments when my chemistry professor strays off into more interesting aspects of chemistry, such as the philosophies of Richard Feynman. Even the best teachers in high school were the most enlightening when they digressed from the curriculum.

Mad science – science that employs zany and creative ideas – is a necessary discipline for any science major.

I will never forget how my high school physics teacher, head of the science department, gave us fetal pigs to dissect in the name of anatomical physics. Meanwhile, the biology teachers crossed their arms in jealousy. He wanted us to expand our minds and to think of physics from a biological perspective.

So why can't the mathematics department host an elective called Mathematics in Arts, covering the famous Victorian satire "Flatland" or the surreal paintings of Salvador Dalí? Why can't the physics department host an elective discussing the paradoxes of physics?

For example, an object traveling from point A to point B must pass through an infinite number of points, so how is it even possible for it to reach point B? Why can't the engineering department host an elective discussing the inventions of Leonardo da Vinci? Or is an engineering elective taboo?

Most importantly, if I am a science major, why am I barred from taking a scientific philosophy class? I need to take two prerequisite philosophy courses to be able to take philosophical approaches to science. Should not two classes in a science prepare me just as well?

I agree that I should have my scientific principles and equations down pat, but a huge part of being a scientist involves having the creativity to invent new ideas and principles. We need to learn how to think for ourselves. This kind of education should not wait till graduate school.

I wish with all my hearts for a "That's funny" science course. I wish for a science course that make me proud to be a science major, not one that make me wish to be an English or philosophy major. I do not want to wait 10 years to get to the juicy stuff that Stephan Hawking spends his life poring over, despite his debilitating disease.

So what have you, College of Natural Science? Mad science can blow our minds away. I do not want a BDIC, I want a revolution. Let us learn what we have been dreaming of learning since we were toddlers watching Bill Nye the Science Guy.

Sports as a unifier

Eric Magazu

Sports are an extraordinary part of American culture. In our day when most civic, national and religious institutions are viewed in scorn and disrepute, athletic competitions are one of the few areas that endure as a national beacon.

It may be a commentary on modern American culture to look upon a society in such a light. Should we be concerned about the state of our institutions? Should cynicism rule the day? Nevertheless, the answers to these questions, while critically important, do not negate the powerful binding force that athletic events provide our community.

In earlier eras, there were many ways for a mechanism to bind communities together. A common crisis or a common enemy might be a force that would keep a tribe united. Bonds of brotherly affection would preserve group identity. Even today, families maintain some of this effect. Ethnic or national pride could be source of identity. Faith can be a source of unity, but even if it was well established, modern doctrines about the separation of God from civic life would stymie any attempts to build unity around this area.

There is so much hope out there for each of us and all of us. Nevertheless, with the deficit of unity among people in our day, most of us have resorted to smaller groups to find community. Smaller groups offer the intimacy that is more conducive to the tribal structure that may be most natural for human beings. We can find unity in groups that share our interests, even if they do not lend much support when looking at a scope that is nationwide.

There is one institution that still has the power to draw in the crowds on a national level. What we have to decide here is whether this is a sustainable force that will unite us as the American people. This is rooted around football, baseball and other sports leagues.

Sports competitions have the power to create riots in Southwest. University of Massachusetts games can draw large crowds at McGuirk Alumni Stadium or the Mullins Center.

Even those of us who have had a distance from sports in our younger days can still appreciate the effects of its power to pull us together.

While we may have to call December by the title "holiday season," there is no doubt that there is a Sunday early in the year that we all unambiguously call Superbowl Sunday, a major holiday in its own right, that brings together vastly diverse populations.

There may be a difference between men and women on this topic. While any question that might indicate that women are less interested in sports than men can be considered sexist, there does seem to be less of an interest among women in vast sports events. I know some women are sports fanatics in their own right, but I don't know of vast swaths of women that have trouble tearing themselves away from the television set on any given Sunday.

Even those of us who have had a distance from sports in our younger days can still appreciate the effects of its power to pull us together. Those of us not so engaged in the game are generally willing to get excited about these sports events even if the actual game isn't exciting for us.

We need to know for sure that sports can be sustainable as an institution that would bind all of us together in society. Are there other institutions that continue to serve as a unifying force in society that would cross all natural and artificial barriers among people?

We need to address these issues in the nation and in our smaller communities. Each of us has to meet our neighbors and get together on common goals. We definitely need individual initiative, but we need community as well.

If we continue on a present course without institutions that can draw us together like sports can, but do not have any deeper roots, this could be problematic in the long term.

The Roman Empire had exciting gladiatorial matches while it was crumbling. If we continue in this present course, we could see our American Empire follow the same path. There are certainly many people in the world who would welcome this.

This scenario could even be for the best for the world. As Americans, is this is something about which we should be eagerly anticipating? Instead, we should seek to establish our values and our institutions. Even if we reject the values of our forefathers and pick new modern values, this would be better than a course of no direction. As we enjoy the remaining NFL games this season, this is something that we should really think about during the commercials.

As yet another semester ends, many on this campus are faced with the prospect of imminent graduation, especially if they are graduating at the end of the semester. Others are freshmen who may be finding out that college is different than anything that they have ever experienced.

If you are nearing graduation and entry into the so called "real world," you are probably looking forward to entering a new chapter in your life. You are also probably a bit nervous. You may be asking, "How will I fit in?" as you come to the realization that you will be starting at the bottom of the pile once again.

If you are a freshman who has just nearly survived your first full semester in college, you are probably figuring out what kind of people you like to call your friends. You are starting to realize who you are and what you want to do with your life.

If you feel you are having an identity crisis, don't worry, it's normal. What you will eventually realize is that you have to follow your own path.

To illustrate this point, I want to share a story with you about a man I know. This man eventually learned to follow his own drumbeat, and he is better off today because of it.

This guy I know was a very quiet guy when he was younger. Teachers would tell his parents that he was "quiet as a church mouse." He was a bit of a slow learner and had a small circle of friends, and wasn't very sure of himself and could come off as lazy at times.

In middle school, this guy started to hang out with a group of adventurous friends. He followed this group of friends until they had a falling out part way through high school.

That's when I noticed a change in this man. He started to think for himself. He began to accomplish some things that a few years before he would have been too shy to attempt.

However, he had some bad luck towards the end of high school and he proceeded to walk around with a chip on his shoulder. At this point, sports were his life, and he felt disowned by his self-perceived identity.

This is when he changed yet again and learned this lesson of living to the beat of his own drum. Eventually he got over this identity crisis. He realized that there was more to him than sports, discovering things about himself that even he didn't know. He started to believe that he could make a difference.

This man still has his moments of doubt and can be unsure of his future like any other, but at least he knows who he is.

Our lives are like that of a river. You can change the pace of the water and alter the course of the river but can't reverse the direction that the river flows. We can change parts of our lives and what we do within it but we generally can't change who we are deep down, with a very few exceptions.

If you feel you are having an identity crisis, don't worry. It's normal. What you will eventually realize is that you have to follow your own path.

We humans are social creatures and like to fit in. While it is good to fit in to a certain extent, one can't sacrifice their identity in order to do so.

Once a person is sure of whom he or she is, that person is more and more comfortable being themselves.

This man I know is a good example. Though he was quiet and was always afraid to voice himself when he was younger, I knew that he had ambition. He was just too scared to act on it.

As he figured out who he was, that changed. Though still seen as quiet, he is capable of going after goals. After one of his goals had been reached, I asked him how he knew what to do.

"I didn't," he replied. "I just felt that this was what I wanted to do in my heart." Through hard work he reached a goal that his heart had dreamt. While what that goal was irrelevant, the fact that he reached is relevant.

Now, this guy I know usually thinks a lot of things through. But on this instance, he did not. What seemed so wrong in that logic ended up right. It defined the art of human identity and ambition.

So, to those of you who are worried about how to fit in the "real world," I suggest to not worry. Be who you are. You will be happier that way and you will find that you can accomplish great things by being yourself. Ask yourself this – can you see some of this guy's story within yourself? I can.

Senate could go 'green'

Dan Rahrig

If you've paid any attention to American politics in the past decade, chances are you're familiar with the name Ralph Nader, the third-party consumer rights advocate whose presidential campaigns in the past three election cycles have left a good deal of controversy in their wake. Nader's now-infamous presidential run in 2000 against was considered by many to be a spoiler for Al Gore, whose narrow loss to Bush in Florida, where Nader polled well, ultimately cost Gore the election.

While the attempts at the presidency have earned Nader the ire of many liberals, he has also become a hero to those displeased with a two-party political system and to the thousands of Americans who want a more transparent, progressive government. Nader's White House bids have made him a household name and a staple of the American ballot since 2000, which is why the Connecticut Green Party has been so enthusiastic in pressing Nader, a Winstead, Conn. native, to run for Senate in 2010, a notion that isn't too far out of the realm of possibility.

Given incumbent Chris Dodd's vulnerability in his re-election campaign following scandals and criticism for his role in the national financial crisis as the Senate's Banking Committee chairman, the atmosphere certainly seems right for a Nader bid.

A recent Quinnipiac University poll shows Dodd trailing former Republican Congressman and GOP front-runner Rob Simmons 38-49 percent and also shows him losing to former Worldwide Wrestling Entertainment executive Linda McMahon (also a Republican candidate) 41-43 percent.

While these poll numbers are premature (the election is almost a year away), they at least indicate that Dodd will have a hard time getting re-elected next fall. If Ralph Nader was to enter the race, it would essentially doom Dodd, whose core base of supporters are Connecticut's liberal Democrats, a piece of the electorate that would also be highly favorable of a Nader candidacy.

When asked if he would consider campaigning for Dodd's seat at a book signing for his new novel, "Only the Super-Rich Can Save Us!," Nader said "I'm just absorbing a lot of the feedback before I make a decision. It really depends on what kind of momentum there is and how much people are willing to roll up their sleeves." At other times when Nader has been asked about running, he has described his feelings on the prospect as "agnostic" and "totally neutral."

It seems strange to think that Ralph Nader would run for the Senate after numerous campaigns for the presidency, but it also makes a lot of sense.

Nader has stated that he likes Dodd personally, but believes that Dodd's efforts in tightening regulations on the financial industry are not strong enough. Nader met with Dodd earlier this year to try to persuade the senator to create an independent organization, the Financial Consumer Association, to watch over financial players such as mutual fund managers and pension executives to keep them honest. This measure, however, was not included in the bill introduced by Dodd earlier this month – a fact that Nader takes issue with. "I'm trying to get Dodd to do the right thing," Nader said, "Right now, they are not serious."

While it may not sound like Nader is particularly eager to run for Senate, he still has plenty of time to decide whether or not to throw his hat into the race. Given his disagreement with Dodd on the issue of financial regulation, Nader certainly has motivation to run against the incumbent senator.

I'm willing to bet that Nader will also find that he has a lot of support in Connecticut, a state where he won nearly five percent of the popular vote in his run for president in 2000, and will ultimately end up running. The fact that he is a third-party icon on the national stage would also be a boon to his campaign, as it would surely allow him to raise campaign funds from supporters outside of Connecticut.

After all, a Senator Nader would not just be serving the interests of Connecticut in the Senate, but would surely be continuing to advocate the causes of his life (such as government transparency, consumer protection, human rights and green politics) as well.

It seems strange to think that Ralph Nader would run for the Senate after numerous campaigns for the presidency, but it also makes a lot of sense. Nader has long been seen as an anti-establishment champion of the common man – which is just the kind of political figure a large portion of the American public seems to be looking for amid frustrations with both the Democratic and Republican parties.

The fact that Nader has spent his life standing up to corporate interests makes him a uniquely appealing candidate for major public office – there would be no question as to where his loyalties lie. This seems an especially compelling quality for Nader to possess, given the fact that Connecticut voters are unsure if they can trust Dodd after the shady political practices that have gotten him into trouble this year. As a Connecticut liberal who has always liked Chris Dodd, I must say that I would really like to see Nader for senate – and I am certain that I am not alone in this view.

Amanda Peet (pictured) and John Cusack star as a former couple trying to sort out their troubled relationship as the world – quite literally – goes crumbling around them in "2012." Directed by disaster movie maestro Roland Emmerich ("Independence Day," "The Day After Tomorrow"), "2012" boasts an all-star cast and many jaw-dropping feats of digitized splendor.

'2012' a towering spectacle of thrills

By Kate MacDonald
Collegian Staff

There is a very real Mayan prophecy that says the world as we know it will end on December 21, 2012 in a melee of death, destruction and catastrophe. While no one knows what the future holds in store on that dread date, king of destruction Roland Emmerich shows viewers a glimpse of how he thinks things might turn out in his new film "2012."

Known for box office hits such as "Independence Day" and "The Day After Tomorrow," Emmerich brings his vast experience to the table. What he doesn't bring, however, is anything truly new. Yes, his destruction is on a much wider scale in "2012" than in either of his earlier films, but it contains the same tricks – famous buildings crumbling, falling into the sea or into ruin, humans overcoming natural disasters by nothing but luck and an ensemble cast of yesterday's stars. That being said, it's pretty impressive seeing famous landmarks like St. Peter's Basilica tumbling, crushing into a massive crowd of onlookers, or the Himalayas being overcome by massive tsunamis.

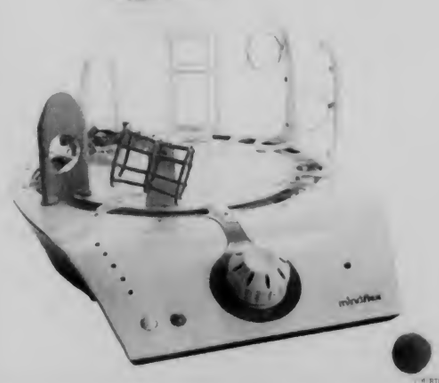
John Cusack, in the leading role, must overcome disasters such as these in the United States. A divorced father of two who has issues bonding with his kids, Cusack opts for a secluded camping tree at Yosemite, which is when the chaos begins. After stumbling across a lunatic in the woods – played by a very believable and hilarious Woody Harrelson - Cusack quickly realizes that this madman might actually be on to something. Steadily, small disasters start unfolding him, to say nothing of the small disaster that awaits when he brings the kids home to his ex (played by Amanda Peet), who has since shacked up with a plastic surgeon (Tom McCarthy).

The back story to "2012" provides some gushy moments as Cusack's Jackson Curtis tries to win his family back, at the same time as he is struggling to keep them alive. He gets an opportunity to do just this when he finds out that the world's leaders have known about the impending doomsday for some time, thanks to young geologist Adrian Helmsley, portrayed by the up-and-coming Chiwetel Ejiofor (past credits include "Children of Men" and David Mamet's 2008 mixed-martial arts film, "Redbelt"). If Ejiofor neglected some attention before now, "2012" really shines a light on his ability to carry a mainstream picture. Ejiofor steals the movie as the caring doctor – and is one of the few characters with a strong moral compass.

In a disaster film like this, much like any of Emmerich's other films, one could go on about the special and visual effects for hours. The large scale destruction of major world buildings and features is no easy task to accomplish, as a screening of the heavily dated 1974 disaster film "The Towering Inferno" could attest to. But the effects coordinators and stunt teams certainly do it well in "2012."

The cinematography is nothing to scoff at either. At times, however, the viewer can tell that the scene is obviously digitized, such as a scene wherein the tower of water comes cascading over the Himalayas. It doesn't look real, and the actors stand out oddly against the backdrop. But thanks to multi-angled shots in other scenes, anyone watching can almost believe they're there, witnessing the demolition of the Earth.

Aside from these setbacks, the acting is mostly terrific. Danny Glover plays a great American president, and other big name supporting actors make appearances throughout. Each character contributes something to the plot line and no holes are left in the story. The only big thing "2012" lacks is a more prominent soundtrack. While at times perhaps the impressive scenes wouldn't match well with a song, a powerful score could have added some punch to the film. With the impressive acting and jarring spectacles, however, one barely notices.



During the past few weekends "The Twilight Saga: New Moon" has been dominating the box office. Rather than hindering "2012," it has actually helped it. Many people, put off by teens heady and raucously waiting to enter their third screening of "New Moon," have opted to instead see "2012."

"2012" provides something other movies out this season do not: a new element of fear. This prophecy was made thousands of years ago, for a very specific date two years away. While most chose to believe it false, the movie does instill some fear, or at least some further thought, in this subject.

Yet underneath the story, it also has a constructive review on what's important to American society- religion in times of distress, money, family, safety, and so many more elements we don't think of everyday. "2012" turns out to be more than just a high powered visually amazing action flick. The best sorts of movies make you think, and "2012" does just that.

At last, telekinesis is within your grasp with Mindflex, Mattel's new game that relies solely on a headset that reads brainwaves to levitate a ball and throw it through a player designed obstacle course.

No sweaters under this tree, just plenty of toys

By Kate MacDonald

Bundled up adults sprinting through automatic doors, shouting and shoving their way through a crowd of people may sound like an attempt to save themselves from one of the many disasters Hollywood is screening. But no, the scene is Black Friday in the early morning hours at Toys R Us locations across the nation.

As always, there are certain toys that are so inexplicably popular they will become sold out nationwide, and reports will come flooding in about parents beating one another over them. Remember the Furby and Tickle-Me-Elmo crazes of the late 90s?

Despite the economy, toys sales this year are still flourishing. For older kids, the more expensive presents varying in gift cards, phones, iPods, North Faces and Uggs, are widely wished for. But for a younger set, Toys R Us is definitely still the place to go. TRU has released an ad noting the "Fabulous 15," but the most-wanted list can easily be whittled down to 10 fabulous finds.

Zhu Zhu Pets- by Cepia, for ages five through 12. Easily the most sought-after toy this year, but perhaps the most foolish. They're electronic hamsters that, thanks to artificial intelligence, can interact with their surroundings and dart around a room. It's like a real hamster, without the mess. They're so popular that, because of presale tickets, TRU Hyannis sold out before their doors even opened.

Mindflex- by Mattel, ages eight through 14. This cool new game relies solely on a headset that reads brainwaves to levitate a ball and guide it through a player-designed obstacle course. This game stuns kids and adults alike.

Anything involving the Wii- Nintendo, any age. The Wii is one of the toys to beat this year. The Wii console, is a motion-controlled game system, including various games such as the Wii Sports Resort, Guitar Hero and Wii Fit.

Anything involving the Nintendo DS- Nintendo, any age. The same description can be said about Nintendo's DS system, which is basically this millennium's Game Boy. The DSi, the "I" standing for interactive, which hit stores last summer, is its most popular item and is featured in various colors and designs.

NERF N-Strike Raider Rapid Fire CS-35- Hasbro, ages five and up. The TRU ad states that it's designated for ages five to seven but anyone on the UMass campus knows that this would be amazing for a Humans v. Zombies player. In the NERF gun 35 darts can be held at once and has a rapid fire option. It's a non-lethal machine gun.

Bakugan toys- Spin Master, ages five to 13. Any young boy knows that Bakugan, similar in theory to Pokemon, was the most popular toy this summer. It's based off a highly watched anime show. The figurines are selling like there's no tomorrow, but anyone over the age of 13 will have a hard time understanding this craze.

Transformers: Revenge of the Fallen Construction Destroyer- Hasbro, ages five to 12. "Transformers: Revenge of the Fallen" was easily this summer's biggest blockbuster, so all of its toys are not only extremely popular, but are high quality because of the demand. This super-transformer contains six separate autobots that combine to form one huge robot, so you'll really get your money's worth.

RipStik- Razor, age eight and up. This warped skateboard hybrid not only looks cool stationary, but in use on the streets as well. The Toys R Us Website says that riding one of these is like a cross between surfing and snowboarding. Anyone who's tried it knows that it can be very hard to learn how to do, and is accompanied by many scrapes and bruises, so if any parent wants to invest in one of these, they should really consider a helmet as well, at the very least.

PixOs Starter Kit- Spin Master, ages five to 12. PixOs are small crystal-like beads that, when placed on a board, make colorful, flat pictures and can stand on their own if water is added. A starter kit is the perfect gift for a creative kid, containing a pen that makes it easier for little hands to make designs. It's not suitable for kid under five; the beads are tiny and can make a huge mess, according to a TRU Hyannis employee and mother.

Grow to Pro Super Sounds Soccer- Fisher Price, ages two through four. This is a fun toy for an active little one which will start soccer kids and keep a kid active. In the box is an inflatable ball and a small to mid-sized soccer goal with a hanging target. If the target is struck, "Goooooooal!" is shouted from small speakers on the goal, prompting laughs and shouts from children!

Toys R Us and other toy stores have many toys and games to offer kids and older ones alike this year. But these were among the most seen on Black Friday, during which many stores, including TRU Hyannis surpassed their daily goal. Like every year, there will be both disappointed and thrilled kids sitting under their Christmas trees on Dec. 25, but chances are that if something is picked from Toys R Us' "Fabulous 15" list, Santa can't go wrong in 2009.

Student entrepreneurialism drives the 'Zoo'

Campus talent agency uses social networking to scout nubile co-eds for 12-month calendar

By Kristin Vaselacopoulos
Collegian Correspondant

For most of the country, the job market is looking pretty bleak. For those at the University of Massachusetts – those either about to graduate or those who already have and have begun taking that fearsome trek toward adulthood – the market can seem even bleaker. Luckily enough, since birth, most of our parents have told us we can be anything we want to be, just so as we apply ourselves. And for some students, this entrepreneurial spirit is about to pay off.

Big time.

Of course, you don't have to search far to see this entrepreneurial student spirit at play. It can be glimpsed everywhere, from Boston's Johnny Cupcakes to the sober driving system which dutifully collects students from Amherst Center in the wee hours of weekend mornings to the destination of their choosing. Closer to campus, we have our pick of organizations run, managed and creatively tuned by our own students. One in particular is Popular Campus Entertainment (PCE), a student run talent agency and production company founded by Jesse Barack, Daniel Forberg and Michael Schollard in 2009.

For students at UMass, the first evidence of PCE's work will be the 2010 ZooMass Calendar, a 12 month layout featuring some of the hottest coeds from the Five College area. The idea came into being during the summer, and was carried into fruitfulness this fall, as PCE founders scoured the campus for suitable pin-ups.

Barack and Forberg promoted ZooMass calendar auditions by using a mix of grassroots and mainstream advertising techniques, everything from flyers on campus to taking out Facebook advertising, which proved to the most effective of all. ZooMass Calendar cover girl Erica Cohen first heard about the calendar when she noticed a flyer that had been slipped under the door of her dorm room.

Most of the publicity for ZooMass was done through social networking, something which our generation thrives on and which allowed PCE to adjust the ZooMass calendar group to focus first on the contestants/models, then to update voters and customers during the production of the calendar.

In true entrepreneurial fashion, Barack, the C.E.O. and managing director of PCE, has hired peers to help flesh out the creative details, logistics and publicity for the calendar while maintaining a very flat organizational structure. The PCE team, made up of Barack, Forberg – who claims credits as operations manager and graphic designer – two professional photographers, Ryan Fung and Tony Tavares, two modeling directors, hair and makeup artists and last but not least, models, without whom the calendar might be nothing.

In total, it may seem like an unnecessarily large group, too cumbersome in numbers to be involved in the production of a local calendar. But then again, the final product will speak for itself.

UMass students Kate Herook and Michelle Cataldo, also models for ZooMass, spoke highly of the professionalism that was maintained during their photo shoots. Herook, who has modeled previously, is also a Celtics' cheerleader and was very impressed with the organized manner of the shoots.

According to Herook, she was able to give input and received advice from Barack and Forberg. Her shoot, which took place at Bikram Yoga Amherst, was very fulfilling because although she has done calendar and cheer modeling in the past, she sought to add fitness modeling to her resume. Plus it helped that Forberg also practices Bikram. According to Herook, a bond was cemented between model and manager as they went over poses for the shoot.

Another defining characteristic of student businesses, as demonstrated by the Bikram shoot, is the ability to work and interact with each other on a more social level. Students place a high premium on friendships and the wide variety of talents one brings to the table - more so than on hierarchical structure - so it isn't all too apropos for an operations manager to help a model pose, or for a model to also be hired as a modeling director for less experienced girls.

Tony Tavares, one of the photographers for ZooMass, reflected on how a photo shoot at the Route 9 Diner in Hadley ended up being his favorite through the process, and gave the calendar its signature, cover photo featuring Erica Cohen, a first time model. Tavares, who usually works in alternative portrait photography, was sought out by Barack, a long time friend, and asked to photograph for the calendar. Tavares said he loved the atmosphere, especially being able to see how a more mainstream side of photography could help him become more well-rounded in his art. Tavares also said he took pleasure in the people who worked at the Diner and the lovely models who made shooting so enjoyable.

Student resourcefulness also proves to be quite intriguing because our generation is one not afraid to ask for the best and mean it. Growing up in an age where knowing how to find anything and having every technological medium at our fingertips has proved useful as we start to venture out in the workforce. Forberg wasn't convinced that PCE was something he would be able to be happily committed to, having grown accustomed to the pace of Films Royale, the first company started by himself, Barack and Aaron Fradkin.

As a film production company which is focused on creating films for those who think out of the box, Films Royale is more of a creative outlet, rather than a solid business goal for the enterprising Forberg. He was pleasantly surprised when he started working towards the PCE goal, knowing that although there were more deadlines, PCE was like working for Films Royale times tenfold, as he was able to be creatively expressive and business-oriented at the same time.

Fast-paced and with tunnel vision on the things we are passionate about, our generation is not afraid to ask for help or support, either. Obviously these qualities reap results, seeing as most of the companies in Amherst, including Antonio's, Salon Divine (which provided free hairstyling to the final twelve girls prior to their photo shoots) Prep Cosmetics, the Golden Booty, Bikram Yoga Amherst and Films Royale have all sponsored a month in the calendar. Amherst Music House and the Route 9 Diner have sponsored two months each.

Much more is expected to come from PCE as it transitions into a pre-talent agency this summer helping to book UMass students in performance venues and jobs. Look for the 2010 ZooMass Calendar, being sold in the Campus Center the last two weeks of school, as well as the calendar models who will be distributing Golden Tickets to select customers, allowing them to get a dollar off the final sale price of the calendar.

Although PCE stands out, locally this is just one great example of the leaps students are making in business in the dog days before graduation. Although students may not be traditional in the work place, or in any sense, the student community has morphed into a potent force, contributing and flourishing in our media-driven society. Students prefer telecommuting to work, and globalization allows us to expand where we work and with whom while diversity inspires us. So, yes the economy may not be the greatest to graduate into, but students need not be discouraged. Resourcefulness and passion are what will aid students in becoming anything they want to be. Just look at what a couple of guys with a calendar can do.

Phillips honored as MVP

Xavier claims the 2009 Junkanoo Jam Freeport Division title

Saturday behind a career-high 19 points from senior forward April Phillips. The victory earned the Musketeers the 2009 Junkanoo Jam Freeport Division title. The Junkanoo Jam is made up of three four-team brackets, including the Freeport Division. Xavier defeated Kansas, UCU and Minnesota to earn the trophy.

Phillips was named Most Valuable Player of the Freeport Division for her strong play. She collected her 500th career rebound in the win.

Junior forward Amber Harris added 12 points, 12 rebounds, three assists, three blocks and four steals in the win, and was named to the Freeport Division All-Tournament Team.

Other major contributors included sophomore guard Tyeasha Moss, who added 15 points and junior center Ta'Shia Phillips, who scored 10 points, snagged eight rebounds and blocked four shots.

Defense was important for the Musketeers, as they held the Gophers to 36 percent shooting from the field and racked up 10 steals.

Forward Ashley Ellis-Milan led Minnesota with 14 points in defeat. Guard Brittany McCoy pulled down eight rebounds and dished out five assists as well.

A-10 Notebook

Xavier is now one win away from tying the 1999-00 team for the best start in school history. Currently, the Musketeers are tied with the 2000-01 and 2006-07 teams for second best start.

Venues announced for 2011 NCAA Tournament

Three Atlantic 10 Conference schools have been chosen to host 2011 NCAA Women's Basketball Tournament games.

The NCAA Division I Women's Basketball Committee announced that Dayton and Temple will hold 2011 NCAA Women's basketball regionals, while Xavier will host 2011 NCAA Women's basketball first and second round games.

Dayton University had already been awarded regional games for this season, which will be held on March 28 and 30, 2010.

This will be the third time that a school will host games in repeating years since the tournament began holding regional games at neutral sites. Greensboro hosted successive regionals in 2007 and 2008, and Oklahoma City did the same in 2008 and 2009.

Temple last hosted NCAA Women's Basketball games in 2005, while early round games will be played at Xavier University this upcoming March.

arriving at UMass.

In the days before classes started, Comas met her coaches and teammates for the first time. Her roommate, Chantal Swiszcz, also from Spain, is a fellow freshman on the team this year.

Comas said that playing tennis in America has few differences from the play in Spain.

"It is mostly the same," she said. "In Spain, we play more on clay. But I like hard courts more, so it's good for me."

The biggest adjustment for Comas in America has been the necessity to speak English. Comas began learning English in school at 10. She had to take further English classes to prepare for the SAT. But she was still not entirely confident with it when she arrived in the U.S. at the start of the school year.

Comas appreciates being able to talk in Spanish with the assistant coach Juancarlos Nunez, who is from Venezuela. Both Nunez and Dixon look to improve certain aspects of Comas' play during her time at UMass.

Dixon has been impressed with Comas' shot selection and her "very natural awareness of the match." She also noted Comas' excellent serve.

"I hope to improve her volley and incorporate that into her play," she said.

Dixon also hopes to work on Comas' mobility, which can be a weakness because of her height. She also will continue to work on improving Comas' play in doubles matches.

Comas has been playing tennis since she was six and for competitive teams for the last 10 years. But she does not have as much experience playing on a doubles team. So far this year, Comas has performed well in doubles matches, helped in part by her pairing with sophomore Ploch. Working with Ploch has helped Comas work on her doubles play, and she feels she has learned a lot from her teammate thus far.

Comas enjoys the fact that tennis, particularly on a professional level, is more popular in America than Spain. She would love to be able to play after college, but is not yet sure if she will.

After trailing, 26-33, at halftime, Clemson shot 57.7 percent in the second half including 6-of-13 from 3-point range.

The Tigers moved up one spot in the AP polls to No. 18 while the Bulldogs fell from the No. 12 spot to No. 23.

Wolverines fall out of rankings

The Michigan Wolverines took the biggest dive in the AP poll standings, relinquishing the No. 15 seed and falling completely out of the top 25 after losing to Alabama, 68-66, in the Old Spice Classic on Sunday night.

Sophomore forward JaMychal Green scored 20 points, including a go-ahead dunk with five seconds left and a block of a last-second layup attempt by Michigan's Darius Morris.

Junior guard Charvez Davis added 12 points for the Crimson Tide (4-2), who won two of three games in the tournament.

Manny Harris had 26 points and 10 rebounds for Michigan (3-2), which has lost two consecutives games after a 79-65 defeat at the hands of Marquette on Friday. The two losses followed an 83-76 overtime victory over Creighton on Thursday in the tournament opener. Harris scored 20 or more points in all three tournament games.

Michigan took a 34-29 lead into halftime with the help of 12 Alabama turnovers in the first 20 minutes of the game but was outscored, 39-32, in the second half.

Michigan's next game will come against Boston College, which has not faced the Wolverines in over two years. The Eagles (4-2) took the victory that day, 77-64.

UM to host 5 straight games

By Herb Scribner
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts club hockey team is in the midst of its two week break. This Friday, the break will end with Military Appreciation Night at the Mullins Center.

"[Military Appreciation Night] serves a couple of functions," UMass coach Robert Talloni said. "One is to honor the military and the personnel in the military. We have usually a fantastic turnout. We hit all the bases in the area."

The Minutemen (13-3-0) will take on Coast Guard Academy in a Northeast Collegiate Hockey Association matchup to show appreciation for those who serve in the armed forces.

"We have a ceremonial puck-drop, lots of pictures are taken, and [it is] a great fundraiser for the team," Talloni said. "It's really a well received event for the team. It's just a great thank you to the people are in our services."

The Bears are fourth in the NECHA Colonial South division, behind Worcester Polytechnic Institute, Rhode Island College and Tufts. Coast Guard is on a five-game losing streak with its last win coming in a 3-2 rout over the division leading Jumbos (5-5-0) on Oct. 26.

"They always seem to give us a good battle," Talloni said. "We look again for another great turnout and a very competitive game, and we always have to play to our best players."

Military Appreciation Night does not always mean that UMass will take on the Bears. Three years ago, Coast Guard was unable to make the event.

"They couldn't make the game. Their schedule was booked for that particular game, but we look to book a military school for appreciation night," Talloni said. "[The game against Coast Guard] will be very tough. They're getting better and better."

One night after the game against the Bears, UMass will head south to face rival Connecticut. The Huskies (7-7-2) will be fresh off thrilling, one-goal victories against both Western Connecticut State and Central Connecticut State.

"It's always a battle," Talloni said. "They beat us twice last year, and we always gave them a battle. We're out to do our best this year. [UConn is] always ranked very high and always at the top of the NECHA. So we're out to do our best that is year."

After the upcoming road game, UMass will have five consecutive home games stretching from Dec. 11 until Jan. 30, 2010. The first of this skid will be a rematch against UConn, this time on the Minutemen's home ice at the Mullins Center.

"We set the schedule up just for that," Talloni said. "We wanted to play them away at their rink, and then play them on our home rink. I personally set that up so we can have an advantage.

"UConn won the NECHA last year, so in order for us to win it, we need to get through UConn," Talloni said.

UMass will take on opponents that it has already faced this season, including Sacred Heart, New York, Bryant and the Blue Devils (8-7-0). The Minutemen have defeated each of them this season.

The last two games of the season are against Westfield and Keene.

"The season will come down to those final two games," Talloni said.

"Our season in the NECHA won't be decided until the last game of the season," Talloni added. "We need to put some wins together and do our best against the team in our league."

It was reported a few weeks ago that there was a situation against Western Connecticut that required UMass club hockey to meet with the head of the Referees Associations.

"We had a great meeting," Talloni said. "He looked at my concern, and was very nice and polite. We agreed to move on. We're going to see Western later on down the road. Basically, we left it. We're just going to move on."

Freshman Julia Comas and sophomore Magdalena Ploch exchange after a point earlier this season. Comas has earned a perfect 8-0 doubles victory and a 6-0, 6-0 straight set win this year as a rookie.

Comas producing big results as a freshman

Rookie from Barcelona already making impact

By Chris Stores
Collegian Staff

Julia Comas, the 5'11" freshman from Barcelona, wasted no time in making an impact on the Massachusetts tennis team this fall.

In the team's first official match of the season versus Holy Cross, Comas was absolutely dominant. She joined with last year's Atlantic-10 Most Outstanding Rookie Magdalena Ploch to win a perfect 8-0 doubles victory. She then defeated her opponent in her singles match in two straight sets, 6-0, 6-0.

The lopsided wins were just the first of many victories for the No. 2 singles player, who has so far lived up to expectations held by her coach, Judy Dixon.

"Julia has made a difference on this team," Dixon said. "We made a great choice."

Dixon began recruiting Comas last March through an agency that represents international players. The process of recruiting internationally can be difficult, she said, particularly because there is no room in the budget to visit players in other countries.

"Recruiting internationally is a roll of the dice. You're absolutely reliant on the agencies and not all of them have the school's best interest at heart," she said.

In the case of Comas, Dixon had faith in the agency. Through the agency, she was presented with a videotape of Comas' play as well as statistics and tournament records. She then began e-mail and telephone correspondence with both Comas and her mother.

Comas looked at other schools in the area but decided upon UMass. She has been happy with the fit so far.

"The experience has been really positive," she said. "In Spain, it is difficult to play at a higher level and study at the same time, and here I can do it."

Comas arrived in the United States two weeks prior to the start of the semester. It was her first time in America. She spent a week in New York before

UNC earns the 600th win for coach Williams

In defeating Nevada, Williams becomes 33rd coach in Divison I history to reach milestone

By Pete Vasquez
Collegian Staff

Seven months after cutting down the nets in the NCAA Championship game, North Carolina men's basketball coach Roy Williams continues to make history. Williams earned his 600th career win on Sunday as the No. 10 Tar Heels prevailed, 80-73, against the Nevada Wolf Pack.

Williams became the 33rd coach in Division I history to reach 600 wins and the third-fastest in NCAA history to reach the mark. His all-time record sits at 600-139 over 22 seasons of coaching both the North Carolina and Kansas basketball programs. He is currently the eighth active coach to reach the milestone.

Wearing a sling on his left arm, Williams coached his first game since having surgery to repair a torn labrum in his shoulder. Senior forward Deon Thompson posted a career-high 23 points on 10-of-17 shooting while collecting eight rebounds. Sophomore forward Ed Davis added 16 points and 15 rebounds, as well as three blocks for North Carolina (6-1), which endured a second-half drought.

For five long minutes, the Tar Heels could not make a basket, missing eight consecutive shots and relying on two made free throws by Larry Drew II for their only points during that span. However, an 11-3 jolt down the stretch quieted Nevada's upset bid as North Carolina emerged victorious.

Thompson's turnaround jumper with three and a half minutes remaining capped his scoring and gave the Tar Heels a 74-67 advantage. The Wolf Pack didn't get closer than five points the rest of the way.

Armon Johnson scored 20 points, and Luke Babbitt had 15 points with 11 rebounds to lead Nevada (2-3). The Wolf Pack shot 41 percent in the game and missed 10 of their last 14 shots.

The win propelled North Carolina into the top ten of the AP top 25 rankings after sitting just outside as the 11th seed. The Tar Heels will now focus their attention on a championship-game rematch with No. 9 Michigan State, which takes place on Tuesday at 9 p.m. The Spartans (5-1) are coming off a 106-68 win over Massachusetts.

Tigers edge Bulldogs

Junior guard Demontez Stitt made two clutch free throws with 3.3 seconds remaining to lift No. 18 Clemson over No. 23 Butler on Sunday night in the 76 Classic in Anaheim, Cal.

Stitts scored 19 points to lead Clemson, which rallied after trailing by 12 points to take a 68-67 lead on Andre Young's 3-pointer with 1:32 to play.

Senior forward Trevor Booker blocked a shot and deflected an inbounds pass in the final second for the Tigers (6-1). Booker finished with 12 points and eight rebounds, despite playing while sick.

Gordon Hayward had 18 points and 12 rebounds, both season-highs, for the Bulldogs who fell to 4-2. Shelvin Mack added 15 points, eight rebounds and four assists.

Mack attempted a 3-point shot in the closing seconds that would have given Butler the win but had it blocked by Booker, who knocked the ball out of bounds with 0.5 seconds remaining. Mack launched the ensuing inbounds

Bonnies come away with 6th straight win in topping Bryant

By Ben Lambert
Collegian Staff

The St. Bonaventure women's basketball team defeated Bryant, 66-43, on Sunday afternoon to reach 6-0 for the first time in the history of the program.

The six-game winning streak is the longest since December 2007-08, when the program also won six consecutive games. The run is also the fourth longest in St. Bonaventure history.

With the loss, Bryant drops to 1-4 on the year.

Sophomore Jessica Jenkins led the Bonnies with 15 points on 6-of-11 shooting, including three 3-pointers. Two other St. Bonaventure players were also in double figures, as redshirt sophomore Armelia Horton scored 12 and senior Dana Mitchell added 11.

St. Bonaventure continued their strong defensive play with this game, as they held the Bulldogs to 34 percent shooting from the field and scored 28 points off turnovers.

The Bonnies set team season highs with 13 assists and 11 steals in the contest.

Siamone Bennett led the way for Bryant with 12 points and 6 rebounds, and Lekia Cowen added 10.

Maine and Boston University earn back-to-back victories

By Daniel Gigliotti
Collegian Staff

After winning handily in two games this week, the Maine hockey team improves to 500 in conference play to move up in the standings.

The Black Bears (6-7-1, 4-4-1 Hockey East) captured a win at No. 3 UMass Lowell, 3-1 and another at home against St. Lawrence, 10-1.

Against St. Lawrence, Maine sped out to a lead 29 seconds into the game, and was up 5-0 after one period. Three players scored at least four points in the contest, and passing was on display, serving up 18 assists.

The Black Bears' success this week was propelled by the play of captain Tanner House and goalkeeper Scott Darling. House accounted for four goals on eight shots as well two assists on the weekend, earning himself Co-Player of the Week honors.

Darling improved his record to 6-3-1 in goal for Maine, turning away 27 shots on Friday and 17 Saturday in 40 minutes of play. Darling was noticed for his performance and received the Pure Hockey Defensive Player of the Week award.

The Black Bears finish the month of November, 3-3-1. They look to continue their climb up the Hockey East rankings when they host Providence on Friday.

BU wins in five-overtime thriller

Boston University's resiliency was on display this week, skating to two overtime decisions in non-conference play.

The Terriers found their fourth victory of the season and evened the score against a top-tier team.

It took BU (4-7-2, 2-6-1 HEA) five overtime periods to down Harvard (1-5-2, Eastern College Athletic Conference), extending the Crimson's winless streak to seven games on Tuesday.

The Terriers found themselves down four times only to even the score. The last of these rallies came with 53 seconds to play in regulation. After 84 total minutes of play, sophomore Chris Connolly won it for the visiting team.

BU enjoyed a 49-26 shot advantage in the game but was only able to convert on 12 percent of its attempts.

Three overtime periods failed to produce a clear winner on Saturday as the Terriers played to a stalemate against No. 7 Cornell. BU escaped from Madison Square Garden with a tie, coming back from two goals down in the third period against the Big Red (6-2-1, 5-2-0 ECAC).

The Terriers displayed dominant shooting for the second straight game, slapping 35 total shots on net.

On the season, BU has fared better outside of its conference, posting a 2-1-1 record against non-Hockey East foes.

River Hawks drop back-to-back games

UMass Lowell dropped two spots in the Hockey East standings, losing two games against struggling opponents.

After winning four consecutive games, the No. 3 River Hawks (8-4-1, 4-3-1 HEA) gave up back-to-back contests against conference opponents Providence and Maine.

On Tuesday, Lowell saw a 1-0 lead evaporate against the Friars in a 4-2 loss. Providence outshot the River Hawks, 31-22, over the final 40 minutes, making the most of their power plays.

Friday marked the first time Lowell has lost consecutive games this season. After a scoreless first period, Maine took control in the second period taking a 2-1 lead, and tacked on another goal in the final frame, winning, 3-1.

U Mass-Lowell was one point behind New Hampshire for position atop the Hockey East standings coming into last week (9 points). They now find themselves tied for fourth with the Black Bears.

They will look to redeem themselves on Friday when they visit conference leader New Hampshire.

UM researchers use 'TinkerPlots' to educate

Program calls for data literacy plan in middle, grade schools

By Sam Butterfield
Collegian Staff

If you were like most, math may not have been your favorite subject in your primary and secondary school education.

It was boring, it seemed irrelevant or tedious, your teacher had dandruff and was always wearing holiday sweaters.

University of Massachusetts Scientific Reasoning Research Institute (SRRI) fellows Cliff Konold, an educational psychologist, and Craig Miller, a software designer, believe they have a solution for that.

They call it TinkerPlots. It is a software program designed to make understanding basic statistical concepts painless and maybe even fun for elementary and specifically middle school students around the world.

The duo have been working on the project, which has already seen two versions released and a third in the works, since 2000, according to Konold, and have labored over revision after revision and improvement after improvement throughout that time to create an engaging, interactive program which makes learning principles like correlation and relation between groups comprehensible and enjoyable.

Now, with a $1.7 million grant from the National Science Foundation, they will be able to develop a third, livelier and more engaging version of the program.

Konold brings an understanding of the way students think and how to maximize learning, while Miller works on creating easily understandable, dynamic software.

Konold said the program was born out of a common lack of understanding of statistical analysis which he felt needed to be addressed.

"There's a lot of difficultres in peoples' understanding of statistical analysis that have been well researched," he said, explaining that he and Miller designed the program not so much as a tutorial concept but as a tool for students to learn how to interpret statistics without really feeling as though they are studying.

"It's a pretty general data analysis tool," he said, "not like Excel, but something like that."

"The curriculum that we write or that others write makes use of TinkerPlots, but the program in itself doesn't teach anything," he elaborated.

Konold explained that the program incorporates real statistical data sets with relevance to students, such as one analysis students perform on weight of backpack by grade and gender to determine what is a reasonable weight for students and the relation between these data.

"The program comes with about 40 data sets," he said. "We've written activities exploring the trends in gold medal times for various Olympic competitions and how those have changed over time."

Konold said that the program's second version, which he and Miller have just finished developing, also includes probability simulations, as he stressed that educators are now attempting to teach statistical concepts well before the conventional period of late in high school or in college.

"Statistics and probability are now topics that they are trying to teach in middle school," Konold said. "They're being seen as increasingly important subjects." He explained that many primary teachers have anxiety about teaching such concepts, as they have little experience with them themselves.

"One reason we're not more prominent in more schools is because teachers really don't understand how to teach (statistics)," he said.

Version two, he explained, will allow students to determine the probability of various outcomes based on the data they collect, giving more real-world pertinence to the program.

He continued that developing each version of the software has taken the duo approximately three to four years, with countless revisions and tweaks based on trials in classrooms throughout the process.

Preserve UMass advocates for campus historic buildings survey

By Michael Phillis
Collegian Staff

The ability for Preserve UMass to advocate for a survey of historic buildings on the University of Massachusetts campus began as adversarial between the group's members and the administration.

According to Joseph Larson, chairman of Pelham's Historical Commission and correspondence secretary for Preserve UMass, back in May 2007, a document called the "Building Conditions Report," broke down the actions the University intended to take into six categories, ranging from keeping the building up-to-date to allowing some to deteriorate.

Preserve UMass wanted a seat at the table to discuss with the University a way in which they organization could have an input in the decision-making process.

Richard Nathhorst, who is a capital project manager for the University, spoke about the relationship at the beginning of negotiations and the mindset of the administration.

"The administrators aren't necessarily immediately open to having any of their administrative prerogatives circumscribed by restrictions," Nathhorst said.

Larson was less politically correct in his assessment of the state of affairs back in 2007.

"It was arrogant people working for the president's office who essentially were giving us the finger," he said.

The first word, when Larson described his role in the process as advocate for a professionally done historical survey was "agitator," adding that his first bit of agitation came in 2007.

"We weren't getting anywhere [with the administration], so we nominated the campus for listing by a state private organization for the '10 most endangered historic resources in the Commonwealth' list," Larson said. "That was our way of getting attention."

Much of the conflict, according to Larson, came at the end of 2007 when UMass knocked down one of the cow barns in order to build the new Recreation Center. Because

Time recognizes University professor in top inventions list

By Sam Hayes

University of Massachusetts professor of microbiology Derek Lovley was featured in a Time Magazine article published on Nov. 12 for creating one of the top 50 inventions of 2009. A more effective way to get electricity out of microorganisms.

Lovley, a Ph.D. graduate from Michigan State University who came to UMass in 1995, said it was "not [his] first time with Time." Previously, Lovley said he had been featured in the magazine back in 2004 as an environmentalist and has been covered by the press for over 20 years.

The potential for this electricity producing organism is enormous, according to Lovley.

The invention that won acclaim this year began with a discover Lovley made in 1987 when he found a new class of bacteria called Geobacter. The anacrobic bacteria can create electricity by using small hair-like filaments called microbial nanowires to extract energy from surrounding mud and water.

Lovley explained that the bacteria uses electrodes like we use oxygen, as a way to get electrons out of the cell.

Lovley added that his team's explorations into the use of the microbe for power generation started in 2002 with underwater sea experiments funded by the U.S. Navy trying to extract power from the mud.

"Now kids can do it for science fair projects," Lovley said. "If you connect graphite in the mud to outside graphite you get a [power] flow." Lovley said this year he and his team came up with a strategy for increasing power output and manipulated the Geobacter to make it eight times more effective.

"[The improvement] greatly expands practical applications," he added.

According to Lovley, a key proponent of his research team is UMass graduate and research assistant professor Dr. Kelly Nevin, who grew the stronger electrode that allowed for the invention.

Lovley added that his lab focuses on more than just the Geobacter. The lab, which has 50 to 60 researchers and staff, is environmentally focused with working heavily on groundwater purification and, as Lovley put it, "things one would normally think of as fuel, such as trash."

According to Lovley, he has had some research funded by Toyota for a long-term fuel source, though he added that is quite a few years away. Other potential future applications include small electronics batteries and wastewater treatment.

For now, Lovley and his team have a paper ready to be published on the effectiveness of Geobacter in the Boston Harbor. The research, according to Lovley, has expedited the clean-up process and can possibly be applied to other polluted waterways.

Group preserves historic buildings

the building was being constructed with state money, the University ran into a problem.

According to the chairman of the Amherst historical commission, Jim Wald, during the 1970s, about 20 buildings were placed on the state registry, meaning that if they were to be altered, which the University would be doing to the buildings by knocking them down to build the Recreation Center, they had to notify the state.

"UMass ran a fowl of two problems. [They] tried to knock down historic buildings and they failed to deal with Environmental Protection Agency regulation," Wald said.

When Preserve UMass saw that the cow barn had been knocked down, they told the state. The State Historical Commission agreed with Preserve UMass and stopped work on the Recreation Center.

"Those big old barns were on the historic inventory ... they started to tear it down and they didn't want to notify the state historical commission, so we blew the whistle on them," Larson said. "That caused construction on a $50 million project to come to a screeching halt for seven weeks because they were in violation of environmental law and state historic law."

Environmental law was applied to the situation because, according to Larson, the EPA covers a wide array of things, including historic values on the landscape.

From this seven-week work stoppage, there eventually was a negotiation reached between the UMass administration, Preserve UMass and the Massachusetts Historical Commission.

In March of 2008, a Memorandum of Agreement signed by all three parties stipulated that the University would act in "Accordance with the following stipulations to mitigate the effect of the project."

There were four points, two of which are especially important to Preserve UMass. One of those agreements was the creation of a "Campus Cultural Resources Survey," which has allowed for the classifications of 105 buildings at UMass to be filed in the state's historical register. The other main point is that there would be "a permanent exhibit documenting and displaying the history of the Massachusetts Agricultural College."

According to Larson, this exhibit will include stone bases with bronze tablets on top that portray the changing history of the campus since 1863, erected near the Recreation Center.

According to the minutes from a Faculty Senate meeting, in the spring of 2008, the administration took from a list of seven or eight firms and narrowed them down to three before picking a winner. Vice Chancellor Joyce Hatch said, "There are three finalists. The finalist has not been selected but is about to be."

From there, Larson, Wald and those who advocated for the survey said that they could not have been happier about the pick of the administration. Architecture and engineering firm Einhorn Yaffee Prescott was asked to conduct the survey of the historic buildings.

Larson said, "The University hired an outstanding team of people to do this. They are nationally known."

The quality of the firm did not seem to be up for debate. "They have got a rich history of doing restoration work and doing surveys on historical buildings ... They went and dug up as much information as they could possibly do through their research efforts," said director of facilities and campus planning, Jim Cahill.

Concerning the impact of the survey, Larson said, "There are still people around the campus who are really pissed off about this. Now, whether a building is significant or not has been decided upon by a professional assessment."

Overall, however, the mood seems to have turned. In an e-mail, Vice Chancellor for Administration and Finance Joyce Hatch said "It was important for the campus to conduct the historical study and it was worth the investment. It provides a more detailed historical perspective than was on file. The historical information will inform the planning and construction process and will help in making good decisions about our future."

Currently, Larson said he is very positive about the way the administration is behaving, especially Jim Cahill, who he says his group has always had "good communications" with.

"At this point, the University is doing some very good things," said Larson. "I want them to receive the credit for doing them. Things are on the right track."

Larson said, looking back on the experience of achieving the survey, "We probably wouldn't have achieved this if they hadn't made those stupid mistakes [not filing their construction plans with the state]."

In a meeting with Mark Harrison and Larry Snyder from the University's Physical Plant and Shane Conklin from Facilities Planning, an outline for building planning at UMass was discussed.

While the buildings that were documented in the historic survey have been filed with the state, Massachusetts still has some questions for UMass. It is estimated by Cahill that the survey will be finalized in the spring of 2010.

It is unclear how the historical survey will impact campus planning in the future. According to Conklin, "How [the historical survey] impacts broader planning ... that is something that is yet to come."

What was made clear is that even if a building is set to be demolished, any essential maintenance is still going to be done by physical plant to ensure the safety of the residents that occupy the space inside.

"Life safety takes precedent always," said Snyder.

Larson said that he wants the historical survey to be a factor in campus planning. How much the historical survey will actually be a factor remains to be seen.

Right now, over the course of a 45-minute interview, there was no concrete chance in the way UMass looks at its projects because of the historical survey.

Conklin said that the historical survey would probably be assessed more closely once its final version has been drafted in order to cohesively compile a strategic document for campus building plans.

'TinkerPlots' program seeks to make data literacy appealing

"We started working on the program in 2000," Konold said. "It was first commercially released in 2004."

TinkerPlots has reached a much wider area then just Massachusetts, Konold and Miller noted, explaining that the program is currently being translated into Russian and Thai for use in their school systems, and that it is already in use in places like Ontario, Canada and Las Vegas, Nev.

Konold said that version three is in the works, though slowly. He explained that the version will be largely based on games where students run analysis through their performance.

"The basic idea is to be able to host class games within the TinkerPlots application," he said. "These are very simple games that students play that create data as they play them and then students analyze the data to improve their game play."

"It's an attempt to teach data analysis in a game context," he added, reflecting the goal of the program.

"The really important thing is learning to analyze, looking at groups and group differences and thinking about how to summarize those," he said.

While Konold said that he handles the educational research and statistics-based elements of the software, the software itself is Miller's forte.

"What I try to do is make it really good and fun, exciting software," he said.

He explained that his background is in designing advanced software and animation, which gives him the ability to make TinkerPlots visually appealing and more mathematically complex than students will see.

"What's really fun about the software is that it was really designed from the ground up," he said. "Not what an expert would do but how a student is trying to learn."

Miller continued to say that what he likes about TinkerPlots is that it gives students who are just beginning to understand statistical concepts the tools experts would have in conducting analysis.

"It's really designed with students in mind, but doing what an expert does," he said.

"I used to work on tools for artists doing video animations, very complex software and very complex statistical software, now we're taking something where somebody with a very simple understanding, and giving them the tools that used to be available only to a professional," he said.

He furthered that he appreciates that TinkerPlots is commercially viable while having a socially relevant impact.

"It's really great working at the University with researchers in education and having the education support the commercial product and the commercial product support the educational aspect," he said.

TinkerPlots has been taught as far away as New Zealand and Australia and as close to home as Amherst and Holyoke, Mass. It is available through Key Curriculum Press.

Sam Butterfield can be reached at sbutterfield@dailycollegian.com

UMass Scientific Reasoning Research Institute (SRRI) fellow Craig Miller believes the commercial product greatly supports education.

Correction

An article published on Dec. 1, 2009 in the Massachusetts Daily Collegian, titled "TinkerPlots aims to raise student interest in learning" incorrectly credited the TinkerPlots program as being developed by Key Curriculum Press. The program is published by Key Curriculum Press, but was developed by Cliff Konold, an educational psychologist and associate research professor and Craig Miller, a software designer at the University of Massachusetts' Scientific Reasoning Research Institute (SRRI). They are now in the process of developing the third version. The two UMass researchers were also misrepresented in the article as being two UMass professors.

President Obama has invited academic, business and labor leaders to the White House jobs summit on Thursday Dec. 3 for the opportunity to hear suggestions about improving the current state of the job market.

Obama convenes jobs summit as Democrats debate stimulus

By Kevin G. Hall
McClatchy-Tribune News Service

WASHINGTON — The nation's 10.2 percent unemployment rate gets renewed attention this week as President Barack Obama hosts a jobs summit on Thursday, a day before the Labor Department reports new job numbers that are unlikely to show significant improvement.

Obama invited academics, business and labor leaders to a White House seminar to hear their suggestions on what might spark them to begin hiring again.

Meanwhile, on Capitol Hill, there's growing Democratic support for a new "jobs bill" to provide more economic stimulus next year. Ideas Congress is weighing include potential tax credits for employers for new hires, a payroll tax holiday for employers, and big government work programs like those of the 1930s, with today's efforts likely to boost inner city jobs and reverse years of neglect.

Democrats worry that the jobless rate will keep rising ahead of congressional elections next year, threatening the majorities they now hold in the House of Representatives and the Senate.

Weighing against new jobs programs, however, are trillions of dollars in projected federal budget deficits over the next decade, which threaten long-term economic stability.

The roughly 130 attendees at Obama's jobs summit will divide into six discussion groups on "green" jobs, boosting small business employment, government infrastructure spending, fostering growth of U.S. exports, business competitiveness and workforce development/training.

"The president is open to all good ideas to supplement the steps we've already taken to put Americans back to work. There are limits to what government can and should do, even during such difficult times. That is why we have invited representatives from across the private sector to discuss how we can work together to continue to spur job creation," said Jennifer Psaki, a White House spokeswoman.

Two issues sure to come up are whether more stimulus spending would boost employment and whether tax cuts, credits or holidays would help spur job creation.

Princeton University economist Alan Blinder, a summit attendee and a former vice chairman of the Federal Reserve, supports public works programs for low-wage workers. However, he warned in a recent article against providing tax credits to employers. It would be hard, he said, to distinguish between new hiring tied to the economic rebound versus hires sparked by tax credits.

William Dunkelberg, chief economist for the National Federation of Independent Business, which represents small businesses, hopes that Obama doesn't pursue tax credits for new hires.

"Our member surveys for plans to add inventory and plans to hire are all coming in at 35-year lows. They have no reason to hire anybody because they don't have anything to do. That's why the tax credit is a silly idea," Dunkelberg said. He said that consumer confidence, expressed in retail sales, must improve before firms consider new hiring.

Economist Mark Zandi favors a limited tax credit.

"If you wanted to give some juice to the job market towards the end of 2010, the best thing probably would be a jobs tax credit with a twist. You'd say, 'I've got $25 billion to spend on this first come, first serve.' You do a 'cash for clunkers' on the tax credit," said Zandi, chief economist for Moody's Economy.com.

White House dinner crashers claim shock

By Mark Silva
McClatchy-Tribune News Service

WASHINGTON — The couple who made their way into a White House state dinner and met the president, vice president and other high-level officials said Tuesday they were not gate crashers and were "shocked and devastated" by those accusations.

Tareq Salahi, making his first television appearance since the dinner that President Barack Obama hosted for Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh on Tuesday, insisted in an interview on NBC's "Today" that the couple was cooperating with a Secret Service investigation of the matter and "the truth will come out."

Salahi, maintaining that, for his wife, Michaele, the experience had been "the most devastating thing that has ever happened," said Tuesday. "We're greatly saddened by all the circumstances ... portraying my wife and I as party crashers. I can tell you we did not party-crash the White House."

Insisting that there is more to the story of their appearance at Obama's first state dinner, Salahi maintained that the explanation will exonerate the couple from any allegations of misconduct.

"We were invited, not crashers," Michaele Salahi said, "and there isn't anyone who would have the audacity or the poor behavior to do that. No one would do that and certainly not us."

Tareq Salahi, maintaining that he had e-mails that support his claim, said, "I am certain we will be completely exonerated."

The e-mails are "clear to us," he said in the "Today" interview from the couple's home. "Based on the timeline, I think the American public is actually going to be extremely surprised with all the details that went from beginning to end into what was supposed to be a lovely, beautiful evening — a lifetime memory."

"A lifetime memory," his wife echoed.

Robert Gibbs, the White House press secretary, said in a televised interview this morning that there was no way to view this incident other than as an unauthorized intrusion.

"This wasn't a misunderstanding," Gibbs said in an interview aired by MSNBC Tuesday morning.

"You don't show up at the White House as a misunderstanding."

The White House says the Secret Service is investigating what happened at the dinner, where two people who were not formally invited managed to make the rounds, shake the president's hand in a receiving line and pose for photographs with Vice President Joe Biden and Chief of Staff Rahm Emanuel.

"I think the president really had the same reaction the Secret Service had," Gibbs said of Obama's response, "and that was great concern for how something like this happened."

As members of Congress call for an investigation and with a House Homeland Security Committee hearing scheduled this week, Salahi maintained that he and his wife are "shocked and devastated" by the portrayals of them as gate crashers.

"No question," said Salahi, characterizing himself as a great admirer of the president.

"It's been devastating what's happened to Michaele and I. ... Our lives have really been destroyed."

Tareq Salahi said he and his wife have been "very candid" with the Secret Service and "have turned over documentation to them. We're going to definitely work with the Secret Service between Michaele and I to really shed light on this."

How fair is fair trade?

Alana Goodman

Today's college students were raised in an era of simple solutions for complex problems. Our generation crams thousands of songs into credit-card-sized MP3 players, stuffs happiness into easy-to-swallow pills and compresses deep thoughts into 140 tweetable-characters.

But can we put social justice into a cup of coffee? Well, on university campuses across the country, students are certainly trying. Frequent the campus center at any given college and you're likely to find a trendy new establishment known as a "fair trade" coffee shop – in contrast, presumably, to those greedy "unfair trade" coffee shops of our parents' generation.

The premise of these new cafés is simple enough. For a slightly steeper price, the shops purchase their coffee beans solely from producers in undeveloped countries that are certified fair trade growers. In order to become certified, producers must commit to certain guidelines, such as promising to pay their coffee pickers a minimum wage salary. Then college students, in their tireless and good-hearted quest for global equality, gladly pick up the tab by paying 75 cents more for their organic double mocha espresso.

It appears to be a win-win situation for all parties, but is it? Evidence is mounting that the people who lose the most from the fair trade craze are the same ones who it was originally designed to help – the poorest of the poor in undeveloped countries.

"[Fair trade is not a panacea, and it does not bring the majority of participants out of poverty," wrote Michigan State University sociology Professor Daniel Jaffee – who spent four years studying the impact of fair trade in Mexico – in his book "Brewing Justice: Fair Trade Coffee, Sustainability and Survival."

Fair trade sets a minimum price floor that importers are required to pay certified coffee producers and tacks on an additional premium of 10 cents to each pound of coffee. With this extra money, coffee growers are expected to provide their laborers with a living salary and safe working conditions. Unfortunately, this isn't always the case. In a Sept. 9, 2006 article, the Financial Times reported that the majority of certified farmers visited by the newspaper were paying workers less than their country's minimum wage. "No one in the industry is paying minimum wage," Eduardo Montauban, head of the Peruvian Coffee Chamber, told the paper. "It's simply not feasible for producers."

But campus coffee shops still continue to peddle fair trade coffee to students, despite evidence that it actually causes more harm than good. And students keep drinking it up.

Moreover, the certification process often leaves the most impoverished coffee growers out in the cold. "Fair trade [certifiers] must pick among farmers on the basis of whether they are able to bring a buyer to the table and whether they meet fair-trade standards, not on the basis of need," wrote Marc Sidwell in a 2008 study by the Adam Smith Institute (ASI). Unable to qualify, many farmers in undeveloped countries struggle to compete against the financially-backed fair trade-certified growers.

Even if these problems could be resolved, the fundamental theory of the fair trade coffee campaign stands on shaky economic ground. The movement began in the early 1990s to counter plunging coffee prices caused by a surplus in the market. However, the minimum price floors created by fair trade organizations have caused the coffee growing industry to become even more saturated with farmers eager to capitalize on the artificially high prices.

"We're hurting because of overproduction," Edmundo Roman, a Nicaraguan coffee farmer, told Claudia Adrien of Florida Fly-Ins in 2004. "The bottom line is that coffee is everywhere."

Even worse, the fair trade movement props up unsustainable farming communities instead of helping them develop more marketable industries. "[In] the time it takes 500 people in Guatemala to fill a large container with coffee the same amount of coffee can be picked in Brazil by five people and a mechanical harvester. Fair trade supports inefficient, labour-intensive cooperatives in a battle they can never win, trapping them in their poverty," noted Sidwell.

But campus coffee shops still continue to peddle fair trade coffee to students, despite evidence that it actually causes more harm than good. And students keep drinking it up.

The fact is, we're not going to finagle a path to global equality by overcharging for cups of coffee. But by implementing the tried-and-true principles of free trade, we can begin to create opportunity for the world's poor. This means the opportunity for coffee growers to compete on an open market free of restrictive tariffs, the opportunity for farmers to replace the stagnation of unsustainable industries with the growth of new enterprise and the opportunity for them to strive for something more out of life than a minimum wage salary.

And unlike fair trade – which benefits only a few of the world's poor at the expense of others, free trade can improve the lives of everyone. That's real fairness.

Meaningful outreach for UMass

In recent weeks, the University of Massachusetts' Alumni Association's self esteem issue has resurfaced, but it will take more than a good-faith facelift to fix it.

Articles published by the Boston Globe and this newspaper have highlighted the association's poor performance in attracting alumni to association membership. Currently, fewer than three percent of alumni pay dues to the group. This begs a simple question repeated to 215,000 alumni: Why don't you like me?

A healthy membership empowers the University's causes in state government and improves its image through the simple retelling of its members' supposed success stories. When an association so closely associated with the University cannot retain addressable alumni at rates comparable to its peer institutions, UMass' image is damaged, and its causes go unheard at a time when the University faces financial crisis amid shrinking support from the statehouse. Perhaps worst of all, a mere three percent of 215,000 can be relied upon to say this is a shame.

Of the students questioned by this newspaper, many sympathized with the association's troubles. They said the University often felt impersonal – that it lacked something like a big-name athletics program to bring students together.

Executive Director Anna Symington added that low membership could be attributed to the University's awkward geographic location, a weak economy and the confusion alumni encounter when they cannot understand the difference between paying their dues to the association and making donations to the University's fundraising groups.

The points seem logical, so to make membership more attractive, Symington detailed ambitious plans. She spoke of dropping a $40 yearly membership fee, making lifetime memberships more accessible and automatically incorporating all alumni into the association.

This confusion cannot be eased by automatic membership and altruistic donations, however. It only further erases lines of differentiation between the University's fundraising operations and the association, which is independently run. The two work together, but they are not the same.

Instead, the association must also look at how current students interact with one another. It might notice that they make their large, seemingly impersonal environments shrink to the personal and comfortable when students find their own small communities through RSOs and academic activities. Rather than separating the University's population into students and alumni, the association needs to not only acknowledge how these communities are created, but use them to their advantage. Identifying and learning about how students currently enjoy the University will allow it to target their predecessors more effectively.

A former Greeno Sub Shop sandwich maker might be more likely to donate or pay dues if the association worked with its current students more closely and if a portion of their donation went directly to programs with which they were formerly associated. Former SGA presidents would be more likely to say "yes" to a networking dinner with others who have similar experiences. The association cannot afford to mishandle this restructuring. It has a great potential to improve the conditions of former and current students if it can look beyond branding and into bonding. Forget passing out key chains, lanyards and 8:00 a.m. pancake breakfasts.

Instead, ask what keys hang on those chains – if they are to club offices, RSOs or other groups. Eliminating dues may make the association membership cheap, but from there, it's your responsibility to make sure it doesn't become worthless.

An unimpressive group of Democrats

Nick Milano

Next Tuesday, Massachusetts voters will hopefully stream to the polls to choose their Democratic and Republican candidates for U.S. Senate. An incredibly short primary campaign fast approaches its finale even though it still feels as though Sen. Edward "Ted" Kennedy died just yesterday. This is not due to the grief in the wake of his death or the hysteria that surrounded his funeral and burial. The lack of interest that seems to have been generated by the primary campaign can be blamed squarely on the candidates running. Not a single one of them has distinguished him or herself above the others, especially on the Democratic side.

For the Republicans, it appears state Sen. Scott Brown will easily win, only to eventually be trounced, assuredly, by the Democratic candidate. Who his opponent will be remains to be seen, but if I had my pick, I would like to choose E. None of the above.

This whole campaign has felt like the Republican presidential campaign with each of the candidates jumping to compare themselves to a dead predecessor. For Mitt Romney, John McCain and others, it was President Reagan. For Martha Coakley, Steve Pagliuca, Alan Khazei and Mike Capuano, it is Kennedy. Yet there is much to be desired.

I thought I knew who I was going to vote for and I had already formed my opinion at least a year and a half ago. But with the election getting closer and closer, what I thought was a perfect reasoning for supporting Capuano has faded into utter confusion.

None of the candidates are head and shoulders above the others. Starting with Capuano, there are plenty of reasons for one to go from supporter to just another disillusioned Massachusetts voter.

Capuano's take-no-prisoners attitude, called "Kennedy-esque" in the Boston Herald's endorsement, is what first attracted me to him. Though a graduate of Dartmouth College and Boston College Law School, he has fought for the working class and carries himself as such. Yet, his ties to Rep. John Murtha and the prolific Washington D.C. lobbyist, PMA Group, as reported by the Boston Phoenix and the Boston Globe, make it hard to support him unconditionally.

Federal authorities are investigating PMA for a pay-to-play scheme in which the group gave campaign funds to members of Congress in exchange for earmarks and contracts. In fact, Capuano was ranked by Congressional Quarterly 11th on a list of 104 "Congressmen who had sponsored earmarks ... for PMA Group clients" according to the Boston Phoenix. Capuano has since donated the money to Boston-area charities, but according to the Boston Globe, he had not returned all of it. If he is elected to the Senate, a position of more power and influence, will he remain an easy target for lobbyists?

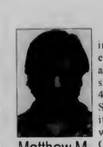
The other career politician in the race is Martha Coakley, who has run her campaign the way any presumed frontrunner should. Her poll position suggests she is on the way to an easy win on Dec. 8, but this raises plenty of questions.

Her eagerness to run for the Senate cannot be denied and her ambition is well-deserved, as she has moved steadily upward in Massachusetts politics from Middlesex District Attorney to Attorney General, but will her ambition be fulfilled being one of 100 senators? For too long, Massachusetts' representatives in the Senate have been concerned with higher office. Either Kennedy's desire to be president or pressure around him to be president forced him to consider the office twice. Would Sen. Kerry have voted for the Iraq War Resolution if he was not thinking of a presidential run in 2004?

We do not need a senator who will hedge his or her bets politically in hopes of making it to the White House instead of putting Massachusetts voters first.

We do not need a senator who will hedge his or her bets politically in hopes of making it to the White House instead of putting Massachusetts voters first.

Steve Pagliuca and Alan Khazei are the two outsiders. Both are refusing to accept funds from lobbyists, but this does not mean they automatically deserve to win.



Pagliuca is an incredibly wealthy businessman. His remarkable business success cannot be overlooked, because as Boston Globe writer Alex Beam put it best, if becoming rich were easy, many more people would be rich, but do middle and low-income people want another fabulously wealthy senator supposedly fighting on their behalf?

So it all comes down to Alan Khazei. The co-founder of City Year has assembled a large active grassroots campaign. He seems generally acceptable, though his defense of President Obama's plan for Afghanistan will certainly be troublesome for some voters. There are more positives and negatives, however.

All of the candidates are expected to vote for the same things – they have very similar positions. Alan Khazei seems like the best alternative to the one mixed up with lobbyists, the ambitious career politician and the millionaire businessman. Besides, when choosing between the two outsiders, all that matters is that Pagliuca is a minor owner of the Celtics and Theo Epstein held a fundraiser for Khazei. I know who I'm going with. Red Sox trump the Celtics any day of the week.

Repeating mistakes, Bush style

Matthew M. Robare

It only took 11 months. Back in January, everyone experienced a sense of national unity as Chief Justice John Roberts swore in Barack Obama as the 44th president of the United States. We all felt it in our hearts; it seemed like the land itself was whispering with exctement: Change, real change, change for the better. It was the same sense of optimism that marks 1950s nostalgia, a belief that faith and hard work will see us through anything. Prosperity, the new president's advisors, was only a few pieces of legislation away.

Now it is the afternoon of the first of December and once more there is a certain spirit in the air. If it had a form it would be a sneering face, mouth contorted in superior laughter.

It is the spirit of mockery, for just a few hours ago the truth was revealed: Nothing important has changed, only the illusion of change has come. Not only that, but far from being a decisive and visionary president, Obama has shown his true colors.

He is not the servant of the people, defending the Constitution against the encroachment of tyranny. Instead, Obama, like every other recent president, has shown himself to be the rag-doll of the war lords at the Pentagon and the gang of thieves on Wall Street.

For on Dec. 1, Barack H. Obama, president of the United States and winner of the Nobel Peace Prize, announced he was escalating the war in Afghanistan.

How he must be laughing. How many Americans voted for him because they thought he would end the wars? How many people around the world supported him because he was going to be a force for peace and international cooperation? So much for our hope of a Messiah. Does it give him pleasure to order people to their death? To kill other people? No honest person could think that increasing the numbers of an occupying force would make the occupied love them. After all, Americans are in Afghanistan to kill every Afghani who refuses to surrender their freedom to Washington's puppet government.

The Taliban is bad, but that does not give Washington the right to determine what form of the government – if any – there is to be in Afghanistan, much less Iran, Iraq, Somalia, Moldova, the Ukraine and North Korea.

Supporters of the public option for health care like to say that current practices put profits ahead of people. So does war. War is nothing but the systematic maiming of hundreds of thousands of people. Think of the American wounded and dead and then remember that the other side, the terrorists, gooks or "collateral damage" have wounded and dead, too. This war has gained absolutely nothing for the United States except casualties.

Do I truly know what happened on that fateful November day? No, but I have my hunches.

Do I truly know what happened on that fateful November day? No, but I have my hunches.

Those men and women signed on to protect this country and instead they've been busy dying to occupy a Third World country. But some people have benefitted.

The news conglomerates get high ratings from showing missile strikes and pundits debating the war, Republican politicians have benefitted from bamboozling us into believing that the war is as a matter of national defense, Democratic politicians have been able to hoodwink us into believing that they'll end the war, weapons manufacturers and developers – such as former Vice President Cheney's company Halliburton and Sen. Feinstein's husband's company Perini – have made millions off the bloodshed, to say nothing of their individual and investment bank investors.

Many of the companies making money off the wars contributed millions of dollars to Obama's presidential campaign and get billions in government contracts and bailouts. The generals, when they retire, become wealthy from lobbying and sitting on the boards of these companies.

The American soldiers on the ground have the best weaponry and other technology money can buy.

When they are wounded they receive the best medical care possible and while not the best health plan, the Veteran's Administration is pretty good at caring for them. According to iCasualties.org, there have been 929 American fatalities.

Only the impoverished Afghanis, their fields and roads still mined from the Soviet invasion, their one cash crop – opium poppies – banned in most countries, suffer.

But who cares about them? Bush is out of office and Obama is for "change." Notice how quiet the Campus Anti-War Network has been? They used to have big rallies and film showings in the Campus Center. Their website was last updated back in October. Apparently war is fine under a Democratic presidency. It makes me glad to know that one anti-war group still table in the campus center every Wednesday and peace activists still assemble on the Amherst town common on Sunday.

In 2008 Vincent Bugliosi, best known as the prosecuting attorney in the trial of Charles Manson, wrote a book entitled "The Prosecution of George W. Bush for Murder." He argued that Bush is responsible for the deaths of American soldiers and Iraqis and should be charged with murder. Well, now Obama has made the war his own. In my view, that makes him an accessory to murder.

But we can all know the truth about Obama and his puppeteers now. The 30,000 more troops are all over the headlines, and soon they'll be filling up the cemeteries and hospitals.

Stop him, before he kills again.

Tranquility in performance at Pearl Street

By Garth Brody
Collegian Staff

Hailing from Scotland, the current members of Camera Obscura came to the Pearl Street Night Club on Nov. 24. Throughout their set, the alternative pop group focused on singles from their most recently released album, 'My Maudlin Career.'

Last Tuesday night, Scottish indie-popsters Camera Obscura filled the Pearl Street Ballroom with an easy warmth.

With the drowsy but radiant baroque pop of The Papercuts, the ballroom was already swaying dreamily – they sounded equal parts Beach House and The Zombies. It's fortunate that these openers were less energetic than the headliners (or maybe there were just fewer people in the band), because the stoic stage character of Camera Obscura could have been a let-down after anybody more dynamic than The Papercuts.

Instead, the euphonic atmosphere built gradually. So when Camera Obscura's frontwoman Tracyanne Campbell broke into "My Maudlin Career," the title track off their most recent album, the energy was concentrated in the music. There wasn't much seen in the performers with the exception of trumpeter Tim Cronin, who split his duties between his primary instrument and various percussion, including glockenspiel and maracas, the drummer's cymbals.

But the band's relative immobility did not detract from the performance. It kept up a certain dynamic interplay. Keyboardist Carey Lander, who did about as much moving around as a keyboardist could – which is to say that she sometimes removed a hand from the keys and allowed herself some slight grooving room – exchanged periodic sidelong grins with Campbell.

The subtlety in the visual performance underlined the delicately crafted simplicity in the music. Gone were the sweeping string arrangements like those of "Careless Love." The band surrounded Campbell's lovely vocal hooks with a balmy wall of guitar, punctuated by bouncy keys and drums. The effect was a uniformly satisfying experience that recalled the mono sound of classic 1960s pop. Phil Spector would have been proud.

The band's set drew mostly from its two most recent albums, "Let's Get Out of This Country" and "My Maudlin Career" – where the two biggest crowd-pleasing highlights of the night were fittingly derived. From the former, they played the wistful "Hey Lloyd, I'm Ready to Be Heartbroken," instantly recognizable from the theatrical organ lead-in. From the latter, they played the more upbeat "French Navy," the final song before the encore. The band performed the set's tunes faithfully, delivering completely on their recorded charm; Campbell's voice was just as disarming in person as on the albums.

The music had just enough range to maintain interest throughout the set, and the tight structure of almost every song didn't hurt. The group dipped into the more obvious country influence of their earlier albums, but the occasional lazy drawl never distracted from the music's core attitude. With compositions so heavily steeped in tried-and-true musical tradition, it was easy to get lost in the perfected pop style.

The apex of the show's energy was reached with the closing track from "My Maudlin Career," the ebullient "Honey In the Sun." Even if the lyrics told a story of disappointment and regret, the song sounded like its title, channeling concentrated musical joy through fluttering vocal and trumpet melody lines. With a rhythm far peppier than anything else played that night, the song was a blinding light in the set's fragile glow. Everything that followed looked a bit dim in comparison, but dim was the brilliant tint of their music.

Camera Obscura's concert was like a warm bath. Even before the openers plugged in, the P.A. scored the stage set-up with songs to sway to, like Beach House's "Gila" (three times, in fact). The atmosphere was consistent – dreamy and easy – and the music was simple, loud and pleasant. The encore closed with the sole glorious rock 'n' roll gesture of the set – a beautifully protracted noisy outro. Guitars raised, they held the last note until the room was soaked in it.

Shoppers pause to peruse through some of the household products said to help prevent the spread of swine flu. Hand sanitizers like the ones pictured above have been made available in the UMass dining commons.

Top 9 ways to catch swine flu

By Elyse Horowitz
Collegian Staff

9. Don't clean your apartment for weeks – even after you have friends over.

Studies show that a lack of cleanliness of surfaces in the home, such as doorknobs, tabletops, counters, etc. can lead to a greater susceptibility to contracting swine flu. With dirt and germs sitting around like that, it's no wonder. A quick fix? Stock up on some cleaning wipes from your neighborhood convenience store or look for antibacterial sprays that you can use with a paper towel.

8. Don't throw away the tissues you've used to cough or sneeze into.

If you have the decency to use a tissue, instead of your sleeves in the first place, finish the job by disposing of it properly. While it is important to use tissues when you cough, sneeze or blow your nose, leaving those used tissues lying around, even in your own home, can go against your other efforts to prevent swine flu. Using tissues is only half the battle.

7. Stay up during the night writing a paper or watching the game, then get up for your 8 a.m. class – three nights in a row.

Remember when your mom told you there's a reason for your bedtime? It's still true! Getting an appropriate amount of sleep is vital, especially when attempting to ward of the H1N1 virus. The hours you spend sleeping are your body's way of rebooting, and a few extra hours a night could seriously slice your susceptibility to sickness.

6. Use unwashed utensils when you eat on campus.

While it is difficult to abide by this general rule when dining where so many others have dined before, it is also rather simple to check your eating tools before diving into your scrumptious plate of chow. Also, make sure you wipe down your booth before taking a seat, and never, I mean never, eat something off the tabletop.

5. Spend time with someone who has a fever, cough, sore throat, etc.

While this isn't a sure-fire way of contracting anything, this general health care warning is one to heed in terms of the swine flu, as it is mostly contagious through airborne exposure. Ignoring the signs of someone else's illness does not mean that your body will ignore the germs. Those who have H1N1 have been told to quarantine themselves or wear masks when in public, and for good reason.

4. Share cups, chapstick, food or toothbrushes with your friends and neighbors.

While this is a general health no-no, it often falls under the "well, we're best friends, so it's O.K." category. Your best friends may be clear of swine flu to their knowledge; however, with an incubation period of up to eight days, it is still not a wise choice to share anything.

3. Rub your eyes and nose as much as possible.

An other "mother knows best" rule of thumb. Believe it or not, the wet consistencies of your eyes and nasal cavities are more likely to contract germs that you pick up on your hands unknowingly throughout the day. Additionally, because these orifices lead straight into your body, it's like an infestation of flu germs waiting to happen.

2. Make out with a lot of people you don't know, and don't question their health.

With no intention of passing judgment regarding the weekend goings-on of college life, it is definitely a wise choice to shy away from locking lips with someone you've just met, if for no other reason than for the fear of coming down with the dreaded swine. The guys may flock to you like flies to honey, but it is a wise choice to keep yourself from swapping saliva with someone without making sure they're not sick. And, of course, that they don't have any cooties...

1. Never wash your hands.

It's simple really, and most bathrooms on campus even have highly enjoyable foam soap! Health care providers say that using soap and warm water for approximately 20 seconds as often as possible is one of the best ways to prevent yourself from getting sick, no matter what illness you're trying to steer clear of. Not a sink in sight? The dining commons now have multiple hand sanitizer dispensers stationed inside their doors, or pick up a small bottle to keep with you when you go out. No matter the cost, or the strength of the smell, it is a much better alternative than spending a week sick on the couch.

Discussion to honor feminist figures and historical literature

By Lisa Linsley
Collegian Correspondent

This afternoon at 2 p.m., panelists from the University of Massachusetts and Hampshire College will hold a discussion titled "The Master's Tools Will Never Dismantle the Master's House."

The panelists are a part of the Feminist Foundations' Feminist Futures Series, which contains a number of events put on by the UMass women, gender and sexuality studies program to commemorate its 35 years, which has recently been renamed from "women's studies" after debate and discussion. The change in name took place due to the fact that the field of study encompasses more than the analysis of women; rather, women's studies focuses on the interlocking formations of gender, race, nationality, ethnicity, class and sexuality.

The Feminist Foundations Feminist Futures panels and events discuss these changes and topics.

"Every year, the program hosts a series called 'Feminist Foundations' which explores the field of women, gender and sexuality studies," said Banu Subramaniam, associate professor in the UMass women, gender and sexuality studies department.

The series is designed to be a retrospective and reflective exploration of the field, structured around four famous and foundational quotes. One is a quote by Audre Lorde, a legendary black feminist poet and theorist. In her famous essay, "Can the Master's Tools Dismantle the Master's House?" she explores questions of change and what is possible in working within systems, using the theories and tools of institutionalized structures of power.

"The Master's Tools Will Never Dismantle the Master's House" lecture reflects on feminism and activism since the 1970s when the UMass women's studies program was created. The panel will include speakers from various Hampshire and UMass departments, including associate professor Alexandrina Deschamps from the UMass women, gender and sexuality studies department, professor Sonia Alvarez from the UMass political science department, Shelly Perdomo, director of diversity programs in the UMass engineering minority program, assistant professor Diana Yoon from the UMass legal studies department and professor Margaret Cerullo from Hampshire College's school of social sciences.

The event is open to the public and is free admission. It will take place in Bartlett Hall room 61, from 4:00 p.m. until 6:00 p.m.

New reality fashion competition premiering tonight on Bravo

By Anne Bratskeir
Newsday

Reason to Watch: If you like the anxiety level, of say, going to a critical final exam in college and having forgotten to study, then this may be the show for you. There is much tension in this sometimes unsettling "Project Runway" wannabe, not to mention the overwhelming feeling that many of the contestants have absolutely no idea what they are doing.

This is another attempt by Bravo to fill the void left by "Project Runway," which, after a lengthy legal dispute, ended up on Lifetime. Last season, the network tried out Isaac Mizrahi and Kelly Rowland as hosts of the mediocre "The Fashion Show."

"Launch My Line" is a more complicated take on the formula.

What it's About: Hosted by Canadian twin brothers, Dean and Dan Caten, the design duo behind the successful DSQUARED label. Ten "professionals," such as an architect, a jewelry designer, a choreographer or a self-proclaimed fashion writer – dandy with aspirations of becoming fashion designers – are thrown together with 10 designer types, as in people who can sew. Their common, um, thread, is a passion for fashion, and the winner gets a clothing line launch and a spread in Lucky magazine. Their teammate-designer wins $50,000. The teams compete in challenges each week, show their duds to a live audience and are judged. The kiss-off line? "Your line has been dropped."

My Say: After watching just one episode, you will fall in love with one professional – Marilyn Crawford, a CEO who looks uncannily like Queen Latifah – and despises at least two of the designers. Evoking strong emotions is the stuff of good TV. And some of the clothes are surprisingly fab. That said, there's a problem: The playing field for both the professionals and the designers is way too uneven.

Bottom Line: "Launch My Line" is a more complicated take on the "Project Runway" formula. Reality-show junkies who like fashion may find it compelling.

Correction

After press time, editors at The Massachusetts Daily Collegian discovered that an article published Dec. 1, 2009, entitled "Student enterprising a driving force at the 'Zoo'" contained an apparent conflict of interest. The author, Kristin Vaselacopoulos, had previously done publicity work for Popular Campus Entertainment, including social media marketing. While we found nothing factually inaccurate about the article, the fact that Collegian editors were unaware of this relationship and failed to disclose it is a violation of our content policies. Minutewomen dominating Atlantic 10 in foul shooting

By Steve Levine
Collegian Staff

In the game of basketball, sometimes free throws are overlooked.

That has not been the case for Massachusetts women's basketball team lately, which now owns the best free throw percentage in the Atlantic 10, at 78.9 percent.

Leading the way for the Minutewomen at the line is sophomore forward Kristina Danella, who has not missed a free throw in her last 27 opportunities.

"She's just a tremendous shooter," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said. "I'm just happy that she's getting fouled."

Last Friday against Rice, Danella led all scorers with 21 points (12 free throws). Her perfect free throw percentage matched a program single game record, last set by Melissa Gurile who made all 15 shots against Providence in 1993. UMass finished the game hitting 22-of-23 from the charity stripe (95.7 percent), the best mark of any team in the A-10 this season.

"It's huge," Dacko said. "So much of our offense is dictated by getting to the hoop and getting fouled. "It's not good if we get to the bucket, get fouled and don't hit free throws."

The Minutewomen rely on their post players to get inside and get to the basket, increasing their chances of getting fouled along the way. Although free throws are a large part of UMass' game, it would be impractical to spend a lot of time on it during practice.

"Right now I'm just focused on players getting to the line and making shots," she said. "Our short term goals are dictated game by game. We definitely want to outrebound opponents and get to the foul line. Most of our emphasis is on defense and how it should create our offense. We don't put a lot of emphasis on free throw shooting because when our players get to the line they know they have to make the shots."

Right now, Danella ranks fourth in the A-10 with an 89.4 percent free throw percentage. Her streak of 27 straight free-throws is the longest by a Minutewomen since Kathy Coyner converted 31 straight in 1998.

"I want more of our post players getting to the bucket and getting fouled more so they can get to the line," Dacko said. "I just hope [Danella] is contagious so everyone else can step up to the line and knock them down like she does."

The best example of Danella's timely shooting came in the season opener against Boston University. She went to the line after getting fouled from 3-point range with 17 seconds in the game and tied the game. UMass eventually won, 79-73.

Free throw shooting comes down to the individual player. It is the most independent aspect of the team sport. For the most part, Dacko's players are on their own when it comes to foul shooting.

"The kids know what they have to do," Dacko said. "It's such a mental preparation and they have to get in their own routine. What we preach is that [practicing free throws] is up to them. If kids are having problems with it then we'll force their hand and have them practice it a little more but for the most part, they work a lot on it themselves."

A-10 names Nicholson, Spears to Player of the Week honors

By Herb Scribner
Collegian Staff

The Atlantic 10 men's basketball division named its two Players of the Week yesterday. Sophomore Andrew Nicholson and junior Shamari Spears received the awards after stunning performances from their respective games.

Nicholson earned the award after he scored 22 points and nabbed 13 rebounds for St. Bonaventure, which won its first two games at the Basketball Travelers classic, hosted by Illinois State.

Part of Nicholson's award-winning showcase came during the Bonnies' 67-44 rout over Southeast Missouri State. In his 26 minutes of play, Nicholson got a double-double with 15 points and 12 rebounds.

On Nov. 28, St. Bonaventure (4-2) claimed a 98-71 rout over Norfolk State. During the game, Nicholson had his moment with career highs in points (29) and rebounds (14). This was also his fifth career game where he scored at least 20 points.

Nicholson's field goal percentage (70 percent) leads the A-10 as the hottest shooter in the conference.

In the two games Charlotte had this weekend, Spears was the most valuable of players. He averaged 27 points and five rebounds in the 49ers' (4-1) pair of victories.

When Charlotte took down Yale, 88-74, on Nov. 23, Spears had 28 points and shot 13-of-15 from the field. On Nov. 24, Spears came up with 26 points and a pair of blocks when the 49ers held off Hofstra, 80-72.

Similar to Nicholson, Spears also had four games with at least 20 points, and leads the A-10 in scoring (24.4 points per game).

Lone Ram

Freshman Akeem Richmond was the only first-year player to receive the Rookie of the Week award yesterday, as he contributed largely to Rhode Island's three-game sweep this past week.

In each of the three games, Richmond scored in double digits. In the first game for the Rams (4-0), Richmond scored 10 points in 15 minutes, leading to a 92-75 victory over Holy Cross. Richmond shot 50 percent from the field during the game.

The second win for Rhode Island came on Nov. 24 against Stony Brook, 75-58. During the game, Richmond once again scored 10 points, followed up with four rebounds.

The freshman saved the best for last on Nov. 28 when he scored 11 points in Rhode Islands' 75-65 win over Davidson. Richmond drained three 3-pointers, the most by any Rams' freshman since 2006.

Jimmy Baron previously held the record against Temple.

Double-doubles no help

While junior Jerrell Williams and freshman Aaric Murray recorded double-doubles for La Salle in its Nov. 28 match against No. 4 Villanova, it was not enough to earn them a victory.

The Wildcats (5-0) took down the Explorers (3-2), 81-63. This was the first time that two La Salle players earned a double-double in the same game since Feb. 25, 2004, when the Explorers lost 74-70 in overtime.

Williams' 16 rebounds (12 offensive) was the most by a La Salle player since present NBA player Rasual Butler grabbed 20 rebounds back on Nov. 18, 2002.

In Murray's first career Big Five Tournament, he had 14 rebounds. Both Williams and Murray scored 15 points, nearly half of the Explorers' points in the contest.

Minutemen host Quinnipiac at Mullins

Kellogg hoping young players will get past tough losses to Michigan State, Rutgers in N.J.

By Adam Miller
Collegian Staff

Saturday's loss to No. 9 Michigan State could have two very different effects on the Massachusetts men's basketball team, according to coach Derek Kellogg.

Either the Minutemen (2-4) will be inspired by seeing what a Final Four contender does to win games, or they will look at the 106-68 score and lose the momentum from the two straight wins they had before Thanksgiving.

Kellogg is hoping it's not the latter.

"While the score is indicative of how the game went, I hope it didn't damage our psyche as a team," Kellogg said.

UMass' next opponent isn't at the same level as the Spartans, or even Rutgers, but Kellogg believes that Quinnipiac is still a team that will provide a challenge at the Mullins Center tonight.

The Bobcats (3-2) are coming off a three-point loss to Navy, but are still one of the better teams in the Northeast Conference. Kellogg expects Quinnipiac to feel pretty confident about its chances at competing with the Minutemen, despite the recent loss.

"They played a good schedule for their team and their program and I'm just hoping that we can get better as a team and play hard defense and make it rough on them," he said.

The Bobcats have a mostly veteran roster with four freshmen on their 15-player roster. At the helm is shooting guard James Feldeine (17.2 points per game). The senior is not only the top scorer on his team, but is also a strong rebounding force.

Feldeine is second on the team in rebounds per game with six despite being a 6-foot-4 guard.

Quinnipiac also has a strong inside player in junior Justin Rutty. He averages 15.2 points per game and leads the team in rebounds (8.4). However, he and the rest of the Bobcats are going to have a hard time with the Minutemen, who are much bigger inside.

Rutty, who stands at 6-foot-7, is the tallest active player Quinnipiac has. Forward Eric Coggins (6-9) is the team's biggest player, but he only played five minutes this season and probably won't even see playing time tonight.

The Bobcats' lack of size should bode well for UMass, who isn't all that big, but features Hashim Bailey and Sean Carter up front.

Neither player will be dominant inside scorers; however, they both have the ability to rebound.

Carter (6.7 rpg) leads the Minutemen in rebounding with his athleticism and long body. Carter started every game at center except for the last one against MSU, where he played power forward while Bailey started in the middle.

The Memphis transfer comes off arguably the best game of his career. He blocked a shot and grabbed seven rebounds in 25 minutes against the Spartans.

UMass' size advantage is even greater thanks to the new freshmen. Sampson Carter and Terrell Vinson started every game of the season until Thanksgiving Break. After the St. Francis win, Kellogg felt encouraged with both of their progress.

Sampson Carter and Vinson finished with 13 points against the Terriers and shot better than 50 percent from the field.

"I think these last few games were good stepping stones for [the freshmen]," Harris said following the Nov. 24 win. "They got their confidence up. You could see them out on the floor playing with confidence."

It was a different story for them when the Minutemen played in Atlantic City. Both struggled on the offensive end and grabbing rebounds, but it was against competition that Kellogg didn't feel that his team was ready for.

He hopes that won't necessarily be the case against the Bobcats.

Adam Miller can be reached at amiller@dailycollegian.com

Freshman Terrell Vinson (2) follows in a lay-up attempt as center Sean Carter (42) battles a rebound. UMass (2-4) is hoping to shake off the Michigan State loss tonight against Quinnipiac.

Anthony Gurley squares up for a shot over a St. Francis defender. The Minutemen play their first game at home since their win over the Terriers.

UM battling weekend injuries

Kellogg looking for Correia, Bailey, Farrell to heal quickly

By David Brinch
Collegian Staff

After two tough losses this past weekend in the Legends Classic, the Massachusetts men's basketball team is feeling the effects of playing back-to-back contests on the road to strong teams early in the season.

"It was a long weekend, and I thought ... now you are basically playing two BCS teams, one that is rated in the top five in the country and another one that is much improved in the Big East," UMass coach Derek Kellogg said. "I thought they were both obviously pretty good challenges for us."

Junior guard Gary Correia, redshirt junior center Hashim Bailey and freshman forward Javorn Farrell are suffering from minor injuries, that might affect how the Minutemen game plan for Quinnipiac tonight. Farrell sat out Monday's practice after playing 13 minutes and scoring three points against the Spartans.

The freshman played in all six games, averaging four points per game and 2.7 rebounds per game, while being a constant on the defensive side of the ball.

"Playing so many games in such a short period of time with such young guys, they tend to get injury-prone a little bit," Kellogg said.

Bailey sat out the game against Arkansas-Fort Smith with a groin pull, but logged the most minutes of his career (25) against the Spartans on Saturday, while securing seven rebounds.

UMass gave up 100 points Saturday for the first time since 2007, when the Minutemen had a 107-100 win at Syracuse.

With some of his players being a little banged up, Kellogg wants to focus on making key stops and rebounding against a Bobcats team that is coming off a buzzer-beater defeat against Navy Monday night, and playing through the pain.

"I want to see us get a little bit tougher and a bit better defensively, is the actual goal right now," Kellogg said.

Harris to play more point

Senior guard Ricky Harris (15 points) made his career debut bringing the ball up against the Spartans. However, Kellogg liked what he saw from the Minutemen's leading scorer, who finished 5-for-11 shooting, including 2-for-5 from 3-point range in 24 minutes.

"I'm hoping he can play some point and not have it affect his scoring, because now he has the ball in his hands and in that juncture, you want him to score," Kellogg said. "But you also want him to score the basketball and make the right plays, and it's a work in progress."

This could impact sophomore guard David Gibbs and Correia, who both have experience bringing the ball up. Gibbs started the first five games at point, averaging 2.7 points per game in 22.7 minutes, while Correia has helped off the bench.

Against the Spartans, Kellogg wanted to start his most mature and physical players, so he started Bailey, Sean Carter and Anthony Gurley, who has scored in double-figures in all six games this season.

"Against Michigan State, I was trying to play the most mature, oldest team possible to compete with their size and physicality, and it worked for about five minutes," Kellogg said.

Harris currently averages 17.7 points per game, and is now 10th all-time in career scoring with 1,453 points.

Dacko hoping to use defense in game against Northeastern

By Mike Mastone
Collegian Staff

After giving up 82 points in a blowout loss to St. John's in the second game of the season, the Massachusetts women's basketball team made significant improvements on the defensive end and looks to carry that same intensity into Northeastern this afternoon.

The Minutewomen (3-3) are coming off arguably their best defensive performance of the season. In a six-point loss to Miami on Saturday, UMass held a high octane Hurricane (8-0) offense (83 points per game) to 63 on 31.3 percent shooting from the field. That is the most the Minutewomen have allowed in their past four games.

"I am very pleased with what we did in Miami," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said. "We played a strong Miami team that was averaging 50 rebounds and 85 points per game, so holding them to [63 points] was great."

UMass finished second in the Miami Thanksgiving Tournament after defeating Rice (0-6) to make it to the finals. The team won two of its past three games, which Dacko says is because of her team's improvements in rebounding and on defense.

"I think rebounding will continue to be a work in progress," Dacko said. "[Our improvements] are having an effect on our ability to move the ball from side to side, which is leading to great team play and getting to the foul line. We are being more physical and aggressive, so we are boxing out and playing better one-on-one defense."

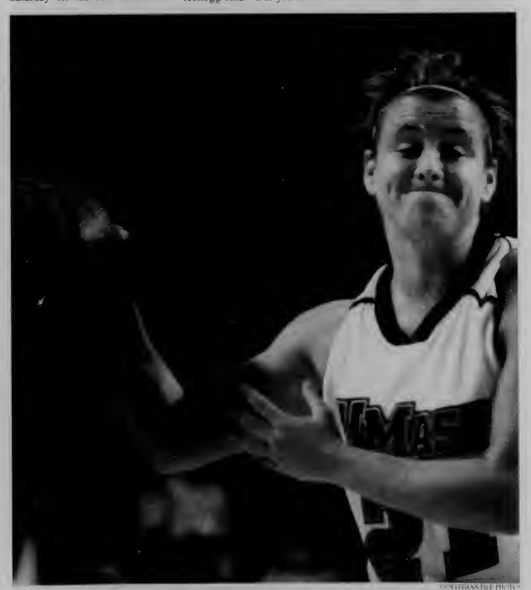
Sophomore Kristina Danella has been the team's biggest offensive weapon thus far, and enters the game with 27 consecutive free-throws. The guard is averaging 15.5 ppg and has led UMass in scoring in five of the team's six games. Her strongest efforts came against Boston University and Rice, where she scored 21 points in each game.

Nicole Jones also stepped up after a breakout game against Villanova. She shot 4-of-8 from the field for nine points against Rice, and also hauled in five rebounds and blocked four shots. Her strong play continued against Miami, where she had 13 points, six boards and two blocks.

Dacko feels that the strong play of Danella, Jones and senior Diatiema Hill contributed directly to the team's improvements. She also hopes to get more young players incorporated into the offense.

"Hill did a great job defensively and Jones and Danella made the All-Tournament team as sophomores," Dacko said. "That shows that the young players are stepping up. The goal is getting more and more minutes for the younger players in hopes of developing five people that can score in double figures."

Northeastern enters the matchup looking for its fourth win in five games. The Huskies (3-2) rolled past Army, 77-45, on Saturday to earn their third victory of the season.



The sophomore trio of Brittany Wilson, Jamie Conroy and Kashaia Cannon lead the Northeastern attack. Wilson could be considered the team's top threat on both ends, leading the Huskies with 12.2 ppg and 2.2 steals per game. However, she is also the team leader in turnovers (17) through five games.

Conroy trails Wilson with 11 ppg. The 5-foot-7 inch guard is very consistent on the offensive end, shooting a team high 66.7 percent from the field. She is also the team leader in rebounds per game (5.2), minutes per game (29.2) and assists per game (3.6).

Northeastern's third leading scorer, Cannon has poured in 54 points thus far, leaving her seven behind Wilson for the team lead. She is also second on the team in assists (2.4) and averages three rebounds per contest.

Today's matchup will be the 29th meeting between UMass and Northeastern, with the Minutewomen leading the all-time series, 16-12.

Mike Mastone can be reached at mmastone@student.umass.edu.

Senior Kim Benton looks to make a bounce pass during a game last year. She is averaging 5.3 points per game and helping the Minutewomen (3–3) on both ends of the floor.

UMass researchers help at Hadron

Scientists seek knowledge on the origins of the universe

University of Massachusetts Ph.D candidate Emily Thompson stands in front of the ATLAS detector, part of the Hadron Particle Collider

By Bobby Hitt
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts physicists will be performing experiments with the, as of Nov. 20, full-functioning Large Hadron Collider, which boasts the largest machine in the world and some of the most sophisticated instruments ever designed.

The LHC, located 100 meters beneath the Franco-Swiss border, is a particle accelerator. The purpose of the machine is to discover fundamental particles which may have been present immediately after the Big Bang, insight on dark matter and to discover what causes particles to have mass. The LHC was built by CERN, the European Organization of Nuclear Research.

The particle collider is run by the European Organization for Nuclear Research, or CERN, located in Geneva, Switzerland, and is considered to be among the best research facilities in the world.

"CERN is one of a handful of particle accelerators in the world, and is now the world's highest energy particle accelerator, or in some sense, the world's most powerful microscope into the world of subatomic particles," said member of the UMass team at the Collider Ben Brau. "This makes it the world's host to the energy frontier of particle physics research," Brau continued.

Brau is part of the UMass High Energy physics group working at the LHC along with colleagues Stephane Willocq and Carlo Dallapiccola. They, along with three postdoctoral researchers and four PhD students, make up the UMass team in Geneva. The specific experiment they are working with is a Toroidal LHC Apparatus program, or ATLAS, which is one of two general-purpose detectors at the LHC.

According to the CERN website, ATLAS will investigate a wide range of physics, including the search for the Higgs boson, extra dimensions and particles that could make up dark.

"ATLAS will learn about the basic forces that have shaped our universe since the beginning of time, forces which will determine its fate," said Willocq in a UMass press release.

"Among the possible unknowns are the origin of mass, extra dimensions of space, unification of fundamental forces and evidence for dark matter candidates in the Universe," continued Willocq.

Dallapiccola pointed out that the research hopes to "uncover new laws of physics."

The UMass team's specific job is to develop software to detect muons, a type of rare fundamental particle that is 200 times the mass of electrons.

"These muons are interesting because when protons collide, if muons are produced in the collision, that is an indicator that something interesting and rare might be happening in that collision and it is worth studying further," said Brau.

"We also have developed analysis techniques to sift through the proton collision data looking for hints of new particles we've never seen before," Brau said. "If found, the properties of these new particles might help us understand better some outstanding questions we have about the universe, such as, 'Why do particles have mass?' and 'What is dark matter?'," elaborated Brau.

Although unsure what technologies and insights these experiments will bring, researchers maintain that the experiments are worthwhile and important.

"There is a phrase I like to use to describe basic research like this, which is, 'curiosity driven.'" Brau said. "We don't know what we will find or whether there will be practical applications, we do know we have lots of questions we hope to answer," said Brau.

ATLAS alone is the size of a "five story office building," according to Brau. The ATLAS takes a snapshot of collision between the two protons and this allows the researchers to look at the debris.

"We can then use the measurements we make of the sub-atomic debris to re-construct what happened in the collision, much as someone investigating an automobile collision can use the debris found at the scene to piece together what happened," said Brau.

The ATLAS is dwarfed by the 17 mile circumference of the LHC, which holds five other experimental devices. Scientists from several different countries and institutes participate in the research. ATLAS alone has over 1700 scientists from 159 institutes and 37 different countries, according to the CERN website.

Groups mark heritage with Kwanzaa event

By Jessica Bonheur
Collegian Staff

On Tuesday, the Committee for the Collegiate Education of Black and other Minority Students (CCEMBS) and the Program for Undergraduate Mentoring and Achievement (PUMA), in collaboration with the People of Color United (POCU) of Amherst Regional High School, hosted the annual Community KWANZAA celebration in the Student Union Ballroom.

Kwanzaa, an African cultural holiday, celebrates the importance of community, culture and family. Deriving from the African harvest festival Kwanza, the African-American holiday of Kwanzaa was started in 1966 by Dr. Maulana Ron Karenga, and is a weeklong holiday from December 26 through January 1.

Kwanzaa celebrates familial bonds and unity. Handmade gifts are often distributed within families to break free of the capitalistic custom of purchasing gifts. The celebration was held from 6 to 9 p.m. and had participants from UMass as well as other organizations including the UMass Gospel Choir, Black Student Union, Cape Verdean Student Alliance (CVSA) and representatives of the National Pan-Hellenic Council including Alpha Phi Alpha Fraternity, Phi Beta Sigma Fraternity, Zeta Phi Beta Sorority, Delta Sigma Theta Sorority and Sigma Gamma Rho Sorority.

The event was kicked off by a traditional African welcome dance by the Amherst College African Dance Class. Students from Amherst Regional High School Imani Higginson, Naimah Petigny and UMass' Kenny Francis gave the kukaribisha, which means welcome in Swahili. The UMass Gospel Choir then led the audience in a rendition of "Lift Every Voice and Sing."

The history of Kwanzaa was then presented by UMass students, and keynote speaker Onawumi Jean Moss, the so-called "Soulful Storyteller," was introduced. Jean Moss intrigued the audience with a beautiful tale about a dog that had lost his way and was left for doom and destruction. She then led the audience in a powerful chant of "united we stand, divided we fall," with the warm message of staying together, and encour-

Lemard speaks about Jamaica

By Michelle Williams
Collegian Staff

On Thursday at 5:30 p.m. the Psychology of Peace and Violence Program of University of Massachusetts will be hosting a seminar on conflict and violence in Jamaica.

Titled "Class, Culture and Violence in Jamaica: What We Don't Know Can Hurt Us," the event is the latest feature of the Interdisciplinary Seminar on Conflict and Violence featuring Dr. Glendene Lemard. Lemard is a Research Assistant Professor in the Health Policy and Management Program within the School of Public Health and Health Services at UMass. She also is the Managing Director for the Greater Springfield-University of Massachusetts Amherst Partnership.

The seminar will feature a 30-minute presentation by Lemard on the current state of affairs on the small island of Jamaica. With one of the highest murder rates in the world, Jamaica's violence is often attributed to drug and gang-related activity, robberies and the motivation of revenge. The presentation will focus on the last 45 years of violence and how it has affected health and developmental issues. Lemard will also speak of the reasons behind the violence, highlighting patterns of killings she believes are not acknowledged by society.

The event will further discuss underlying elements of Jamaican society and how they affect the current state of affairs. The issues of class structure, inequality and the lack of access to educational and occupation opportunities will all be addressed. Lemard plans to show how these believed "nonsensical killings" are actually the result of a culture that promotes violence and social norms. Following the presentation will be a 30-minute discussion between faculty and students in attendance.

Past ISSCV seminars have featured different professors on topics of conflict, violence and pence. In

UM's Levine discusses internet crime and punishment in science lecture

By Tim Jones
Collegian Staff

On Friday, University of Massachusetts professor Brian Levine of the Department of Computer Science will give a presentation about the investigation of illegal activities on the internet and possible corrections to the rising problems in internet policing.

The lecture, titled "Forensic Investigation of the Internet and Mobile Systems," will be presented in the Isenberg School of Management Room 112. The event is part of the fall 2009 Operations Management Science Seminar series.

Levine is the co-founder and a member of the Steering Committee of NetFX, the Association for Computing Machinery Northeast Digital Forensics Exchange, a workshop dedicated to the research and collaboration of digital forensics. He was also awarded with a 2007 UMass Amherst College of Natural Sciences and Mathematics Outstanding Teacher Award.

The internet has proven to be a particularly difficult environment to enforce laws, as the factor of anonymity among the users provides a more difficult challenge. With mobile devices, such as phones, able to access the internet wirelessly from many locations, the rate of internet crime is steadily increasing.

However, technology has made it possible to trace down the locations of any other device, which in turn can allows authorities to find users breaking the law on the web.

Professor Levine will speak about his current research projects in digital forensics and the attempt to address investigation of such crimes as identity theft, contraband trafficking, fraud and espionage.

His primary concentration will be on wired networks and peer-to-peer file sharing, which can result in trafficking contraband and the sexual exploitation of children.

The difficulty is that the people behind the file sharing are often difficult to find, and with Massachusetts and Pennsylvania state police consistently performing investigations, evidence has been uncovered that tens of thousands of internet users engage in P2P file sharing, which makes isolating specific files, such as those Levine will be speaking of, difficult to trace.

P2P file sharing is traced on campus, and students can be fined if proven to have utilized the campus' internet for such programs as Limewire, BitTorrent or any other programs that allow the illegal downloading and sharing of any types of files whatsoever.

Levine will then shift his focus to wireless and cellular devices, which add another level of difficulty in monitoring, as the network encryptions and geographical locations are not in a fixed area and vary depending on the location of the user. Connections may also be encrypted and the software can, and usually does, change making location difficult to establish. He will then speak of possible solutions that can be taken to address these problems.

According to Levine's profile on the computer science department's site, "a grand challenge we face is the protection of our privacy while simultaneously increasing ubiquitous interactions using a network of peers."

Support for this series is provided by the Isenberg School of Management, the Department of Finance and Operations Management, INFORMS and the John F. Smith Memorial Funds.

Professor Anne Nagurney, the John F. Smith Memorial Professor in the Department of Finances and Operations Management in the Isenberg School of Management, is the faculty advisor to INFORMS and helped support the series.

Levine's presentation is the final presentation in the series, which has been running since Sept. 18. Previous speakers have included IBM's Dr. Mary Helander, who discussed risk management in mediating food safety crises, MIT's Professor Andrew Lo, who addressed assessing responsibility for the current financial crisis, RPI's Professor Jose Holquin Veras, who spoke on managing emergency logistics in the wake of Hurricane Katrina, UMass civil engineering department Professor Richard N. Palmer and Santa Fe Institute researcher Sam Bowles, who spoke on economic inequality throughout history.

aged the audience to hug their neighbor.

The keynote speaker said she was inspired to become a storyteller by a young African American woman at Amherst College in 1991 and the young woman was the first person to ask her to tell stories. Jean Moss considers this woman her "earth angel." Jean Moss further explained that her stories have no target audience. She says that "I tell stories from time of conception to the most elder," meaning she tells stories to anyone regardless of age.

Most of her stories, she says, are stories from her life, stories she has written, and stories from literature that have been passed down for some time. When asked how storytelling has impacted her life, she says that "life is 1000 times more interesting on a minute by minute basis" and that her curiosity is more stimulated as she thrives to become more aware of what is going on around her. Onawumi says that she has "met many interesting people and [has] told stories as far as the Netherlands." Winner of the 2005 Zora Neale Hurston Storytelling Award and the 2009 ALZA/ALSC Notable Children's Book Award, Onawumi says the themes and messages of the stories she tells depend on "what the occasion may call for."

After the story session, the festivities continued with lighting candles for the Seven Principes of Kwanzaa, which are Umoja or purpose, Kujichagulia, self determination, Ujima, collective work and responsibility, Ujamaa, cooperative economics, Nia, purpose, Kuumba, creativity, and Imani, faith. The Seven Principles were each represented by a candle in red, for the struggle of the people and their blood-shed, black, for the color of the people, and green for a prospective fruitful harvest and bright future.

Following the candle lighting was libations, where anyone in the audience could go to the podium and pour water out of a cup to pay respects to loved ones who had passed. The ceremony ended with an appreciation statement from CVSA, the Women of Color Leadership Network, and the Black Student Union. The Afrikan Pledge was then read by Greg St. Dick of Phi Beta Sigma Fraternity.

October, Dr. Andrew Papachristos, a UMass Assistant Sociology Professor, analyzed gang violence by studying inter-group conflict and the effect of geographic "turf." The seminars also featured Dr. Pumla Gobodo-Madikizela, a Psychology Professor at the University of Cape Town, South Africa, who spoke on her book, A Human Being Died That Night, which discussed mass violence and political conflict in South Africa.

The Psychology of Peace and Violence Program at UMass is a doctoral program which, according to its website, "is designed to facilitate research and intervention regarding group relations and conflict."

"We are especially interested in understanding why group relations become hostile and how to promote cooperation and peaceful resolution," the site goes on. It is the academic program's goal to decrease violence and promote peace through the efforts of psychology. The program has hosted ISSCV seminars since the fall of 2006.

Soccer and destiny

Eli Gottlieb

I don't know with exact surety, but I think this is my last column of the semester. This time, rather than merely describing the foreign-yet-homey culture of Israel, I thought I'd leave everyone with a lesson they can carry into the future. Thus, please allow me to tell you a story.

It was October, at the end of the week-long break in our work for the holiday of Sukkot. I sat in my aunt's apartment in Tel-Aviv with her and her kindergarten-aged daughter after an afternoon celebration of Simchat Torah, and I pondered what I would do with my looming

I had originally planned to go to a soccer game between Israel and Moldova to which my volunteering group had invited everyone, but by the time I called my city coordinator she had allocated all the tickets. I had even called all my friends to ask if anyone had spare tickets, but nobody had one. It unfortunately looked as though I had to just go back to Ashdod for the evening and lay in bed (the only piece of furniture I had to myself in the whole apartment) until everyone could get home to tell my how much fun they had without me. Once again I felt like a shlimazel (Yiddish, not Hebrew), a person so unlucky that when they open a funeral home people stop dying.

Once again I felt like a shlimazel (Yiddish, not Hebrew), a person so unlucky that when they open a funeral home people stop dying.

So, dejectedly, I took a monit sherut (shared taxi) from uptown to the impoverished, whore-ridden neighborhood where bizarrely stands the New Tel-Aviv Central Bus Station. I stood in line to have my bag checked by the security guard, which they do this to everyone at every entrance to every bus station, mall, and airport in the entire country, and I walked inside to find the bus to Ashdod. As I passed a shoe store, only there because many of Israel's newer central bus stations include a shopping mall, I quite literally ran straight into my friends from Ashdod. One of them asked if I felt sure that I didn't want to come to the soccer game and try to scalp a ticket.

At this point I got smart. I've never really believed in destinies or divine plans, preferring to relegate such things to "Legend of Zelda" games, but at that moment I decided that if I could see where the metaphorical wind was blowing, I ought to follow it. Hineh and behold, after that everything worked out that night. Sure, I almost had to buy a ticket from one of my own flatmates, but in the end I met the volunteer from Tel-Aviv from whom she had planned to get the spare ticket and ended up receiving it for free like everyone else. I enjoyed the game, made a new friend and learned that stadium naqniqiyot-sausages-in Israel are really just the same-old Shofar brand hot dogs they serve at Shea Stadium. Sure, we ended up having to take a taxi, a bus, and a monit sherut to get home from Ramat Gan via Tel-Aviv to Ashdod, but they actually wouldn't have taken the extra step if my friends hadn't paid the taxi driver for taking us to the train station instead of the bus station (you've got to go hard on Israeli taxi drivers).

Of course, I suppose I should have followed that logic back last spring when I applied for the whole volunteering gig. If I'd recognized that endless requirements, changes in staff, and senseless requirements meant a path I shouldn't walk down I probably would have spent the past semester at UMass, missing nothing but the opportunity to take in some warm weather. In contrast, my readmission to UMass has gone swimmingly.

According to the student, this is a common problem for student employees not only at WMUA, but also at other on-campus organizations that enforce payroll commitments, such as UVC-TV and The Massachusetts Daily Collegian. At WMUA, the payroll commitments for paid positions are set by members of the WMUA staff.

"People usually exceed their hours, and then they will not get paid," said WMUA general manager Dana Evernden. "But they're aware of that. And some weeks they'll work less, and their extra hours can carry over."

Other organizations that enforce payroll commitments include Yak Back, which caps at 10 hours per week.

Payroll commitments represent a gray area in terms of the obligations of campus agencies and organizations to their student employees.

On one hand, it seems unfair for an organization to demand 30 hours of work from employees and only pay them for six. On the other hand, the employees are warned upfront.

The students who get hit the most by this tend to be the ones who are genuinely involved with their organizations, who care about their work and do the job correctly. Often the students working for organizations like WMUA, UVC-TV-19, and The Collegian are hoping to pursue careers in radio, television or journalism, so putting in the extra hours benefits them in more ways than their salaries. So, the question is: are on-campus agencies capitalizing on students' passion for their work, or simply doing the best they can on a limited budget?

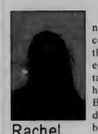
In that sense, payroll commitments are a sensible because they prevent the students from abusing the organization.

It's likely a little of both. The budgets for organizations like WMUA are limited by the fact that they depend heavily on fundraising. In that sense, payroll commitments are sensible because they prevent the students from abusing the organization.

"Salaries are determined by the WMUA executive committee," said Evernden. "Each position is limited to a certain number of hours per week, as allotted by the budget. Student salaries are paid for primarily by WMUA. About one-third of the money to run the station comes from the SGA.

The rest is raised through our annual 'fund drive.' WMUA also has two vinyl sales a year and poster sales."

So, the organizations are kind of stuck. They set payroll commitments because if they let students work as many hours as they want, the organizations will go broke. But, if they can't afford to pay students beyond their set payroll commitments, then the job requirements should match the hours they set for each position. There are 15 paid positions at WMUA, ranging from news and publicity directors to office coordinators and music librarian. Depending on the job requirements, student positions will be allotted anywhere from five to eighteen hours per week. Their salaries and payroll commitments are determined by an executive committee comprised of WMUA employees. So, the number of hours each position is allotted per week is determined by the students. In a sense, this is a good thing because the students who run the organization are in the best position to judge how many hours each position requires.



There is no standardized procedure for organizations to determine payroll commitments and salaries.

"We generally set salaries based on what was set the previous year," said Dana Evernden.

The problem, then, may not be with the organizations themselves, but with the lack of any larger regulation of student payrolls at UMass. If UMass had a standardized system for determining appropriate payroll commitments, it might be easier to prevent students from being overworked without pay.

Rachel Dougherty is a Collegian columnist. She can be reached at rdougher@student.umass.edu.

Wage not worth it

Rachel Dougherty

Campus organizations only commit to pay their employees for a certain number of hours per week. But often, students must work beyond their payroll commitments in order to complete their job requirements. A student employee of WMUA, who prefers to remain anonymous, claims to have worked up to thirty hours a week to fulfill his obligations, but has only been paid for six hours.

"I worked thirty hours a week because my job required it," said the student. "There was a weekly meeting, office hours and all my other requirements. And inevitably someone calls out sick and then I have to cover for them [...] you just can't complete the work in six hours a week. I always wind up going over."

COME IN FROM THE COLD

Dear Editor,

RE: "The Global Warming Fabrication Situation;" Alex Perry, November 30

Alex Perry, in his column "The Global Warming Fabrication Situation," cites the stolen emails between some climate scientists as proof that "there is no evidence to suggest humans are causing climate change and these people know it."

The emails clearly do not invalidate the copious evidence supporting the existence of global warming and its human origin. However, they do show that scientists, like everyone else are subject to strong emotions and can make intemperate statements in private communication. I would like to invite Mr. Perry and anyone else interested in the topic of climate change to attend my class, Physics 132 on Friday, December 11 at 11:15 a.m. in Hasbrouck 124.

At that time I will discuss the basics of climate science and the evidence demonstrating that global warming is real and caused by human activity.

ACT LIKE HUMANS AT HOCKEY GAMES

Dear Editor,

As a fifth-year graduate student here and an avid fan of the UMass hockey team, I have witnessed more than 50 UMass games both on campus and at opposing Hockey East arenas.

From my travels, it's clear that the support from you, the undergraduate students at the hockey games in Mullins is simply amazing. A sea of maroon across the student sections is truly an awesome sight to behold. Hearing the UMass fight song sung by five thousand fist-pumping students sends shivers down my spine and buckles the knees of our opponents. The team really appreciates the support: one only has to look at the home record of 53-32-9 since the 2004-05 season to see that Mullins Maniacs make a difference.

That being said, I am continually disappointed at the level of immaturity displayed by some of you at the hockey games. During the series against UNH three weeks ago, there were multiple instances of vulgar chants directed at the New Hampshire involving the word that rhymes with "duck." Now, I understand that you need to let off steam after a hard week of classes at an opponent whose fans are not particularly classy towards our teams and fans when UMass goes to play at Durham, but stooping to their level is not appropriate.

You are too good for that. Using expletives is a cop-out that only serves to make you look like dimwitted simpletons. And, I know that you are much better than that because I've seen it - last year a group of UMass students brought one of the most clever signs I've seen to BC's Conte Forum: "Jesus went to State School." Although small in number, they were louder than the home crowd.

You have a great opportunity to prove yourselves. UMass has a huge home conference game tomorrow night against BC. I charge you, the students of this fine University, to intimidate that team in Mullins without resorting to mindless swearing. Players on the ice ignore f-bombs, but really clever insults can get into their heads. Think about how much more effective your support for the Mass Attack would be if you exchanged creativity for vulgarity. Anyone only has to witness a Mission IMPROVable show to see the creative potential of the student body in this University, so I have faith that you can establish the most talented student section in NCAA hockey. Have fun out there and make us all proud.

EDITORIAL GLEE ON LEVASSUER CASE

Dear Editor,

I want to thank you for your balanced and intelligent editorials on the Great Sedition Trial.

I am an alum and former library employee at UMass who worked for the Sedition Trial defense team as a paralegal, specifically assigned to Ray Levassuer's attorney, although Levassuer was pro se in the courtroom.

Levassuer is certainly a breathing primary source and it was one of the intents of those of us who organized the event to put the spotlight once again on the many significant aspects of the trial.

Special Collections of the W.E.B. DuBois library not only houses all the transcripts from the trial but it also has all the Sedition Committee newsletters (I and the other paralegal ran the committee), along with a nearly complete newspaper clippings file. From a researchers point of view this is near nirvana!

Thank you again for your mature and judicious coverage.

WINNING ISN'T EVERYTHING

Dear Editor,

RE: "The World Cup to high school, how bad is cheating?;" Ben Moriarty, November 20

We would like to respectfully and strongly disagree with Ben Moriarty's recently article entitled "The World Cup to high school, how bad is cheating?" In his article Mr. Moriarty states, "Cheating is, like most things, a life skill – if you can do it properly, why not go for it?" Our response to this is simple: Because it's dishonest, because it's unethical, because it doesn't demonstrate that a student has learned the material and because it speaks directly to the character of a person.

We are not naïve enough to think that cheating doesn't occur on our campus. Indeed, Dr. Donald McCabe from Rutgers University has done much work and study about this topic, and identifies in his 2002-2005 Assessment Project that there are students who will cheat and/or plagiarize because they want to "get ahead," because other students do it, due to family pressure, they don't think faculty care enough, or they don't consider cheating to be a "big deal."

Our attitude is that cheating is a "big deal" and shouldn't be tolerated. Why? For reasons already identified, and because, as Mr. Moriarty does correctly point out, "cheating yourself ... indirectly (we would say directly) cheats other people as well by the way of grade inflation." Why would a student tolerate another student cheating if their own grade was going to be effected? We would hope they wouldn't.

Further, if you were to ask those affected by the actions and behaviors of people like Kenneth Lay and Bernie Madoff, our sense is that those individuals would consider cheating and/or being "dishonest" – which is really what we're talking about here – to be completely unacceptable, and potentially reprehensible, behavior.

Finally, we would like to ask Mr. Moriarty this question: How would you feel and what would you think if your doctor, dentist, the person that built your home or the teacher teaching your child, cheated so they could "go for the gold?"

Marco Benevento describes avant-jazz style

Marco Benevento will bring his experimental jazz-infused sound to the Iron Horse tonight with the Benevento Trio. In an exclusive interview with Collegian reporter, Angela Stasiowski, he describes his long history with drummer Joe Russo following their meeting in detention hall, and recounts his sources of inspiration that range from Motown classics to Led Zepplin and Radiohead. Doors open at 10:00 p.m. and tickets are $13 at the door.

By Angela Stasiowski
Collegian Staff

Marco Benevento, a self-proclaimed "punk" from the New York music scene, met drummer and long time friend Joe Russo in detention hall. The rest is history.

A few years older and a great deal wiser, both musicians find themselves in the middle of one of the fastest growing musical projects in Brooklyn today.

Benevento, along with the Marco Benevento Trio, brings his avant jazz to Northampton's Iron Horse Music Hall this Thursday, Dec. 3 for a 10 p.m. performance.

The young pianist, composer, and general genre bender has been gaining momentum since his debut on the New York jazz scene in 1999.

Today, Benevento has been profiled by everyone from Pitchfork to Rolling Stone, and deservingly so.

Benevento has an affinity for the strange, combining upbeat jazz piano with layers upon layers of heavy distortion. The musician comes fully stocked with his supply of electronic toys and recorders, allowing for a truly unique experience at every appearance.

Performing a combination of original material and broken-down covers of indie standards from artists such as Deerhoof and Beck, Benevento puts on quite a diverse demonstration.

Though Benevento's appreciation of jazz began in high school, his love of music in youth was remarkably broad.

His appreciation for piano distortion began at a young age, starting with the song "The Alley Cat," by Bent Fabric on vinyl and Benevento on the RPM knob, said Benevento in an exclusive interview with The Collegian.

"Then, I got into Motown and Led Zeppelin. In high school, I discovered jazz, and started listening to Miles Davis, Jimmy Smith and Oscar Peterson as well as Cream, Santana, Pink Floyd, The Who and The Doors. There was also Otis Redding, Radiohead and Nick Drake."

His latest album, "Me Not Me," is the sum of Benevento's musical influences.

Smooth piano, coated in distorted synth makes up "Now They're Writing Music," an original Benevento composition. The haunting echoes of piano can be heard throughout a seemingly mechanical landscape of sounds.

When asked where the ideas for songs come from, Benevento enigmatically replied, "I wish I knew – actually I don't [want to] know. I like the mystery. I like how it's different every time, there is no recipe that works every time, it's all up in the air, it's all up to the Mayan Calendar. No, I actually I don't believe that, well...maybe?"

"I like to think that the song 'writing' process does not lend itself to the song 'composing' process," said Benevento. "When I sit down at the piano and just start playing, the ideas are coming quicker than I could write, so the creating part of it, the live composing part of it I like to think of as uncatchable, needing to move forward, almost as if they were presented to me and taken away at the same time."

Regardless of his unique perspective on the songwriting process, Benevento does not shy away from previously existing material. "Me Not Me," also includes the musician's take on Beck's "Sing it Again," and Leonard Cohen's, "Seems So Long Ago Nancy." Benevento leaves nothing untumed in his quest to conquer all genres.

Songs completely transform under Benevento's touch. Every tune comes into its own with dizzying synth loops and the omnipresence of Benevento's virtuosic piano playing.

The mad scientist of the avant jazz front has also created his own line of t-shirts, which are available at his online store. The shirts contain such seemingly absurd messages as "Shooting up at the office," which Benevento labeled as "pretty self explanatory." Another reads, "We're using time for fun."

"Whenever you're goofing around, laughing with your friends and having fun and it all is happening while you are supposed to be doing something serious, you might catch yourself saying, 'Come on, let's stop wasting time' but you should really say, 'We're using time for fun,'" explained Benevento of his philosophical tee.

With his recent success, there seems to be very little that the young musician cannot do. When asked what he would like to achieve through his music, Benevento replied that he simply seeks "honesty."

Any listener could tell you however, that Benevento has gone far and beyond honesty with his music. He has reached a place that transcends musical boundaries and enlightens his listeners.

Benevento conjures the sort of fleeting beauty that can only be found in the inventions of a truly great performer.

What she's wearing: Black scarf she got at the Campus Center, a Forever 21 tank, a top she got as a gift, Forever 21 skinny jeans and Steve Madden boots.

The look: Melody's look is casual and chic. "I'm a big skinny jean person," she said. Melody likes to complement the tight fit of her skinny jeans with a looser top.

In ensembles like this relatively monochromatic look, consisting primarily of shades of white and gray, she likes to add a splash of color to keep things interesting.

Melody also likes to add scarves to her outfits because they are "a simple way to spice up an outfit," she says.

Pearl Street to host jam band lineup with Rubblebucket

Dave Mansfield
Collegian Staff

Rubblebucket, formerly known as Rubblebucket Orchestra, will bring their eight-piece big band to Pearl Street's Clubroom tonight, along with reggae act Giant Panda Guerilla Dub Squad.

Rubblebucket's eclectic style is a fusion of many different musical genres, including jazz, funk, reggae, as well as some African influence. Fronted by lead singer Kalmia Traver, who also plays saxophone, the energetic octet features a full horn section, including bandleader Alex Toth on trumpet and Adam Dotson on trombone. Rounding out the band is a robust rhythm section, including the percussion duo of Craig Myers and Dave Cole, Darby Wolf on keyboards, bassist Mark Stewart and guitarist Ian Hersey.

The band originally formed in Vermont in 2007, but also has roots in Jamaica Plain. They've already gained quite the reputation in their short existence, as they have been nominated for "Best Live Act" by the Boston Music Awards.

Rubblebucket's recently released second album, which is self-titled, is loud, intense, intricate and very well put together. The music is highlighted by catchy, bright horn parts that are accented by an extremely tight rhythm section, clearly adept at keeping time with a myriad of different grooves and styles.

Myers, who has traveled extensively in Africa and has studied music there, brings a unique feel to the table. Traver's vocals are extremely clear and resonant, while still fitting her band's fervent style in a righteous, deliberate manner. Their first single off the new album "Bikes" features their versatility admirably, as Travers muses in some scat-singing while Dotson unleashes a mean trombone solo.

Although they have been referred to as a jam band at times, they have demonstrated a clear preference for song craftsmanship over improvisation. They have drawn influence from bands like Phish, and have even opened up for their bassist Mike Gordon. However, Rubblebucket will occasionally unleash some spontaneous creativity when playing live, which is part of why they've gained so much notoriety as a great live act.

Rubblebucket will be preceded onstage by Giant Panda Guerilla Dub Squad. This four piece reggae group, consisting of a more traditional lineup, includes a guitarist, bassist, drummer and keyboardist. This light hearted, spirited ensemble formed in Rochester, NY in 2004. They have dabbled heavily in the dub sub-genre, which involves re-arranging and re-working original recordings. GPGDS as they are often called has gained a significant following through extensive touring (500 shows in the last three years), steady airplay on XM Radio, as well as opening for more well-known reggae acts such as Toots and the Maytals and The Wailers. They have recently released their live album "Live Up!," which features live performances from shows when they were a six piece act.

If you are looking to see some different music with a bit of a multicultural flair, this may be the show for you. The show starts at 9 p.m. and tickets cost $10 at the door. For more information, visit www.ihog.com

Members of the Minutemen celebrate a goal earlier this season, and will look to generate offense against BC and UMass Lowell this weekend.

Eagles soar into Amherst Friday night

By Jay Asser
Collegian Staff

After concluding its longest road trip to date this season, in which it faced three consecutive ranked opponents, things don't get any easier for the Massachusetts hockey team this weekend.

The No. 9 Minutemen get two more tough opponents when they host No. 15 Boston College at the Mullins Center on Friday, and play No. 8 UMass Lowell at Tsongas Arena the following day.

The two games come on the heels of a 5-4 overtime loss to then-No. 9 Quinnipiac over Thanksgiving break. The games present an opportunity for UMass (9-3-0, 5-2-0 Hockey East) to climb further in the Hockey East rankings, particularly if it defeats BC (6-3-2, 4-3-2 HEA), as both teams are tied for second in the conference in points.

"These are going to be some big games because we want to stay on top of the leader board in the Hockey East," forward Casey Wellman said.

Despite the Minutemen playing in the toughest part of their schedule thus far, UMass coach Don Cahoon isn't concerned with opponent rankings.

"Any game we play on our schedule is a potentially ranked team," Cahoon said. "They might be not ranked at that moment, but if they were coming in here, we should give them all the respect that a great opponent would deserve. We can't be worried about our schedule because our schedule is just too difficult week-to- week to think there are peaks and valleys, they're all hard."

The Eagles enter this weekend having had their hands full in their last four games, which were all decided by one goal or less. For BC, UMass marks the beginning of seven consecutive road games, which will spill into 2010.

In the all-time series with the Minutemen, the Eagles hold a 39-10-3 advantage dating back to 1920. Recently, however, UMass is 5-6-1 since 2005-06.

Last season, BC won a pair of 2-0 shutouts to take the series, 2-1. The lone victory for UMass came in a 4-3 overtime game, which was the first time ever that the Minutemen topped a national champion. The game also set a Mullins Center attendance record at 8,389, which will attempt to be broken with "OPERATION 8K" on Friday night.

Cahoon knows that this Eagles team is younger than the one UMass faced last year, but he isn't overlooking their talent.

"BC is as talented a team as there is in the league," he said. "What they're working through right now is having three freshmen taking regular shifts, three very talented freshmen, but freshmen nonetheless playing in tough positions on the defensive end. Having said that, they probably have the most talented group of forwards, and they have great ability in creating quick strike opportunities."

On the other hand, Cahoon views Lowell (8-4-1, 4-3-1 HEA) as the most mature team in the conference.

"Lowell is the most mature team in the league, and they have the most veterans," he said. "They have essentially the same team returning from their fine end of season second half effort last year, and they're off to a great start this year. They've lost a couple close games, but they've lived up to the billing, so they'll be particularly challenging in their building."

Coming into the matchup with the Minutemen, the River Hawks have dropped their last two games against Maine and Providence after a 5-0-1 stretch. The losses have dropped Lowell in the national rankings from No. 3 to No. 8.

The River Hawks lead the all-time series with UMass, 30-16-6, while the Minutemen have gone 3-9-2 since 2005-06. When playing in Tsongas Arena, however, UMass has played better, as it holds a 10-12-2 record overall, and a 3-3-1 record dating back to 2005-06.

Lowell currently sits right behind the Minutemen and BC in the Hockey East standings with nine points, tying them with the Black Bears (6-7-1, 4-4-1 HEA) and Vermont.

With UMass 2-1 so far in this five-game stretch, the results of these last two games could be significant in the standings, and going forward the rest of the season.

Different challenges for UM

By Nick O'Malley
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts hockey team faces off against two tough in-state rivals that present drastically different challenges this weekend in Boston College and UMass Lowell.

Both opponents for No. 9 UMass this weekend are ranked nationally, and are in the top four in the Hockey East standings. Where BC and UMass-Lowell differ, though, is experience and pure skill.

The No. 16 Eagles (6-3-2, 4-3-2 Hockey East), who come to the Mullins Center Friday night, are a perennial Hockey East powerhouse, but feature several young players in key positions on the blue line.

For defensemen, the Eagles have four freshman, two sophomores and one senior. That lack of experience is something that Cahoon said the Minutemen will try to take advantage of. That edge, though, won't be as easy to grab as it would seem. According to Cahoon, what the Eagles lack in experience in some areas, they make up for with pure skill.

Freshmen Patrick Wey, Brian Dumoulin and Philip Samuelsson, who have each played in all nine games so far this season, are young, and bring plenty of size to the table on defense. At 6-foot-2, Wey is the smallest of the bunch, with Samuelsson coming in at 6-foot-3 and Dumoulin towering over all players on UMass and BC at 6-foot-4.

The No. 8 River Hawks (8-4-1, 4-3-1 Hockey East) meanwhile, are one of the most experienced teams in the country. After a breakthrough season that concluded with a loss in the Hockey East Championship game, Lowell returns in 2009 with its lineup from last season virtually intact.

The River Hawks feature 12 seniors and six juniors on their roster and use them well. Five of the six top scorers for Lowell are seniors while the team's top scorer, Scott Campbell (13 points on five goals and eight assists), is a junior.

Offense clicking 5-on-5

With 10 goals over the weekend, including a hat trick against Vermont by sophomore Casey Wellman, the Minutemen continued their torrid pace of offense this season.

What has been a welcoming sight, though, is that, as opposed to earlier in the season, more of UMass' goals are coming with the teams at even strength, rather than when the Minutemen are on the power play.

"On the power plays, we've had a lot of success. It's a good and a bad thing, because we were kind of struggling 5-on-5," Wellman said. "So we tried to focus a little bit more on getting some 5-on-5 points."

While UMass' was riding high offensively earlier the season, the team's offense was heavily reliant on power play goals. Although scoring with the man advantage was indeed a positive for the offense, the ability to score for all 60 minutes on the ice is a big advantage for the Minutemen.

"It's great to get goals on the power play," Wellman said. "But 5-on-5, you get a lot of momentum, and [it] shows [that] the guys are working hard, so it's definitely a key part to our game."

While Cahoon appreciates the contributions from the team's forwards, he sees the team's offense as something that will come naturally with the talented lines the Minutemen have up front. To take the team's play to the next level, Cahoon says, the same players that are producing so well on offense have to live up to their capabilities on defense.

"You recruit offense and you teach defense," Cahoon said. "The defensive part of our game needs to be more consistent. Guys know that if we are to become a championship team, it'll be because, on the defensive side of the ledger, we've played up to a higher level."

UMass wins third-straight at Mullins

Center Sean Carter had five rebounds, one block and one steal in the 62-58 victory over the Bobcats last night. The Minutemen travel to Worcester Saturday to face Holy Cross.

By Pete Vasquez
Collegian Staff

Ricky Harris scored 15 of the Massachusetts basketball team's first 19 points, and the Minutemen held off a late rally by Quinnipiac for a 62-58 victory on Wednesday night at the Mullins Center.

"We needed that win bad, just to get our confidence back up because after losing to Michigan State the way we did, a couple of guys started to get down on themselves, but that was a good win," Harris said.

Harris, who finished with 19 points and six assists, started 5-of-5 from the field, and 3-of-3 from 3-point range, while his UMass teammates struggled to find their shots.

"He's the best scorer on our team," freshman Sampson Carter said. "I feel way confident with him with the ball, [and] I know that he's going to score."

The Minutemen (3-4) started 4-of-11 from the field, shooting 36 percent, as the Bobcats took an 18-11 lead within the first nine minutes of play. After a quick rest, Harris returned to the floor to ignite a 17-8 run, as UMass took its first lead of the game, 28-26, with 2:38 to go in the first half. Harris scored 15 points in the first half, as the Minutemen held a 35-29 lead at the break.

James Feldeine, Quinnipiac's leading scorer, scored 10 of his team's first 24 points, finishing with 20 points and eight rebounds. Justin Rutty, the Bobcat's second-leading scorer, came into the game shooting 61 percent on the season, but struggled to find the basket, finishing 5-of-15 shooting, and going the entire first half without a field goal. Bobcats coach Tom Moore attributed Rutty's struggles to the amount of size seen in the Minutemen forwards.

"Coming into the game, we didn't face anything close to the size and athleticism at the four and five position," Moore said. "[Rutty] just looked a little off balance when he was finishing, and I think he was surprised a few times at their length."

The Bobcats did not come out in the second half with the same success they had in the beginning of the game, going 4-of-14 and shooting just 29 percent. UMass built a 46-36 advantage at the 13:29 mark, a lead it did not relinquish for the rest of the game.

Quinnipiac (3-3) capitalized on a few Minutemen turnovers late in the game to get within four points with 33 seconds left in the game. However, UMass was able to make its free throws to secure the win. James Johnson hit a three-pointer at the buzzer to draw the Bobcats within four.

Junior Anthony Gurley continued his success as a starter for UMass, as he scored 15 points, including 11 in the second half, and added six rebounds to give Harris some relief. He also hit two big free throws with 5.9 seconds remaining to give UMass a better cushion. Gurley leads the team with an average of 18.2 points per game on 53 percent shooting.

"That's what your juniors and seniors are supposed to do, take the game over and make plays," UMass coach Derek Kellogg said.

The Minutemen relied on clutch 3-point shooting as well as steady free throw shooting to sustain their lead, but allowed 28 offensive rebounds to the Bobcats, who outrebounded the Minutemen 46-29 in the game. UMass did not miss a free throw until the 9:44 mark in the second half, going a perfect 8-for-8 at the line.

Quinnipiac shot 35 percent for the game while going 3-of-13 behind the 3-point line, and shot 53 percent from the free throw line.

The Minutemen will travel to Holy Cross for their next game on Saturday.

Harris moving to point benefiting Minutemen

By Nick O'Malley
Collegian Staff

Ricky Harris recent move to point guard is looking more and more permanent, after Harris scored 15 of the Massachusetts men's basketball team's first 19 points, and finished with 19 points and six assists.

What started as a mid-game adjustment against Rutgers looks to be a permanent change for UMass (3-4), as Harris develops in his new role.

"It's etching its way," UMass coach Derek Kellogg said when asked whether or not Harris' performance made his status at the point written in stone.

"Ricky is dangerous with the ball," he added. "Now he doesn't have to work so hard to get open. And really what it's enabling me to do is play Anthony Gurley more minutes, because those two were kind of competing for minutes."

With just over four minutes left in the first half, Quinnipiac (3-3) had outshot, outrebounded and outplayed the Minutemen, except for Harris, who carried the offense for most of the first half. After his fast scoring start, though, Harris helped drive a successful offense that pulled out from its slow start.

Chipping in

Harris kept the Minutemen in the game for most of the first half, but it was not until the rest of the team busted out of its slump to take the lead. For the remainder of the first and the entire second half, UMass attacked from all fronts, as Harris scored just four points for the rest of the game.

"I think everyone contributed in their own little way," Harris said. "And that's what we need, for everyone to play and contribute. It's a full team effort, and we're not that deep of a team. We don't have as much talent as other teams, so we're going to need all 12 guys, all 10 guys to come out and play like they did tonight."

Gurley had 15 points and Sampson Carter had 11 behind Harris at the point. But when Harris left the game, Sampson Carter, Matt Hill and Freddie Riley came off the bench and put the Minutemen ahead for good.

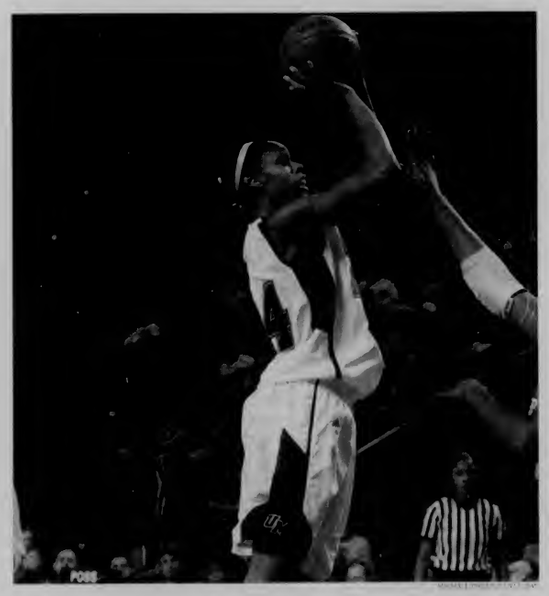
Carter, who added, two blocks, three boards and a steal, hit a key 3-pointer that jump-started the UMass offense en route to a 35-31 halftime lead.

Hill, who was in the game with Sean Carter out of the game after getting struck in the face, made a key steal and scored four vital points, including the go ahead free throw with four minutes left in the first, in his nine minutes in the game.

Outrebounded, not outplayed

Gurley had a team high with just five rebounds, as the Minutemen struggled to establish themselves on the boards against the Bobcats, who outrebounded UMass 46-29.

Justin Rutty had a game-high 13 rebounds while James Feldeine had eight, and Jonathan Cruz had six for the Bobcats in a dominant effort on the boards.



"I think it's effort," Kellogg said. "Definitely effort is a thing. You have to get more guys going to the boards. You have to get your guards crashing the glass. I've got to continue to get our guys in the weight room and make sure they're eating right and just get them tougher and stronger."

As the game went on, the Bobcats kept rebounding, but failed to convert the boards into points, even with the deluge offensive rebounds. Rutty, who grabbed nine of those offensive boards, was ice cold inside, going 2-for-13 from the field with most shots coming in the paint as part of a rough shooting night for Quinnipiac. The Minutemen outshot the Bobcats 43.8 percent to 34.8 percent on the night.

Nick O'Malley can be reached at nomalley@student.umass.edu.

Senior Ricky Harris had 19 points and six assists in the victory 62-58 win over the Bobcats, while still adjusting to playing point guard for the Minutemen.

Sophomore Nicole Jones shoots over an opponent earlier this season. Despite a strong performance yesterday, Jones and the Minutewomen fell to Northeastern, 73-64.

UM upset by Huskies

Minutewomen surrender 20 turnovers in loss

By Neil Carroll
Collegian Staff

Although the Massachusetts women's basketball team shot 47 percent from the field while making 6-of-13 3-point field goals in the game, UMass lost 73-64 to Northeastern University on Wednesday afternoon.

Ultimately, too many timely turnovers caught up with UMass in the loss, as Northeastern finished the game with 20 points off 20 Minutewomen turnovers, compared to UMass' seven points off of 10 Husky's turnovers.

"We just came out flat," UMass coach Mamie Dacko said after the loss. "We need to be ready to step up regardless of what time of day it is and who we're playing."

The Minutewomen were down 11 points after a 3-pointer by Northeastern's Kashaia Cannon with three minutes and 28 seconds to play in the first half. The sophomore guard finished with 13 points and seven rebounds in the game, but following a Megan Zullo 3-point shot on UMass' next possession, the lead was cut to eight points, and neither team scored until halftime.

Zullo ended the game with nine points on 2-of-5 shots from beyond the arc, as the redshirt junior is now shooting 37 percent from beyond the arc on the year.

In the second half, UMass trailed by as many as 12 points at the 13-minute mark and could not mount a comeback against a tough Huskies defense. UMass' leading scorer Kristina Danella, who averaged 15.5 points coming into the midweek matchup, was held to two points in the final 13 minutes of the game. Danella finished the game with 12 points and four rebounds in 38 minutes of play.

"I think at one point maybe because these guys scrimmaged against Northeastern in the summer, they thought that they could come in and walk all over them, and that didn't happen," Dacko said.

With Danella being guarded tightly by Northeastern's best defender in Brittany Wilson, UMass turned to other offensive options. Fellow sophomore Nicole Jones stepped up down low, scoring 13 of her 15 points in the second half.

Jones contributed heavily to UMass' points in the paint, which was one of the few categories in which the Minutewomen had an advantage. UMass finished with 34 points in the paint to Northeastern's 28, but the six-point edge was not enough to carry the team's offense.

Wilson not only played good defense for the Huskies, but also led them on offense as well. The sophomore was picked as the All-Colonial Athletic Conference freshman last year, and finished Wednesday's game with 23 points, seven rebounds and three steals on 8-of-18 shooting from the field.

Another key component in the Huskies win was forward Kendra Walton. Walton had 15 points on 3-of-8 shooting from beyond the 3-point line, and matched up well with the UMass frontcourt.

Freshman Dee Montgomery had a breakthrough performance and finished the game with 10 points and four rebounds in 13 minutes of play. The quick point guard added a spark to the offense with a 4-point play with 4:34 minutes left, when she made a free throw after she was fouled making a 3-point shot.

"Dee came in and gave us some quality minutes," Dacko said. "That being said, I've got to get everybody in position to understanding what offense we're trying to run."

Another positive that the Minutewomen can take out of the loss is their rebounding. UMass out-rebounded Northeastern 36-33 in the game, however, they could not convert second chance opportunities.

The Huskies had six fast break points to UMass' zero. This marks the second consecutive game that UMass has been held to zero points in transition.

Senior Diatiema Hill had a strong all-around performance for the Minutewomen, tallying four points, four assists and five rebounds.

HISTORY IN THE WALLS:
HISTORIC BUILDINGS AT UMASS

MATTHEW HARRIGAN, MICHAEL SARKES, NICK BUSH/COLLEGIAN

Chapel school's lone qualifier for Registry

By Michael Phillis
Collegian Staff

There is only one building on the University of Massachusetts campus that qualifies for the national registry of historic places by itself: the Old Chapel.

In a May, 2007 Building Conditions Report that sparked much of the debate over historic buildings on campus, the Old Chapel got a special mention – one showing that the administration was aware of the building's historic nature and importance.

Under "Category 5: Secure and Protect," the report says that "only the Chapel currently falls into this category. The Chapel is highly significant: it is the visual icon for the campus, the most important link to the past, and a daily reminder of the inadequacies of a system that cannot afford the $10 million renovation necessary to keep open its equivalent of Independence Hall." the Conditions Report continues.

The Old Chapel has been uninhabited since 1996 when the marching band called it home. In 1999, the administration decided to spend $1.65 million to renovate the tower, which according to the Capital Project's Manager, Richard Nathhorst, "we discovered there were some structural problems in the tower, the stone veneer was separating from the brick backing and there was some danger of collapse."

The University was recognized for their effort – especially their attention to detail. "We won the Massachusetts historical commission 1999 award for historic preservation of historic buildings," Nathhorst said, "[It's] a very prestigious statewide award for restoration," he continued.

"There were about 145 pieces of granite and brownstone that are replacement pieces," said Nathhorst.

When the Old Chapel began construction in 1884, there were two main types of stones used: one from a Pelham quarry which UMass still owns, and another Longmeadow brownstone from close by.

There is still some stone – Pelham granite left in the Pelham quarry.

"We were able to... get stone and bring it down," Nathhorst continued.

According to Nathhorst, the Longmeadow brownstone was more difficult to replace. The quarry in Longmeadow, Mass., had been emptied, but the construction effort found an almost identical sedimentary brownstone in a Utah quarry, which was used to finish the project.

The construction firm that was commissioned by the University to do the restoration was Consigli construction, which Nathhorst said is a, "very prestigious historic masonry restoration firm. The chief stone mason goes to Italy in the winter time and studies stone work," he explained.

This resulted in a number of upgrades to the exterior of Old Chapel: faulty stones were replaced, the tower got a cement reinforcement, the motor between the stones was replaced and, according to a 2007 Collegian article, "the original bell, Old Aggie, that chimed for the first time in 1892, found itself replaced by new Carillon Bells – 42 (actually 44) bells to be exact."

Nathhorst went to UMass as a student back in 1979. He talked enthusiastically about the history of the campus and the potential for projects like the one done for Old Chapel.

The Old Chapel was originally used mainly as a library and the center of campus life when it was first constructed. According to Nathhorst, there was a recession much like the one America is going through now that occurred in the 1880s when the future of UMass, then called Massachusetts Agricultural College, was in question.

"Henry Hill Goodell was one of the four founding faculty members of the college, he got himself elected to state legislature and got $25,000 to build the Old Chapel," said Nathhorst. "It wasn't clear if Massachusetts Agricultural College was going to go forward and continue," he went on.

The investment of $25,000 for Old Chapel renewed the state's commitment to the university.

Jim Cahill, Director of Facilities and Campus Planning talked about the significance of the Old Chapel to the campus through a story about the interaction between his son, who is a UMass student, and an alumni.

"There was recently a woman that stopped my son... and asked if he could point her to the Chapel, she graduated from UMass 65 years ago," said Cahill.

"She was an elderly woman coming back to campus and hasn't been back since that time and you can imagine the changes," Cahill mused. "She remembered the Chapel and was very fond of it and she was surprised that you couldn't drive up to it; it was one of the things she remembered fondly from being a student," he went on, "it's right in the center of campus, it's one of the oldest buildings on campus, it's a beautiful building."

Nathhorst also talked about how historical restoration of a building that was built at the time of the Old Chapel can be economically

TNA Wrestling smacks down UM

Mullins hosts TNA Saturday

By Ryan Damon
Collegian Staff

This Saturday, the superstars of Total Non-Stop Action (TNA) Wrestling will be at the Mullins Center. Tickets are still available for a 7:30 p.m. performance of "TNA LIVE," which features the stars of the Spike TV hit show "TNA Wrestling Impact."

The prices of the tickets are $53, $38 and $23. University of Massachusetts students, faculty, staff and military personnel can get a $5 discount at the Mullins Center box office with valid ID.

Stars scheduled to appear include Olympic Gold Medalist Kurt Angle, TNA Heavyweight Champion "The Phenomenal" AJ Styles, Desmond Wolfe, "The Blue Print" Matt Morgan, TNA Tag Team Beer Money Incorporated and the Beautiful People: Madison Rayne and Velvet Sky.

The Beautiful People were not shy about showing their beauty to UMass students.

"Students will want to come to this show because we [The Beautiful People] will be there," Velvet Sky said.

Two of the most popular female wrestlers in the world, "The Beautiful People," Madison Rayne and Velvet Sky, discussed women's wrestling with the Collegian.

Since joining the company in 2007, Velvet Sky has been an integral part of the success of the TNA Wrestling division. She and former TNA Wrestling Knockout Angelina Love formed the Beautiful People when they both came to the company. The Beautiful People added star Madison Rayne into their ranks in early 2009. When Angelina Love was forced to leave the company due to legal reasons, they got a new member, Lacey Von Erich. Von Erich is the daughter of former NWA Heavyweight Champion Kerry Von Erich, who competed in the World Wrestling Federation as "The Texas Tornado."

"I'm pretty confident in saying that the current day Knockout division has really raised the bar for woman's wrestling," said Velvet Sky. "We've set a new standard as to what to expect from woman's wrestling."

"I think the group of girls that we have work really hard, the Knockouts are the future of woman's wrestling," she continued.

"Women's wrestling has gone through its phases," said Rayne; "when it was Lita, Trish Status and Victory (known as Tara in TNA) it was awesome."

"But then [WWE] goes through phases when all they are concerned about is models and teaching them to wrestle," Rayne continued. "During those phases there were people like us who were being swept under the rug because they weren't models."

"We've proven that you don't have to be a model and roll around in a gravy bowl to be in a woman's wrestling division on television," Velvet Sky said, "the knockout division is hard hitting, the punches, the chops, the kicks, and the hair pulling, everything's real. We don't sugar coat anything and that is why we are respected."

Velvet Sky and Madison Rayne then talked about TNA President Dixie Carter. They credit Carter for being the driving force behind the Knockout's push to change the face of women's professional wrestling.

"She is our biggest supporter," Velvet Sky said, "she has been nothing but good to all of us, the entire roster, not just the Knockouts. She really cares about everyone that works with her, she is a great, great person. She has a huge heart, and we're lucky to have her."

Sky said Carter is a solid fit for TNA because she understands both the business of wrestling and the dynamics of women's wrestling.

"She has a mind for business, and a mind for wrestling and she has a mind for women," she said. "So, she knows how to relate to us and try to do what she can do to make us as the owner of our company to help us feel comfortable, achieve our goals and be the best that we can be."

"With all professional wrestling there is a risk of serious injury, but the Beautiful People aren't afraid about wrestling at a style and a pace comparable to their male counterparts," Sky said.

"There have been injuries here and there, but that is what is to be expected with wrestling," Velvet Sky explained, "you aren't going to get off scot-free." "We didn't sign up for any dance class, ballet or model wrestling," Madison Rayne concluded.

UMass Crime Log

Week of Nov. 23 – Nov. 30

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 23

John R. Sheridan of Barnstable, Mass., was arrested as a result of a traffic stop at approximately 6 p.m. The arresting officer saw on the cruiser computer system that the car's registration was expired. When the officer pulled the driver over he found an open bottle of rum on the passenger seat and that his license had been suspended since July of this year.

Sheridan was charged with possession of an open container of alcohol, operating a motor vehicle with a suspended license and operating a motor vehicle with expired registration.

A domestic assault and battery report was filed November 16, with charges were pressed Monday, November 23 against Mohammad Abdullah Alsubaie. A verbal confrontation occurred between Alsubaie and an unidentified victim in the Worcester Dining Commons. Alsubaie allegedly then followed the victim outside, where he reportedly grabbed the victim's arm. Refusing to leave her alone, the incident reportedly ended in the victim's dorm room, where the Alsubaie allegedly pinned the victim down, though she reportedly managed to break free. Alsubaie was charged with domestic assault and battery.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 24

Nothing reported.

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 25

Ryan C. Boyden of 18 Canterbury Ln., Amherst, Mass., was arrested as a result of a traffic stop on Eastman Ln. He was charged with carrying a dangerous weapon and possession of liquor while under the age of 21.

The UMass police were called to the Curry Hicks Cage at approximately 3:30 p.m. A student's black eight-gigabyte iPod was stolen though later returned. According to the UMass police, numerous Amherst High School students had been involved in the theft and, as they had no records, no charges were pressed.

beneficial.

"Older buildings with smaller windows and thick masonry structures were made to have daylight come down into the buildings," he said. "When energy was expensive and hard to make, buildings were built to be much more environmentally sound," Nathhorst continued.

The administration at UMass will always have to wrestle with costs and the decision of whether to preserve old buildings and how these buildings should be treated.

Preserve UMass, an advocacy group for historical restoration at UMass, wants people to know that it is not the inside of the buildings that matter but the outside appearance.

Correspondence secretary for Preserve UMass Joseph S. Larson said, "You can do all sorts of things inside the building that meet modern needs as long as you preserve the exterior fabric of the building."

Larson used the University Club as an example. The structure was built in 1728, and, according to the historical survey is "a great example of a complete change of what had been a residence to essentially a restaurant and pub."

According to Larson, the home at one time housed Daniel Chester French who sculpted the Lincoln Memorial.

Larson gives the University credit for their work on Wilder Hall, when the sockets and roof needed to be replaced on the first building in the United States to be built as an academic landscape architecture program.

"The University filed that plan with the state historical commission, they went as far as Indonesia now to get the correct tile."

Today, Wilder Hall is being used to house the Every Woman's Center and other offices.

Preserve UMass recently put out a press release praising the University for "'finally [putting] restoration of the interior of the Old Chapel on the top of a fund raising campaign."

In a promotional brochure put out by the UMass library system, the first item is the "return [of] Old Chapel to its original glory as a library and meeting hall in the heart of the campus."

Larson said in the release that "renovation of the interior indicates that the administration does place a high value on this important structure."

Larson is happy with the long term handling of historic buildings at UMass.

"I don't care how many chancellors come and go or how many physical plant people come and go but the standard is the need to have a professional decision [about historic buildings] for the future."

"FREE SPEECH IS THE WHOLE THING, THE WHOLE BALL GAME. FREE SPEECH IS LIFE ITSELF." - SIR SALMAN RUSHDIE

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

The moral case for health care reform

Scott Harris

The Senate has begun debate on health care reform about three weeks after the House of Representatives narrowly passed its own version. We can expect that, sometime between now and the January State of the Union address, President Barack Obama will have signed a bill.

Though political and legislative wrangling over the next few weeks will decide whether or not this prediction pans out, it looks now as if the final product will include a relatively hamstrung version of the public option, an individual purchasing mandate and subsidy levels that allow about 95 percent of Americans to attain health insurance.

It is an exciting time for progressives who have been fighting the battle for universal coverage for literally 100 years. But, as the debate shifts to an obsessive focus on the cost and consequence to the private insurance market, it will be important for the president and Democrats to remember why they have been fighting this battle in the first place.

Since we will never truly get away from a debate on the cost of extending the ability to attain health insurance to a near-universal number of Americans, let us get to the core of that question right away. The latest analysis from the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office (CBO) said that the plan under consideration in the Senate will cost $849 billion over 10 years. But, because of various cost control measures, taxes and reductions in federal obligations to the Medicare Advantage program, it will reduce the government's deficit by $127 billion over that same period. The CBO also said that the Senate bill will reduce health insurance premiums over the long term for the vast majority of Americans.

But the one number that often gets left out of news reports and political commentary about health insurance reform is that the CBO has also said that the Senate bill will extend coverage to 94 percent of Americans by 2019.

That means that nearly 31 million citizens of our country including 13 million children, will be offered the ability to see a doctor when they are sick and swiftly return to powering the next generation of American exceptionalism.

> Every year, 18,000 people die because they lack health insurance. We can stop that.

By 2019, we will have been able to treat millions for illnesses that could have handicapped lives, like autism and childhood obesity or even more simple things like severe colds and the flu that keep people out of school and out of work.

My family has dealt with periods of time where we were unable to afford health insurance. As luck would have it, that time also coincided with an illness I suffered through. In 2007, I developed a deviated septum caused by a sinus infection so severe that it could only be rectified through surgery.

The procedure would cost about $5,000. Without insurance to cover the cost and a family just struggling to get by without sudden medical costs to think about, I could not get the surgery. I had to seriously consider leaving the University of Massachusetts so that the illness would not also lead to failing my classes.

I am not the only person at this university that has had to weigh a similar decision during their attendance. Do we, as a society, want to perpetuate a system where our youth must put their futures on hold because they cannot afford simple medical procedures?

I was recently in New York City, where I spoke to a husband and wife that were in a different, but ultimately all-too-common, situation (they were asked not to be named). The recent economic downturn had led to the husband's dismissal from a long-time job; the family lost their health insurance provided by that company.

Unfortunately, his wife has a condition exacerbated by arthritis that they can no longer afford the medication and regular specialist visits for. Because of mounting medical bills, they have the work. So, next month, the two, with their 5-year old daughter, will pack up their belongings and sell their house far below market value to move to Pennsylvania in search of a lower cost of living and minimum-wage employment. It sounds cliché, but it is a challenge we see all across our country.

And that is the point: 31 million Americans is not an abstract figure cooked up in some economists' basement office of the Ford House Office Building. That 31 million is made up of people like the couple above. That 31 million is made up of me and a much, much smarter friend of mine. This legislation, for all of its faults, will extend the kind of lifeline to the American people unlike any major legislative accomplishment since Lyndon Johnson was in charge.

Every year, 18,000 people die because they lacked health insurance. We can stop that.

Children miss a lifetime of potential successes because their parents cannot afford to keep them healthy and in school. We can stop that.

Families must uproot their lives and chase the slim hopes of a job with health benefits. We can stop that.

Whatever the cost, we must stop it. The fact that we can pay for it completely and improve our nation's fiscal outlook in the meantime, well, that is just icing on the cake.

Trendy churches and the race to the bottom

Ben Moriarty

"My Church has a mosh pit."

That's so radical. It is. It's so cool. It would make me, if I wasn't Catholic already, become a Christian at your church.

It really would. I don't know how when people we can say atheists, Jews, Muslims, or really, even us Mary-loving Catholics and Orthodox … see that shirt, they don't want to join that church.

And hey, we aren't talking about just that, there's another tactic roaming around that shows how cool a church is by using its name. The name of the Church? MERCYhouse–It's a Church. Not only is it an awesome name, it is spelled cool, like E.E. Cummings and Owen Meany came up with it or something. I'm sure you've seen it on campus.

Do you get the message yet? I think we get it. Do we get it? I'm not sure if I get it, but I think it is: Your church is cool. It's hip. It's progressive (chill, of course). It's just plain awesome in every way. The most awesome church in the Pioneer Valley. Is that it?

Now, I feel I might be being too hard on them – although I am not making any of these stressed examples up – since I am sure that the members of churches like this do some great things in the community. But if that was the prerequisite for not saying anything, then Mormons and Jehovah's Witnesses would be well-spoken of groups. So, you have to still question, well, ask the question of, at what cost is being cool worth it?

I would really love to know if anyone was influenced positively by such lame tactics. I want to see if anyone thinks that, because a Christian church has adopted and is involved in some cool music and acts all hip and in with the current times, they will in fact become a Christian since they won't have to listen to any Ave Marias or any Byzantine chants. That they can listen to some Hillsong, and enjoy every last minute of it. While moshing. And "worshipping" Jesus Christ at the same time.

I doubt it. It's preaching to the choir – or I guess preaching to the Christian rock band these days. Or whatever it is. It has no appeal to anyone unless they are lonely and/or want to be a part of something, and there are better ways to rid the world of the disease of loneliness. And having someone join your church because it is cool, which seems to be a common problem in some areas of the world, isn't exactly very profitable if you really care about their soul. The last reason I can think of is to trick people into coming, like adults do to children with candy.

> Underlying this tired guise isn't exactly a heterodox movement, although I'm sure some think that. It is a shift in social thought.

Best example I could come up with, I'm sure.

But underlying this tired guise isn't exactly a heterodox movement, although I'm sure some think that. It is a shift in social thought. It is time to get the old out and get the new in. It's happening everywhere in the country, the world and on many ideas – and ideals.

What were once open-minded liberals are now still self-called open-minded liberals who, if you disagree with them, call you a bigot, sexist, homophobe or larry-tale believer. Because they are the ones who know what is right on the many issues. Considering I am, I think, liberal on most things, I apparently may not be, but this race to the bottom seems to be a race to see who is more annoying.

With this race to the bottom being the race to see who is more politically correct, who is more up with the times? Who is less old-fashioned? Who is the most "open-minded?" On the other side, you have the self-martyrs who feel that by being, at times, the things they are called, they are heroes to their ideals.

It's a sad day when this race to be the most new-age and politically correct person leaves the political and social realm and creeps into the religious world. Because the one thing that should be different and old fashioned seems to slowly be making its way to the times.

And American Christians wonder why the percentage of atheists has grown dramatically in the past decade.

DC Showdown: Final Round

"Mmm.. unexplained bacon." - Homer J. Simpson

Which DC reigns supreme?

Berkshire in a beatdown

Thomas Moore

It's been a few weeks in the making but your patience will be rewarded. The final showdown takes center stage with this heavyweight rumble in the UMass jungle over which dining commons reigns supreme. To all of our beloved Celtics, Patriots, Red Sox and Bruins fans, this is the true competition you've all been waiting for.

In one corner we have Franklin dining commons who squeaked by in the first round with a giant upset win over Worcester. In the other corner we have Berkshire, a multi-award winning dining hall that even my opponent described in his argument for Franklin as, "legendary."

Underdog stories are cute and sometimes inspire faint glimmers of hope to a small population of supporters. But that's not how this match between the DC's will end.

Berkshire must win its deserved title as the best DC at the University of Massachusetts and be recognized for its never-ending innovation, consistent hard work and superior delicious food. Ding, ding. The bell rings, and here we go.

Round one: architectural layout. Berkshire wins this round by a landslide because entering the beautiful DC doesn't make you feel like you're navigating through a sketchy back ally way to get in line for a tattoo with a recycled needle by a guy named "Grizzly." Seriously though, the hidden ramp walkway that patrons usually stand and wait on induces feelings of being a rat in an oversized maze. Waiting in line to get into Berkshire, on the other hand, is like waiting with the anticipation of getting into an awesome night club. The ones that aren't really at capacity but they say it's just to give the appearance that they're more popular than they are. But the difference is that Berkshire really is popular.

Round two: lighting. Franklin comes out of the corner thinking that they have this round in the bag with their big windows that allow for natural sunlight. It's too bad that Berkshire has larger floor to ceiling windows, and more of them too, as they line every wall to the outside world. Now, this round is close. But remember that Berkshire has adjustable lighting levels that create mood and ambiance for the optimal eating experience. Berkshire walks back to its corner winning this round as well.

Round three: guest chefs. There's no competition in this round, since Franklin does not host guest chefs. Berkshire, on the other hand, has had world-renowned chefs take full control of the kitchen to unleash delicious mayhem. They've brought in Chef Joanne Weir, Chef Iliana de la Vega from Mexico and Chef Bruno Wehren from Las Vegas to prevent the boredom that comes with predictable food menus.

Round four: popularity. The crowd at both Franklin and Berkshire can be frustrating at times because of their popularity. This round is very close and just when it seems like it could be a tie, Berkshire takes it. While both DC's fill up during peak times throughout the day, it's Berkshire who has the multi-tiered plate return that makes leaving the crowded DC a breeze compared to Franklin. You may have a hard time finding a seat, but unlike at Franklin, the Berkshire DC fan will never have a problem being late to class because they had to wait in line to return their plates.

Round five: special events. Although there are certain events that both DC's will take part in, such as the Halloween lobster and steak dinner, Berkshire will ultimately win this event with their annual spring Southwest Barbeque. Every year, Berkshire will roll out and fire up their grills to supply the thousands of hungry students with delicious burgers, hotdogs and chicken breasts. This allows students to get outside and enjoy an appetizing meal in the beautiful weather. Franklin's boiled beef patties will have to be enjoyed indoors this spring.

At this point we're all in the audience pleading with the referee to just stop the match – it's not even a fight anymore. It's a slaughter. But the fight continues into round six where it will end in decisive fashion. Berkshire comes swinging at Franklin with their most powerful punch that can't be defended: late night. Fighting a battle that they were losing before they even got into the ring, Franklin has nothing to stand on against chicken tenders, strawberry shortcake, Philly cheese steak grinders and Buffalo wings at 9:30 p.m. to midnight. They're down for the count.

I'll give Franklin credit for making it this far in the competition. I don't think anyone expected them to beat out the powerhouse that is Worcester. But come on, anyone who has had an experience in both DC's knew the outcome when the competition was first announced. Make it official by logging onto MassDailyCollegian.com and voting for the rightful winner. Go Berkshire!

Frank has the character

Matthew M. Robare

I'm going to come out and say it: Franklin cannot compete with Berkshire. Not in quality or looks or cleanliness. Dining Services has simply spent a whole load of money over the years making Berkshire the best dining hall it can be.

During summer orientation, we all get a taste of that Berkshire deliciousness: top-quality pancakes and bacon every morning, sushi and chicken caeser wraps for lunch, burgers and pizza for dinner. When people from other schools come to the University of Massachusetts to check out our dining program and give Dining Services all those awards, they get taken to Berkshire.

If that is how dining commons supremacy is judged, then I have lost indeed.

But allow me to convince you of a different way to judge a dining hall, perhaps the most important way: the intangibles. Franklin is awash in them, from the whole je ne sais quoi atmosphere provided by the huge windows at sunset to the local, organic and decentralized spread of dining options throughout it. The sandwiches, the salad bars, the stir fry line, kosher dining and all the others combine to create a retro feel. Dining in Franklin is like taking a step into the past to the multiethnic immigrant districts of major port cities like Boston and New York. Franklin is UMass's culinary melting pot.

But more important, is the Franklin spirit.

Berkshire has had God knows how much money spent to provide it with the best and most state-of-the-art of everything. Franklin hasn't, but it still succeeds brilliantly. It's inspiring how well the great people at Franklin have done, how hard they must have worked. Their hard work has been rewarded with loyalty and devotion – Franklin defeated Worcester by nine votes in the first round of this tournament.

Franklin has earned all of its accolades and kudos and loyalty through the hard work its staff puts in day in and day out to keep the old, decaying place running smoothly and making sure its patrons are well-fed. Berkshire just sort of sits back like Goldman Sachs and watches the cash come in from Dining Services. Franklin is the George Bailey to Berkshire's Mr. Potter from "It's a Wonderful Life."

All of my points from my original column still stand: Franklin has a strong community from the cozy, friendly, near-pastoral environment of Central and Orchard Hill. Franklin and its huge number of bulletin boards make it a perfect place to catch up on news and events.

Franklin isn't perfect by any measure. The bathrooms are horrible, the first floor is kind of dreary and all the colors are cheesy pastels that must have looked bad when they were first painted. Now the colors seem to be mocking reminders of age and former glory. But all of its defects make sense when you consider all the money spent on Berkshire. When there's no extra money, the cosmetics are the first thing to go.

But it's still the best dining hall on campus. Franklin can be proud of its state. It's real. Berkshire is a showpiece, an aberration, a carrot dangled in front of us to drive us onwards and convince us that sometimes things go right at this school. You go to Berkshire for your orientation and the guides talk about how many awards Dining Services has won and you experience how good the food there is and you think, "The other dining halls must be like that."

That's Berkshire. Lies and spin and laziness. Franklin tells it like it is. Franklin isn't going to lie for the sake of some awards or to impress people. Franklin is one of us, especially if you use its nickname, Frank.

How much more down to Earth, good natured and honest could someone be than if they were named Frank? When I think of Berkshire I think of snooty preppy types with summer homes and names like "Winthrop Mather Lodge-Emerson, III, esq" with a trust fund, a home on Martha's Vineyard and a semi-aristocratic genealogy more inbred than the Habsburgs.

Yes, it's got fancy schmancy equipment and lots of HD TV's and pretty comfortable seating and decent food, but the fact remains that Berkshire has gotten special treatment and received a lot of help to get where it is.

Franklin stands on its own two feet and its spirit is unparalleled on campus.

Come on people, show Frank some love.

True Life: I was on WOF

Justin Gagnon

One can only succeed as far as their luck can allow him or her to go, but with one action as simple as a click of a mouse, his or her life can change for the better or for the worse in an instant. Mine changed last May. It was the time of year that when big dreams meander into a strange purgatory between inevitability and just another reverie of the season. This year, however, my big dream would actually amount to something.

NOTHING TO LOSE

My friend Dan and I were deeply engaged in a philosophical discussion about a very important subject matter: game shows.

I won't bore you with our points and reasoning, but we came to a unanimous decision. With difficulty, prizes and show popularity into consideration, we concluded that Wheel of Fortune was definitely the best game show for the average person to be a contestant on.

With that, I went back to my dorm room and sat down before my laptop. After a short while of stumbling through the Internet, I found myself on the Wheel of Fortune web site reading about the process to become a contestant. I eventually filled out a short application, and just like that, I was into their potential contestant database.

Most people who find their way onto the show must go to a "Wheelmobile event," which is usually held at a huge shopping mall. The Wheelmobile travels the country and gives anyone a chance to apply in person to be a contestant. Names of applicants are then picked at random to go up on stage in front of the large crowd and play the game. Of the people who are picked, only the ones who leave good impressions with the contestant coordinators get invited to come to a much more exclusive audition in which the field is narrowed even further.

Luckily for me, I got to skip that process. I received an email on July 27, 2009 that began, "Congratulations! You have been selected to attend a WHEEL OF FORTUNE contestant audition (by invitation only) for 'College Week'." I was told that I would need to be at the Lennox Hotel in Boston on Aug. 11 to audition for the show. I thought about it for a minute, and realized I would be a moron to not at least try. So I called the number they provided and confirmed that I would be attending the audition.

The big day crept up on me, but I certainly made sure I was prepared; playing a handful of online Wheel of Fortune games, doing various types of word puzzles, and even splurging $5 to buy the official Wheel of Fortune iPod game.

THE AUDITION

I was among the first to arrive at the hotel ballroom and quickly made acquaintances with the other hopefuls that arrived shortly after me. What seemed to be over 100 people filed into a medium sized ballroom, and I made sure to grab a seat in the front row. Each person in the room was either a college student, or as I soon found out a recent graduate. Those in attendance who were no longer in college were not eligible for College Week, but were encouraged to stay and use this as an audition for the regular show.

My "competition," if you will, was drastically cut down with that fact alone as I was there to audition for College Week and I immediately became more optimistic than outmatched.

The audition process was simple. There was a projector screen that displayed a puzzle board just like the one from the show. The contestant coordinators gave each hopeful contestant a chance to call out a letter and play the game two times. I was caught off guard both times they called me, and chose letters that were not in the puzzle. I was one of probably a dozen or so that got a third chance to stand up and play, and capitalized on the extra chance. I didn't end up solving it, but I got to call out a few letters and gave them more of a feel for who I am.

Once this part of the process was over, we were each handed a test. We had five minutes to complete as many of the 16 given puzzles as we could. Each puzzle was almost wholly blank, revealing only a few letters. I'm pretty sure I got about eight of them, with some other scattered random words that were probably wrong. The five minutes went by so fast; it was a textbook cliché when I looked up to see that I was finally starting to cruise as the clock ticked down from 10 seconds.

The coordinators collected the tests and left the room to correct them. When they came back, they would be reading a list of people they wanted to stay for the final portion of the audition.

While they were gone, everyone discussed how they did and I was blown away to hear a few people around me saying that they got "about 13 or 14." It's pretty clear to me that they were full of it when they were promptly sent home after the coordinators came back into the room over a half hour later.

Needless to say, my name was called. I had made it to the final cut, and to be honest, I had no idea how close I was to actually being on the longest-running syndicated game show in American television history.

This round was structured more like the actual game. We stood up in front of the room in groups of four, spun an imaginary wheel, and competed against each other. I solved one puzzle ("welcoming committee"), and just had fun.

I went into the audition intending to just be myself and more importantly, to be interesting, but when it actually came

WMUA hosts vinyl sale

By Garth Brody
Collegian Staff

The third semiannual WMUA vinyl sale will run from 11 a.m. until 5 p.m. tomorrow at the Cape Cod Lounge. Set up like an indoor flea market, the event will host more than 15 different record vendors peddling thousands upon thousands of those warm, crackly LPs, EPs, 45s and singles that you devoted music lovers so lust after. The vendors will range from Amherst's own Trade Roots (and other local favorites) to traveling merchants from exotic reaches as far as New Jersey. Even the radio station will be hawking its wares.

If that's not enough music for you, the event will also feature WMUA's own DJs spinning live music throughout the day. This is a change from the first such event put on by WMUA, which included live band performances. The station's program director, David Murray, who started the vinyl sale last year, said that this was a logical choice in promoting the WMUA community at the event.

Yoni Glaser, who organized Saturday's event, also stressed the sense of community fostered by the vinyl sale. "It attracts people who are deep into music," he said, and this sale is a rare opportunity for a real life gathering of that crowd. Sure, you can endlessly pontificate about the merits of "Wowee Zowie" in the niche-catering universe of the internet, but where else can you physically mingle with multitudes of music maniacs? Well, this is a lot cheaper than the Pitchfork Festival and you don't need a tent.

Glaser went on to admit that he himself isn't a huge music buff, so this is more than just a nice community event with a bunch of great deals for him – it's an "educational experience." But you don't have to live under a harpsichord to benefit from the ridiculous diversity in store for this event. There is an implicit guarantee in the sheer volume of recorded music and human knowledge present at Saturday's proceedings that you will learn something about music. Something worthwhile even.

Or, thanks to the looseness of the flea market atmosphere, you could (depending on the digression and demeanor of the vendor) learn to competently haggle. It is a regrettably underdeveloped skill among Americans, so this could prove a valuable lesson. If you aren't one for confrontational economics, you could always learn to bargain-lurk (though, as a college student, you ought to be at least reasonably skilled at this already). With such an eclectic and abundant array of vinyl records, this sale will provide a challenge for even the most advanced garage sale creeper. So put on your frugal hat, UMass – and get perusing.

This season's vinyl sale promises to continue the progressive expansion of the event since its inception. They continue to attract more vendors from a wider range of locales, and, most importantly, student interest continues to build. If the event's success persists, it will likely expand and move to a larger venue in the coming years. But Saturday's sale will be at the Cape Cod Lounge in the Student Union.

down to playing, my personality was on auto-pilot as I focused on being calm and well, remaining focused.

As I left the room at the end of the audition, I went to each of the coordinators and thanked them for the opportunity to try out.

If I had made it, I would receive a phone call in two weeks.

THE CALL

Just after 5 p.m. on Aug. 24, I received a call from Culver City, Calif. I knew what it meant, and couldn't stop staring at the city name. I couldn't believe it. It was really them. I had been thinking about it non-stop for two weeks, replaying how I did, calculating my chances. I picked up the phone expecting some sort of prank, but sure enough, it was Cassandra, one of the coordinators.

I had been selected as an alternate for the College Week shows that would be taped in Boston at the Convention Center on Sept. 4. This meant if any of the contestants whom were actually chosen for the shows could not play for whatever reason, I would be replacing them. If I didn't get to play on Sept. 4, I would be put into the regular contestant pool and compete in a future taping of the show.

I brought my whole family to the Boston tapings, but as expected, I did not get to play. What I did get to do is watch five live tapings of Wheel of Fortune, and go through all the motions that a regular contestant goes through. I knew this experience would be valuable in the future, and it was to say the least.

On Oct. 21, I got my second call from Culver City. This time it was Shannon, another one of the coordinators. I was in class so she left me a voicemail and asked if I could fly out to L.A. in two weeks to appear in one of the Nov. 6 tapings. I thought about it for a little while, taking into consideration that mid-terms were right around the corner, but ultimately called her back that night and told her that I would be there.

I booked my flight and hotel, reserved a rental car, informed my professors and began to practice.

I developed a series of statistics based on previous Bonus Round answers with which I found the most logical three consonants and vowel to choose if I were to make it that far. I continued playing the iPod game, and solved countless cryptogram puzzles, which I truly believe are the closest type of puzzle to those used on the show. Simply put, you are given a quotation written in code where each letter represents another letter in the alphabet. By piecing together smaller words, you reveal pieces of longer words and just like on WOF, you have to use context and logic to fill in the missing letters to solve the whole thing.

SPINNING THE WHEEL FOR REAL

I flew into LAX with my sister Brandy early on Nov. 5, the day before my taping. We landed around 11 a.m. Pacific time, and had all day to get acclimated with the area and hit up a nearby mall. That night in the hotel room, we watched WOF at 7:30 and even before the Bonus Round, I had fallen fast asleep.

I woke up around 5:30 a.m. and since I went to bed so early, I was wide-awake and ready to go. The contestant shuttle bus departed from the hotel at 7:15 a.m. sharp. Meeting the other contestants was rather unique. It was hard to befriend too many of them, because after all, they were my competition, but at the same time, this bus was full of people living a dream. Ultimately, my competitive nature went dormant, and I opened up to my fellow contestants.

When we arrived at Sony Studios, the little nerves I had completely disappeared. I was just as comfortable in the studio as I would be in my living room or in class. The morning went by quickly as the coordinators went over rules, legal information, etc. Before I knew it, I was sitting in a director's chair getting a quick spray tan and makeup caked onto my face. Neither of which I am proud nor ashamed of.

I was scheduled to be in the third show of the day, which will air on Dec. 30, 2009 at 7 p.m. (it can be seen locally on WBZ-TV38). Without trying to seem arrogant or pretentious, being up on the stage felt natural and not for one second did my heart pound or my brain scatter. I did gaffe up my words while talking to Pat Sajak once, and actually thought to myself, "You idiot, now you look nervous."

And for the record, believe me, at 52 years young, Vanna White is without question one of the most beautiful women in the world.

I cannot, however, delve further into the actual taping of the show until it airs, but I can say that it was nothing less than surreal, and should prove to be one of the most important half hours of my life. If not for actually being on the show, for what it took to get there.

It was the little things from sitting in the front row at the audition, shaking the coordinators hands, and simply cheering for the other hopeful contestants that added up. This holds true for literally everything in our lives. It might have been how I did on the test or how I played the game in the callbacks, but had I not simply had that conversation with my friend, none of this would have happened. This article would not exist and you would be doing something else right now.

These little things add up quickly. For me in this one instance, it was in some spending cash, but in the large spectrum of our lives the little things shape us. If I gained any wisdom or knowledge from the experience, it was not how to solve a puzzle in front of a live studio audience; rather live every moment like it could turn into something big. As college students, now is the time for us to utilize every tool that is put before us, and never miss an opportunity to do something that could be our big break. Who knows? You just might get to take your own spin of the wheel of fortune.

Perfect for the role, but she was six months pregnant

Farmiga stars in "Up in the Air"

By Steven Rea
The Philadelphia Inquirer

Cool, complicated and impossibly sexy, Alex, the business traveler played by Vera Farmiga in "Up in the Air," is a role to die for. She spars with – and seduces – George Clooney's corporate downsizer (his job: to lay people off). She has collected nearly as many frequent-flyer miles as he has – and prides herself on the efficiency with which she crisscrosses the land, briskly navigating hotel check-ins, airport security lines, rental-car agencies, and chain restaurants.

She knows who she is, what she wants.

But when Farmiga met last year with writer/director Jason Reitman (Oscar-nominated for "Juno") to talk over the job, the actress couldn't have been less in the mindset of the character she hoped to play. She was six months pregnant – and "Up in the Air" was set to start production a mere 60 days after her due date.

"I thought, 'Aw, forget this,' and I really thought, instead of meeting with Jason, I could just make my own audition tape, and keep the camera very close up," she says, with a laugh. But she went ahead and kept the appointment with Reitman, whom she had met a few years earlier when he was casting "Thank You for Smoking."

"And I couldn't find anything to wear that day, as often happens in your sixth month of pregnancy. My feet were swollen, I just felt so huge, and I sat down with him, and he immediately started to talk about every single role I'd done since our first meeting – very specifically, so he really had been following me."

But even Reitman, a huge fan of her work in "Down to the Bone," in Martin Scorsese's "The Departed," and in the unsettling thrillers "Joshua" and "Orphan," wasn't sure Farmiga could be ready in time, physically or emotionally.

"When it came to this role ... I could not think of another actress," recalls the filmmaker, in a separate interview.

"She was perfect. And then I try to get ahold of her, and I find out that she was in her second trimester. ... I was nervous. I was legitimately nervous. I was like, 'You can't do this.' I went as far as saying that. And she just came at me strong, and with confidence. And in a weird way, it was her confidence that she knew she could do it that let me know that this woman is so perfect for the role."

Reitman says Farmiga's emotional maturity, and the toughness she projects, make her a rare commodity.

"There are a lot of girls in Hollywood, but there are very few American women," he says. "And Vera doesn't judge her characters, and that's another thing you never find. Usually, when you watch a performance, you can kind of tell what the actor thinks of the character they're playing."

In "Up in the Air," Farmiga simply – or not so simply – inhabits the part of Alex. On a certain level, it's a comic, casual role, and the actress' repartee with Clooney recalls the crackling romantic screwballs of the 1930s and '40s. But there's more to the character than first meets the eye.

"Sure, their initial attraction starts off over bonus points and frequent-flyer miles," she says of the relationship between her Alex and Clooney's Ryan. "You could interchange their names. They are two birds of a feather. ... And then slowly she becomes the gal who really does make him sit back and reinvestigate his ideas about life and love."

Farmiga, 36, grew up in northern New Jersey and studied theater at Syracuse University. She has been working steadily since the day she left college, moving from stage to screen, from little indies to bigger, more commercial fare. Her husband is a carpenter and a musician. They live on a small farm in Upstate New York. Their son – the one she carried leading up to "Up in the Air" – will have his first birthday early in the new year.

"I had my first costume fitting for 'Up in the Air' two weeks after I gave birth, and I was enormous," she says, smiling. "There was a lot of pressure, but everything panned out.

"I was tired. I had absolutely no sleep. And it was difficult to get into Alex's head space, who was very confident, very sexy, very at ease with herself, at a time when, hormonally, (I was) adjusting to the estrogen levels, and all of that.

"But I was blessed with a joy of a child and a husband who's an ace father and a real nurturing partner for me, so it was as easy as it could have been. But still tough: going back to work, pumping in between takes, having them courier the breast milk to the hotel, but having a good sense of humor about it.

"I took a lot of cues off George," she adds. "He can laugh at himself very easily."

As for the darker themes in "Up in the Air" – and the scarily timely one of unemployment and a shrinking job market – Farmiga, like most of us, has a personal connection. Her father, a computer systems analyst, has been the "victim of age-ism and corporate downsizing," she says.

When she saw the finished film at the Toronto Film Festival in September – and its opening sequence, with its documentary testimonials from the laid-off and the let-go – Farmiga realized that she was sitting in the theater crying.

"It does put a face – many a face – on unemployment," she says of Reitman's movie, her movie. "And it's very real to me in my own family. I wish that I could just take my frequent-flyer miles and exchange them, instead of flights, for health insurance for my parents. For my dad, who has been laid off several times. ...

"It's very emotional for me, this film."

Vera Farmiga stars as Alex in "Juno" director, Jason Reitman's latest film, "Up in the Air." Farmiga auditioned for the film even though she was 6 months pregnant at the time.

Cutting the Pride

By Nick O'Malley
Collegian Staff

When the Massachusetts football team lost the season finale to Hofstra, neither team could imagine that it would be the last game ever for Hofstra's football program.

Hofstra University Board of Trustees voted unanimously yesterday to end the program's 69-year run in order to reallocate its $4.5 million on program costs "new faculty lines, academic programs and need-based scholarships," according to a Hofstra press release.

"In the long run, we can touch and improve the lives of more students by investing in new and enhanced academic initiatives and increasing funds for need-based scholarships," Hofstra President Stuart Rabinowitz said in the release.

The board's decision, which was recommended by Rabinowitz, marks the second Colonial Athletic Association school to cut their football program since the regular season ended on Nov. 21. Northeastern's program was cut on Nov. 23 after 74 seasons.

The moves leave 10 teams remaining in the CAA, with the North and South Division maintaining five teams apiece. NU was in the North while Hofstra was in the South.

According to the release, the board does not plan to discontinue any of the school's other 17 varsity sports.

Like Northeastern, Hofstra made the decision after a two year-long review process of the school's athletic program, according to the release.

"As we continue to improve our academic programs and reputation, and plan the university's future, we have to consider the investment we make in all of the university's programs," Rabinowitz said in the release. "The cost of the football program, now and in the future, far exceeds the return possible from an FCS program, which does not generate significant national interest. Given that, along with the low level of interest, financial support and attendance among our students, our alumni and the community, the choice was painful, but clear."

Hofstra Athletic Director Jack Hayes met with coaches and players to make the announcement. All 84 players will remain on scholarship and have the choice to transfer to another school and play immediately.

The decision, based largely on a lack of national attention for the program, was furthered by the lack of interest on the Hofstra campus. According to a report on ESPN.com, the average attendance for games at the team's 13,000-seat stadium was 4,260, only 500 of which were students.

Hofstra Board of Trustees chair Marilyn B. Monter, said in the release that the school's financial review of the athletic program is one of many nationwide, evidenced by the earlier review at Northeastern.

"Hofstra is not alone in taking a hard look at athletic spending, and we have a concrete plan for reinvestment in academics," Monter said in the release. "This isn't about spending less money, it's about how we allocate our resources and invest in all of our students."

Minutewomen look to win Brown Bear Classic again

Neil Carroll
Collegian Staff

This weekend, the Massachusetts women's basketball team will travel to Providence, R.I. and attempt to win the Brown Bear Classic for the second year in a row.

The Minutewomen (3-4) will face off against Brown on Saturday at 1 p.m., and either Morgan State or Quinnipiac on Sunday. Last year as a sophomore, Cene Mosgrove led the Minutewomen in the Brown Bear Classic and was named to the all-tournament team.

"They crash the boards," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said. "That's been a consistent factor for us in the losses – so we've got to be aware of that."

Brown comes into the weekend with a record of 2-5 on the season, after an 87-58 loss to Boston University on Wednesday night. The Bears play in the Ivy League, but share a mutual opponent with UMass. The Minutewomen beat BU, 79-73, in overtime in their home opener this season.

The Bears also venture into Saturday's clash with UMass in the midst of a three-game losing skid with losses to Seton Hall, Long Island, and BU.

Brown is led in scoring by senior point guard Christina Johnson, who averages 11.2 points and 4.7 rebounds per game in one start, and boasts a 91 free-throw percentage in 35 attempts on the season.

Coach Dacko also said that the Minutewomen have to prepare for a Brown squad that has been known to press opponents and then revert to a zone set in the half-court defense. UMass struggled against the press in losses to New Hampshire and Northeastern this season.

UMass is currently coming off a tough 73-64 loss to the Huskies. Although the Minutewomen shot 47 percent from the field, Northeastern was able to score 20 points off of UMass turnovers and win the contest.

Forward Nicole Jones is having a spectacular start to her sophomore season and enters the weekend averaging 11.0 points and 5.6 rebounds per game.

While Jones is shooting 62 percent from the field on 50 shots, she is shooting 50 percent from the free-throw line. She and fellow sophomore Kristina Danella (15.0 points 6.0 rebounds) are the only Minutewomen who are averaging in double figures in points on the season.

This year's squad is still trying to find its rhythm in the young season. Freshman guard Dee Montgomery had a standout performance in the loss to the Huskies by scoring in double digits for the first time in her career, but has sparingly seen time in seven games due to injury.

"We've had so many different combinations that we're not settled into a specific continuity so I think that's something we've got to work on," Dacko said.

Depending on the outcome of their first game, the Minutewomen could face either Morgan State or Quinnipiac on Sunday.

Morgan State plays in the Mid-Eastern Athletic Conference and is 3-3 on the season. The Bears are coming off of an 83-74 victory over Murray State in the Georgia State Tournament over Thanksgiving weekend. They have had seven days to rest since the win, but will play Quinnipiac on Saturday.

Guard Conn Adams leads Morgan State on offense in averaging 19.2 points and 3.8 rebounds per game in six contests. The Bears also have a solid option in the frontcourt with Georgien Willams, who averages 11.2 points and 7.5 rebounds per game.

Quinnipiac is 1-3 on the season and boasts a more balanced offensive attack. The Bobcats go into the weekend tournament with two players averaging in double figures in points, and two other players averaging at least 9.0 points per game.

However, Quinnipiac is shooting 34 percent from the field, and has turned the ball over 82 times in four games.

XU leads A–10 early on

By Steve Levine

A–10 Basketball

Although the basketball season is still relatively new and over a month remains before conference games begin, the Atlantic 10 teams are starting to round into mid-season form.

Headlining the conference are Xavier and Dayton, which are both currently ranked in the top 25. The No. 9 Musketeers have backed up the preseason prediction that slated them to win the A-10 conference with a 5-0 record. XU will next play Middle Tennessee in a tilt featuring two teams both coming off an NCAA Tournament appearance.

Looking to lead the Musketeers to their sixth straight win will be April Phillips, who recently earned A-10 Player of the Week honors. The senior forward guided her team to three wins last week, including the Freeport Division Championship at the 2009 Junkanoo Jam in the Bahamas. During that stretch, Phillips averaged 14.3 points, 7.3 rebounds, and shot 53.1 percent from the field.

Dayton is currently enjoying their first top 25 ranking in school history at No. 24. The Flyers are playing well, outscoring their last three opponents by an average of 32 points per game. In the season opener on Nov. 13, Dayton defeated then-No. 10 ranked Michigan State in a 77-74 upset. Since then, the Flyers have gone on to defeat No. 23 Purdue. Dayton will face UW-Milwaukee in its next game today.

Surprising the conference so far has been St. Bonaventure, which has yet to drop a game this season. At 6-0, the Bonnies look to continue their winning ways and disprove their preseason prediction to finish No. 6 in the A-10. The 6-0 record is the best start to a season in the history of the school. The Bonnies have held their opponents to under 50 points and 45 percent shooting from the field to lead the A-10 in scoring defense and scoring margin. They will next host Marist on Sunday this weekend.

Off to a slow start this season has been George Washington with a 2-4 record. A recent bright spot for the Colonials has been Shi-Heria Shipp. The freshman forward was just named the A-10 Rookie of the Week for her strong play in the Junkanoo Jam, as she led the Colonials in scoring in both games, averaging 13.0 points while shooting over 70 percent from the floor. Although she has yet to start a game this season, Shipp is second on the team in points, steals, and assists. Her 0.588 shooting percentage is good for fifth best in the conference.

Tabbed to finish last in the A-10 was Fordham. The Rams are coming off a 61-59 victory over St. Peter's, a team they hadn't defeated since 1993. The win also came in Jersey City at the Yanitelli Center, where the Rams hadn't defeated the Peahens since the 1977-78 season. Leading the way for Fordham was senior forward Randall Hurst, who also leads the A-10 in scoring with an average of 18.1 per game. Hurst also averages 6.4 rebounds per game, good for 14th in the A-10.

Ample time remains before the start of conference games in the A-10. Conference favorites such as Xavier and Dayton will look to carry their out-of-conference successes into conference play.

Dribble–drive has new point guard

JEFF BERNSTEIN/COLLEGIAN

Sophomore David Gibbs began the season as the starting point guard for the Minutemen. Gibbs has averaged 2.9 points per game and leads UMass with 20 assists.

By Adam Miller
Collegian Staff

When former Memphis coach John Calipari introduced the dribble-drive motion offense to his basketball team before the 2005-06 season, he had the benefit of having two point guards who possessed solid ball-handling ability and a knack for scoring.

Darius Washington, Calipari's first point guard to run the new offense, averaged 14.4 points per game in his two years with the Tigers and earned All-Conference USA team honors his sophomore year.

The next point guard to take over was Derrick Rose, who wound up becoming the No. 1 pick in the 2009 NBA Draft after averaging 14.9 points per game with Memphis.

Massachusetts men's basketball coach Derek Kellogg brought the offense along with Vance Walberg, who created the dribble-drive when he took over before the 2008-09 season. Kellogg hoped that his point guard, Chris Lowe, could become a prolific scorer in the offense similar to Washington and Rose.

Lowe's scoring average went up from 11.8 points per game to 12.4, but he also averaged four turnovers a game compared to his junior year when he averaged 2.9, and the Minutemen finished 10th in the Atlantic 10.

This year, sophomore David Gibbs got the nod as the starting point guard for UMass (3-4), but he struggled in the offense under Walberg's system, averaging 2.9 points and 2.9 assists per game.

Kellogg tried using junior Gary Correia at that position by giving him more minutes, but he also struggled under the offense.

Over Thanksgiving break, Kellogg figured he'd shake the lineup around a little bit by playing the Minutemen's leading scorer, Ricky Harris, as point guard in order to have his biggest threat bringing the ball up like he had at Memphis.

Kellogg made the move mostly because he thought Harris would be more comfortable as an experienced player compared to Gibbs.

"I just felt like putting a senior back there with the ball brought stability to the team and Gibbs was playing well, but I need him to get more comfortable with that position," Kellogg said.

The only concern Kellogg had about making the move was that his scoring might go down and because UMass relies so much on Harris to make the offense work, the switch might do more harm than good.

So far, Kellogg likes what he sees. Harris is still one of the leading scorers on a consistent basis, and he has an understanding of how to play within the offense.

"It's nice to have a point guard who can put the ball in the basket as well as distributing it," Kellogg said. "I just think that Ricky is our most mature player. He is our only senior, and to give your older guys the ball is really the way to go."

On Wednesday night against Quinnipiac, Harris (six assists) nearly tied his career-high in assists (seven on Jan. 30, 2008 against Duquesne), and also scored 19 points. That effort was enough to convince Kellogg that Harris is best suited for the position.

"All in all, I think he might've been the best or second best player in that game," Kellogg said.

The transition hasn't been perfect. Against Rutgers and Michigan State, Harris combined for 11 turnovers, but Kellogg believes as he becomes used to his new position, that number isn't going to be so high.

In an ideal situation, Gibbs will go back to point guard either sometime this year or next year once he becomes acclimated with running the dribble-drive offense and gains experience. But for now, Kellogg believes that Gibbs will improve the most as a point guard either by playing shooting guard or sitting behind Harris.

Adam Miller can be reached at amiller@dailycollegian.com.

UMass looks for second straight win

By David Brinch
Collegian Staff

Last season, the Massachusetts men's basketball team used senior leadership from Tony Gaffney and Chris Lowe in order to defeat in-state rival Holy Cross.

This season, senior guard Ricky Harris and the rest of the Minutemen will look to make it two-straight against the Crusaders when UMass travels to Worcester Saturday for a 3:30 p.m. tip-off.

The Minutemen (3-4) defeated Quinnipiac Wednesday night, 62-58, after falling to Michigan State and Rutgers in the championship round of the Legends Classic last weekend. Harris led UMass with 19 points and six assists against the Bobcats, while redshirt junior Anthony Gurley added 15 points and six rebounds.

"Right now, for our team's psyche and getting our guys in the right frame of mind, a 'W' is a nice thing to have. It's one of those ones where a lot of the hard work correlates into wins," Kellogg said. "I think a tough road game against Holy Cross Saturday is a good way to see how far we've come."

After dropping their first six games of the season, the Crusaders (2-6) have registered back-to-back wins against Marist and Brown with the help of Mike Cavatio, R.J. Evans and Andrew Keister. Cavatio, a sophomore transfer from St. John's University, leads the team in scoring with 13.3 points per game. Evans, a sophomore guard, is second behind Cavatio with 12 points per game and 23 assists, and was the Patriot League Rookie of the Year last season, while junior forward Keister leads the Crusaders in rebounding (8.6 per game).

"They're on a two game winning streak, they seem to be playing better and I think its two similar teams in similar areas this time of the year," Kellogg said. "We are both trying to find ourselves, and figure out where we stand nationally."

Like the Minutemen, the Crusaders have a young team but experienced team, with just two seniors and four freshmen, including a transfer in Cavatio.

However, Kellogg realizes that they are a talented team that returns five sophomores and three juniors, all of whom have collegiate experience.

"They're a team that has a lot of guys coming back, and I think the biggest thing I think that's going on is that they're trying to get acclimated to a new coach," Kellogg said. "There are different styles that they are playing, but they have an older team that has played well in the past, and I think they are trying to find their groove a little bit."

Sean Kearney took over the program this season after former coach Ralph Willard left the Crusaders program he turned into a contender and accepted an associate coaching position at Louisville under longtime friend Rick Petino. From 1999 to 2009, Willard went 174-103 at HC.

The Crusaders play a combination of zone and man defense, and will look to take advantage of a UMass team that was outrebounded, 46-29, by the Bobcats, including 28-11 on the offensive end of the floor.

Last season, the Minutemen played stingy defense in the second half, as Harris led all scorers with 23 points, and Gurley added 14 points and six rebounds to put three UMass players in double figures.

HC was predicted to win the Patriot League this season, and will face the Minutemen at home next season at the end of the three-year deal between both teams. Kellogg feels that this could become a great in-state match-up between two teams that are looking to build their programs back up to national prominence.

"I think its good for the state of Massachusetts, and it gets us in Worcester some," Kellogg said.

David Brinch can be reached at dbrinch@student.umass.edu.

JEFF BERNSTEIN/COLLEGIAN

Sean Carter works his way into the lane against Quinnipiac in UMass' last game, a 62–58 victory. The sophomore contributed two points and five rebounds to defeat the Bobcats.

MARIELA SPARR/COLLEGIAN

Junior Anthony Gurley and the Minutemen take on in-state rival Holy Cross this weekend. Gurley added 15 points and six rebounds last season against the Crusaders.

Fire hits Townehouse Apartments

One home sustains serious damages late Saturday night

By Jeffrey R. Larnard & Sara Cody
Collegian Staff

Early Sunday morning, the Amherst Fire Department received a call reporting a fire in the living room of apartment 86 of the Townhouse Apartments on Meadow Street in North Amherst.

"We had a report I believe about 12:30 of a fire in apartment number 86 that came from the neighbors, not the occupants," Amherst Fire Department Fire Chief Lindsay Stromgren said.

The cause of the fire is still unknown, but at the time of the fire, the apartment was unoccupied and had been for over 24 hours, according Stromgren.

"There was nobody home in 86. When our crews got here we did have fire in the living room of number 86. About 20 or 30 minutes we had that fire under control," Stromgren said. "Fairly heavy damage to number 86, but I don't believe any fire damage to any other units."

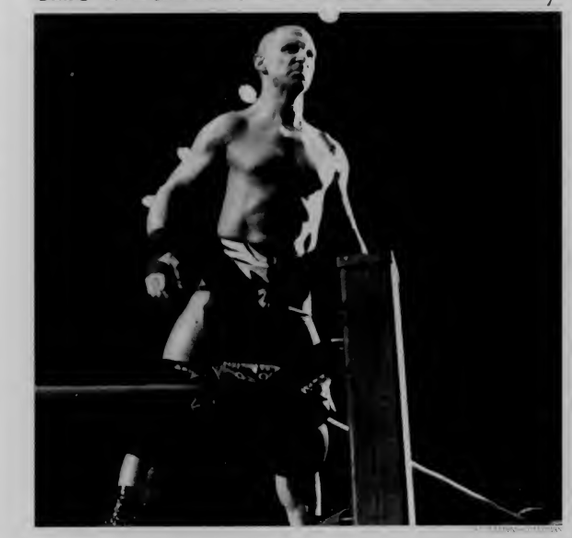
The residents of the apartment, who were away for the weekend, were contacted by the fire department and notified of the incident. They were said to be returning to Amherst on Sunday.

The fire was noticed by Matt Lee, a senior communications major at the University of Massachusetts, as he walked down the hallway to his Townhouse apartment.

"I walked in and saw some smoke in the hallway and I didn't really think much of it, I thought someone maybe burned something," Lee said, as he waited to hear if he would be able to return to his apartment. "I walked out about 10 minutes later and there was smoke everywhere."

Lee and others in his apartment banged on the door to see if anyone was inside, as UMass junior Galina McDonnell called in the fire.

Standing at the sliding window in the back of the apartment, Lee, McDonnell and friends said they could see the fire, and waited for the police to show up.



"The carpet and the curtain were on fire and from what the police officer said, the couch was on fire," McDonnell said. "The cop came and told everyone to back up, and then was banging on the glass, and then he broke the glass and then just

The Townehouse Apartments were temporarily closed Saturday night as firefighters battled a blaze in apartment 86. Residents of the apartment were not home at the time, and no other apartments were seriously damaged.

TNA Wrestling slams into the Mullins Center Saturday

The superstars of Total Nonstop Action Wrestling "Crossed the Line" at the Mullins Saturday night, bringing with them a unique style of muscular mayhem.

By Ryan Damon
Collegian Staff

It was a night of firsts for the University of Massachusetts on Saturday, Dec. 5, 2009. Late into the night, the campus received the first snowfall of the winter. A light dusting compared to what is in store for the season. The gentle flakes falling that night stood in stark comparison to the brawny chaos rocking the insides of the Mullins Center, as UMass played host to the superstars of Total Nonstop Action (TNA) Wrestling's unique brand of professional wrestling.

The first wrestling event at the Mullins Center since Columbus Day weekend 2007 started with TNA announcer Jeremy Borash welcoming everybody in the arena. Borash announced that the loudest fans in the Mullins Center would be invited backstage for a meet and greet with their favorite TNA superstars, which set the stage for a very loud night of athletic, muscular mayhem.

In the opening contest, Amazing Red successfully defended the X-Division Championship of the World against Suicide. The match featured very good chain wrestling and some high flying aerial offense. The Amazing Red in the end defeated his opponent with a pin fall after hitting his finisher move, "Code Red."

Next up, the Beautiful People (who gave an exclusive interview with The Daily Collegian on Friday) defeated the tag team of Hamada and the Amazon, known in the ring as Awesome Kong. In the end of the match, with Awesome Kong distracted by her desire to hit Madison Rayne with a falling "Splash" move, Velvet Sky pinned Hamada for the victory. After the match, Hamada was upset with Kong for her lack of concentration, and began to attack her with a series of punches. Kong put a quick end to the assault, however, by crushing Hamada with a vicious "Powerbomb."

The next contest was one of the two matches of the night featuring members of the alliance known as the World Elite. Many of the international wrestlers of TNA Wrestling formed this alliance to combat the trend of domination by American-born athletes in professional wrestling, and is headed by TNA Global Champion Eric Young. The World Elite features

Protestors fought through snow on Saturday afternoon in downtown Amherst, as they rallied against the local Birthright clinic, which some consider a 'fake abortion clinic.'

More than 20 individuals showed up for a pro-choice rally in downtown Amherst Saturday. Protestors took offense with the recent Stupak amendment to the health care bill being debated in Congress. Those in attendence chanted "Keep your ovaries off my ovaries!"

Pro-choice rally Saturday comes out against Stupak

Public Option, a government run insurance plan, cannot offer any plans which cover abortion, and that anyone who purchases insurance with a government subsidy cannot choose a plan that has abortion coverage. It does not matter how small the subsidy is.

The protest was partly in response to the Stupak amendment.

"This protest is a demonstration of our outrage at both the Democrats and the Republicans for throwing women under the bus," said protest organizer Natalia Tylim, a 2008 Smith College graduate and member of the International Socialist Organization.

"[Stupak-Pitts] is the most far-reaching attack on women's access to abortion in this country since the Hyde Amendment banned federal funding from assisting with the cost of abortion for poor women," Tylim continued. "The right to an abortion is under attack, and we need to rebuild a fighting women's movement to preserve our health, our safety and our dignity."

The Hyde Amendment, passed in 1976, included a stipulation which prohibited abortion from being covered through Medicaid.

The protest specifically targeted Birthright of Amherst, a center for so-called abortion alternatives.

Tylim said the group gathered to denounce organizations which attempt to dissuade individuals from seeking abortions.

"We are protesting the Crisis Pregnancy Center [Birthright] because it is one of the most frequently used tools of the right in putting forward their anti-woman agenda," she said. "I think that very few people know what these centers actually are," she went on, "most people we inform about these centers are outraged and surprised that they didn't know sooner."

The protesters said that the center receives federal and state funding. This was one of their main arguments against the center.

Birthright's website says that they are a non-profit charitable organization.

The protestors chanted, "Support women's rights, shut down Birthright!" describing the center as a "fake abortion clinic." They handed out articles to people passing by which described crisis pregnancy centers as preying on pregnant women by claiming objectivity while attempting to scare women out of pursuing an abortion.

Birthright's website says that the group does not "show abortion slides or pictures, picket or harass abortion clinics, evangelize, lobby for legislative changes or engage in the public debate on abortion."

Birthright is clear with their mission as a pro-life center and does not claim to be an abortion provider. Their services include: free pregnancy testing, medical referrals (but not abortion referrals), legal referrals, maternity and baby clothes, housing referrals, referrals to social agencies, and information on adoption. All their services are free of charge. Birthright is located at 233 North Pleasant St.

Tylim said of Birthright, "That center should be an abortion clinic, not a fake abortion clinic and it should receive federal funding to be so."

Protester Wayne Standley, an electrical technician from Shelburne Falls, called the Stupak-Pitts amendment an "attack on poor women," noting that "rich women can always obtain abortions." He said that the amendment will deny health care, and that "it will lead to women dying."

As of 2005 there were 1,787 abortion providers in the U.S., although 87 percent of U.S. counties do not have an abortion provider. As of 2006 there were 2,200 crisis, or pro-life, pregnancy centers in the U.S. There have been legal issues in the past with deceitful advertising.

The closest abortion providers to Amherst are Planned Parenthood in Springfield, and Hartford GYN Center in Hartford, Conn.

Tapestry Health's Amherst Branch, located at 27 Pray St., offers family planning, pregnancy testing, and medical referrals to pre-natal doctors and abortion providers.

The protesters showed that they believe the Stupak-Pitts amendment is a violation of civil rights, chanting, "Abortion is health care, health care is a right!"

Total Nonstop Action Wrestling slams UMass

wrestlers from Canada, Japan, England and Iran. The wrestler from Iran, Sheik Abdul Bashir, fought the Blue Print Matt Morgan in the third match on Saturday Morgan, who wrestled to a hometown crowd as Connecticut native, had to fight through the pain of a leg injury he suffered at the start of the match. Morgan finished off Bashir with a pinfall victory, after a landing a bicycle kick to the World Elite member's head.

One of the two main events of the night was what followed. In recent months the rivalry between Olympic Gold Medalist and TNA newcomer Desmond Wolfe has taken professional wrestling by storm. Wolfe debuted in TNA after nearly signing a contract with the competition, World Wrestling Entertainment. Since arriving at TNA, Desmond Wolfe has sought to make a name for himself by ending Kurt Angle's 10-year professional wrestling career.

"I am not the next big thing, mark my words. I am the only thing," Desmond Wolfe said in his debut on TNA Wrestling Impact, after beating down Kurt Angle a week earlier. "Mr. Angle, I could have broken your neck, but I didn't."

"I'll let you in on a little secret, you messed with the wrong guy," Angle said Saturday to a huge positive response from the crowd. "If you think you're gonna make a name for yourself at the expensive of Kurt Angle, you got your head up your ass."

Wolfe defeated Angle in two matches in TNA Wrestling, but Angle defeated Wolfe at the last TNA Pay-Per-View event, "Turning Point." A week before the match at Turning Point, Desmond Wolfe gave Kurt Angle the nickname Mr Mangle after sending Angle to the hospital at two consecutive editions of "TNA Wrestling Impact." Desmond Wolfe concluded by threatening that "I can smell the blood already, and let's just say that I'm hungry like a wolf."

Wolfe took control of the match from the start by bringing Angle down to the mat. Angle fought back, and showed the athletic ability that won him a Olympic gold wrestling in Freestyle Wrestling in the 1996 Olympics in Atlanta. At the end of the match, Wolfe was setting up Angle for his finishing move – a top rope diamond cutter called "the Tower of London." Angle reversed out of the move just in time, and got Wolfe with his Angle Slam for a pinfall victory. With the win, it appears that the series between Kurt Angle and Desmond Wolfe is now tied at two victories a piece. They will fight next at the TNA Pay-Per-View event, "Final Resolution." After the match, Kurt Angle got on the microphone and thanked everybody for coming out to see TNA Wrestling.

"If it wasn't for you fans there wouldn't be any TNA," Angle said, "Thank you, God bless you, I love you."

After a brief intermission, the audience was subjected to an even briefer wrestling match. The Monster Abyss made short work out of his former psychiatrist, Dr Stevie. Abyss got a very easy pin fall victory after hitting Dr Stevie with two "Black Hole Slams." Stevie was without his two favorite patients, Daffney and Raven. It was their lack of support that probably cost Dr Stevie the match.

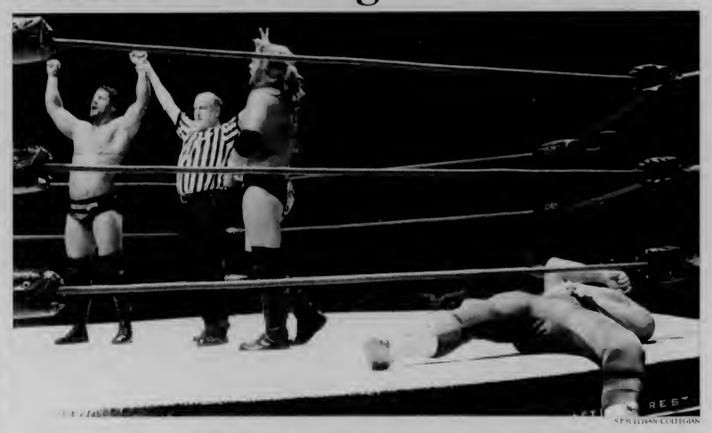
The crowd rose to a loud roar during the next match, a tag team attraction featuring the popular former TNA Tag Team Champions of the World Beer Money Incorporated. They were competing against the current tag team champions and World Elite members, the British Invasion.

"I heard that this place doesn't serve beer," James Storm said to a round of boos over the choice of refreshments available Mullins, "but I know that a lot of beer drinkers are here tonight!"

Before the match, Beer Money had one half of the crowd scream, "beer," and had the other half scream, "money." Ultimately, it was very similar to the chant that the Mullins Center usually has echoing through it, involving a "U" and a "Mass." The beer chant lasted almost throughout the entire match, which was won handily by Beer Money Incorporated.

Next up was the main event of the evening, with the TNA Heavyweight Championship of the World, a match that a few months ago wrestling fans thought had no chance of happening. For years, two of the biggest names in TNA Wrestling have been The Phenomenal AJ Styles and the man now simply known as Daniels.

AJ Styles and "The Fallen Angel" Christopher Daniels were two-time TNA Tag Team Champions, and were named 2006 Tag Team of the Year by three separate organizations. The two used to be the best of friends, but recently jealously has reared its ugly head and destroyed their on-air friendship.



Styles regained the TNA Heavyweight Championship for the fourth time on Sept. 20, 2009. Daniels has never been the TNA Heavyweight Champion, and according to recent appearances, he wants it more then anything else the world. Daniels got his chance at the last TNA Pay-Per-View in a three-way "dance" between AJ Styles, former-champion Samoa Joe and himself. Daniels also has challenged Styles for a one-on-one title shot at "Final Resolution." The match at the Mullins Center is a preview of what will be a highly combative and personal battle on Pay-Per-View.

Daniels took the advantage in the early points of the match by using headlocks and takedowns to ground Styles. The Phenomenal One is very gifted at aerial wrestling, but can't use those techniques if he is pinned on the mat. Near the conclusion of the match Daniels seemed to have the title in his grasp, and went for one of his patented finishers, "The Angel's Wings." Alas, Styles broke out of it, and connected a "Hilo Backflip" kick. AJ took the lead, and hooked in his finisher "Styles Clash" for the pinfall victory.

After the match, Styles invited Daniels back into the ring for another match right then and there. Daniels refused the offer, and decided to wait until "Final Resolution" to get another one-on-one title opportunity. The show ended with the crowd receiving a chance to step into the TNA six-sided ring for autographs and photographs with TNA Heavyweight Champion of the World, "The Phenomenal" AJ Styles, concluding a night of bone-crushing action.

TNA's weekly wrestling show TNA Wrestling Impact can be seen every week at 9 p.m. on Spike TV (cable channel 49 in the UMass dormitories).

yelled in 'Police, is anyone here?' He stepped in, and then came back out because there was so much smoke."

Lee and McDonnell, who live a few doors down, were told they would not be able to return to the apartment that night, as well as a number of other Townhouse residents.

"[There are] a total of six apartments that people are not going to be able to stay in [Saturday night]," Stromgren said.

Little is known about the cause of the fire, especially with the apartment being empty for more than a day, and may be discovered anywhere from a couple of hours to a couple of days.

"We have two of our fire investigators here now and they are going to start the investigation and we will also be contacting the state fire Marshall," Stromgren said.

Lee and McDonnell stated that someone at the scene said an electrical issue may have caused it and also noted that the electric company was at the scene.

"We've released most of our people. We have two engines left here right now to do the investigations," Stromgrem said at 2 a.m. near the scene of the fire. "During the fire we did have to call in a mutual aid engine company from Northampton and Belchertown to cover the town, [but] they didn't come to the fire. All of our personnel were tied up, so they were covering the station in case other calls came in."

The sliding door of Townehouse Apartment 86 was destroyed by intense heat and the emergency actions of firefighters on Saturday, leaving behind a trail of wreckage outside.

The interior of apartment 86 at Townehouse Apartments in Amherst was scorched by the fire Saturday night. Early signs point to an electrical problem as the cause. No one was home at the apartment at the time.

UMass' Baskin wins grant toward electron microscope

By Sam Butterfield
Collegian Staff

University of Massachusetts professor of biology Tobias Baskin has won a three-year, $511,143 grant from the National Science Foundation's Major Research Instrumentation program to acquire a high resolution scanning electron microscope for research between the Five Colleges.

Baskin, along with a team of four other UMass professors, Dhandapani Venkataraman from chemistry, Mike Jercinovic from geosciences, Sam Grido from polymer science and engineering and Joseph Goldstein from mechanical and industrial engineering, led the campaign to purchase the microscope.

Scanning microscopes, Baskin explained, allow researchers to use samples of any thickness of electron they choose by sending a beam of electrons across a sample, as opposed to transmission microscopes, which send a beam of electrons through the sample.

Though the distinction may seem small, it has great effects on research possibilities.

"By building up an image from the amount of scattered electrons at any one point, an image of the topography of the sample is obtained," Baskin said.

"Because the beam does not have to go through the material, samples of any thickness can be used," he furthered, "because the instrument doesn't focus the scattered electrons to make an image, but instead just counts how many there are at each point, the instrument has an intrinsically large depth of field," he went on.

Baskin elaborated that developments in the resolution of scanning microscopes have greatly enhanced their efficacy.

"Over the past few decades, the instruments have advanced spectacularly, to the point where they can image almost to the level of atoms," he said.

He continued to say that winning the grant gives UMass great flexibility in its research capabilities, as the University had not purchased a scanning electron microscope for some time.

"Although we have some excellent transmission electron microscopes, we hadn't bought a scanning electron microscope for years," said Baskin. "This was preventing many kinds of investigations from going forward or forcing some of us to go off-campus to use facilities elsewhere," he continued.

Steve Ellis, a program manager at the National Science Foundation who recommended the group be awarded the grant, said the foundation chose to fund the acquisition because of the applicants' solid track record in research and because of its possibilities for multi-dimensional research.

"The proposal was selected for funding because it demonstrated technical expertise, the applicants have a well-established history of involvement with broadening participation activities and it provided convincing preliminary data to document feasibility for a compelling blend of interdisciplinary projects that will utilize the new electron microscope," he said.

As for the possibilities for research with the new microscope, Baskin said they are highly varied.

"The polymer scientists and chemists are interested in manipulating matter at what is now called the "nano-scale," he said, "there seems to be the potential for a large number of devices that can be made by working at the nano-scale."

"There are ideas for making better photovoltaic cells, memory storage devices, water proof fabric, and much else," he enumerated, continuing to say that in his field, he hopes to work on examining plant cell walls.

"I am a biologist and interested in the structure of the plant cell wall," he said, "this wall controls the growth of the plant and understanding its structure is essential to understand morphogenesis."

The microscope the group will be obtaining is called the Magellan, made by Oregon-based FEI Co. According to Baskin, the microscope has "the best published specifications for resolution of any currently available scanning electron microscope."

The microscope will be housed on-campus in the Conte Polymer Research Center, and will be operational by the end of next January. The microscope will be available for use by anyone within the Five Colleges.

Farewell Argentina

GLOBAL PERSPECTIVES

Mike Fox

Maybe it was when I was interacting with penguins south of the most southern city in the world, marveling at massive pieces of ice shattering off of one of the world's biggest glaciers, or maybe when my brother and I were sharing drinks with a cop-pimp in a backwater city on the edge of the Patagonian wilderness, but a stunning realization struck me.

I had a little over one week left in Argentina.

I came to the University of Massachusetts two years ago with the goal of making up for any shortcomings or flaws in high school, both academically and socially, and I'd say that so far I've done pretty damn well.

Except this past spring, I started to lose the magic that I had found. Grades started slipping, laziness worked its way in, I made social choices I shouldn't have and I didn't make the ones that I should have. The passion and excitement that characterized my attitude when I first arrived in Amherst had disappeared and was replaced with merely going through the motions.

Enter Argentina.

A time for reflection and a challenge that would help me correct my direction. To conquer my 8-year-old albatross of the Spanish language. To begin fulfilling my life-long dream of seeing exotic and far corners of the Earth. To test myself and see if I could thrive on scratch.

I came to the country with the same combination of enthusiasm, shock and abandonment of concerns as when I came to Amherst as a freshman. But, perhaps due to the shorter time table, the more challenging emotional situation, or simply the excitement of living in a foreign city, I found myself progressing to a level and sense of belonging beyond any that I had developed at UMass.

Over the past five months, I have lived and felt more pure events and emotions than at any other time in my life.

Over the past five months, I have lived and felt more pure events and emotions than at any other time in my life. With the ever-present threat of my return flight, I've lived with the lack of concern for consequences and refusal to hold back that seem befitting to anyone confronted with the fact that the world that they have come to know will be snatched away.

I have seen the pure majesty of nature in the greatest waterfalls in the world. I labored on a hike through an endless mountain desert at 10,000 feet. I suffered through 125 degree heat and winds fresh off of Antarctica.

I was threatened by knife wielding children only to volunteer with other children from identical circumstances and backgrounds the next day. I've enjoyed the equivalent of bottle service at a club for $25, and a five-star steak dinner for $20. But I've also walked home from these pleasures to see the poor finding refuge on stoops on my street.

I've worked with equally idealistic and wonderful people to bring a tiny sliver of hope to those who others have deemed as hopeless. I've learned to love a city despite uncountable cultural differences that could be confused for a bundle of serious neuroses. I've left one girl's apartment in the rain at 5 a.m. on moral grounds, and had a heart-to-heart with another on a busy street corner at 6 a.m. in the previous day's clothes because of an inability to find a way to make things work beyond my quickly approaching return.

With five days left, I know that I have time to end this trip on my own terms, to plan every moment so as to leave no regrets.

When I left UMass, I told myself that if I'm leaving such an incredible place and putting so much of my normal life on hold, I would have to make my experience in Buenos Aires worth the sacrifice. Now, I'm telling myself, if I'm leaving Buenos Aires, it has to be to return to an even better UMass experience than before.

Buenos Aires and Argentina as a whole has been a chaotic challenge that I have enjoyed thriving off of. I wish that I could stay, but it would only be running further away from a life that I left to learn how to fix and perfect. But I will carry these past five months, the events, emotions and people into the rest of my life to make sure that this experience wasn't just a fleeting dream.

If you can't find the opportunity to study abroad, promise me this. Search out your own escape from the ordinary and into excitement, even if it's only for a moment. It can shape you forever.

God smites those who don't cite

Chris Amorosi

I have been disheartened by the recent debate regarding the climate change e-mails. Not because of the rampant falsehoods exposed through the e-mails' publication, for the Lord will punish those scientists who do not heed his admonishment according to Exodus 23:1, "Thou shall not raise a false report."

What is of particular annoyance to me is the lack of sources on the climate change skeptics side. I've read numerous articles about the e-mails and they often repeat the same quotes like, "We can't account for the lack of warming at the moment and it is a travesty that we can't." But what is the source of these quotes? Where can I read these emails? Skeptics of climate change are not the only ones to falter on the issue of proper citation.

It is not hard to source the truth. Verily, the truth is the easiest thing to cite properly because of its self-evident, easy to understand nature. Even the letters of the word "truth" bear witness to its factual purity. Truth begins with the letter t, the shape of which should give an unambiguous clue to who – or should I say Who? – is the source of truth.

In Latin, the word for truth is "veritas," beginning with a V for Victory. Namely, the victory of truth. The word "cite" rhymes with "sight," which describes what we can see with our own eyes unaided by telescopes or microscopes or other boundaries to our understanding. All of this is self-evident.

The website for the Institute of Creation Research (ICR), www.icr.org, is a veritable library of sources concerning the field of creationism. Creationism is a skeptic's discipline in opposition to the prevailing scientific field of evolution, a field which had me enraptured for quite some time.

But in grade school, we are taught not by scientists but by textbooks. Textbook authors are not motivated by truth. Instead, they are motivated by what sells, which is the science of evolution. So we as children were not taught but instead sold an idea.

Creationism is a skeptic's discipline in opposition to the prevailing scientific field of evolution, a field which had me enraptured for quite some time.

Did you know that only God could have created cells? Courtesy of the ICR, this is my proof: "The higher the number of specifications required for life, the lower the probability that life could have arisen through random, undirected forces. The actual number of specifications now known is so high that there is no reasonable doubt that life must have been engineered by a perceptive power that exists beyond natural laws. Since natural entities cannot account for life, a supernatural entity must."

Was that so hard, journalists and columnists of America? I made a claim, cited my source, and also included a snippet of my evidence. My column is now beyond reproach, passing the boundary of polemic and becoming an argument. You don't need to get a masters of science in creation research, which is incidentally offered by the ICR's affiliated graduate school, to understand the basic facts.

Because the Earth is so much more than the nine – or eight planets – it must have been caused by God. For instance, "The earth's 365-day, 6-hour, 49-minute and 9.54-second trip around the sun (the sidereal year) is consistent to over a thousandth of a second," and, "If the yearly average temperature on earth's surface changed by only a few degrees or so, much of the life on it would eventually roast or freeze."

Supernatural forces are necessary to overcome the loss of energy in Earth's orbital velocity and its temperature, ergo God helps out.

In fact, the recent demotion of Pluto from planet to dwarf planet is probably another example of the scientists playing with the numbers. If Earth is one of nine planets, or one-ninth, then the percentage of planets supporting life in the Solar System is 11.11 percent. Scientists inflate the likelihood of habitable planets by reducing the amount of planets to eight so that one-eighth of the planets, or 12.5 percent, now support life.

A recent column in our own Daily Collegian quoted a global warming scientist saying how he added or subtracted numbers from temperatures. Now we have scientists adding and subtracting entire planets from the universe just to further their profitable agendas. When will such peer-revised deception stop passing as a standard model of the world? And when will our men and women of letters, in college or metropolitan newspapers, not only express skepticism but back up their own claims with solid evidence?

Obama's first year lacking in progress

Alex Perry

Seeing as Barack Obama's first calendar year as president is coming to a close, I figured I would review his stated goals from his campaign and compare expectations to accomplishments.

In the early part of Obama's acceptance speech at the Democratic National Convention last summer, he said that his perspective on progress for the country differs from what Republicans see as progress.

"You see, we Democrats have a very different measure of what constitutes progress in this country. We measure progress by how many people can find a job that pays the mortgage ... We measure progress in the 23 million new jobs that were created when Bill Clinton was president," he explained.

If that is truly the measuring stick by which Obama wants to be evaluated, he has failed us miserably so far as president. Under Obama, over four million Americans have lost their jobs. A significant portion of the alleged jobs he has "saved" with the stimulus have proved to be fraudulent.

In addition to all this, the country now faces record deficits. By the president's own measure of progress, he has kept our nation at a standstill for nearly a year.

Although I could easily end the column right here, since the president and I both agree that he has made no progress for our country in the past year, I feel that there are other ways to measure progress in this country. Obama was not elected to create jobs. There are many other issues voters expect Obama to solve.

For instance, closing Guantanamo Bay. Obama promised to get that done by the end of this year, and although it hasn't yet been closed, he has said he will get around to it. So we can chalk that up to the "progress" column.

What about making our nation energy-independent? That was a goal during the campaign as well. Obama promised that, "For the sake of our economy, our security and the future of our planet, I will set a clear goal as president: In 10 years, we will finally end our dependence on oil from the Middle East."

No progress has been made in this area yet, because the economy and health care have taken most of Obama's attention this past year. If I were a betting man, I would bet that we will still be pumping gas in 10 years.

The country now faces record deficits. By the president's own measure of progress, he has kept our nation at a standstill for nearly a year.

What about our wars abroad? Obama said this past week that he intends to send 30,000 more troops to Afghanistan. He is using the same strategy that George W. Bush successfully deployed last year in Iraq. The same strategy that Obama blasted during the campaign and still has yet to admit was a success.

But, to Obama's credit, this was a difficult decision for him to make and he still made the correct one. He said all along during the campaign that he felt winning in Afghanistan should have always been our primary focus. He said he intended to win in Afghanistan and this decision backs up his campaign promise.

The reason it was a difficult decision, beyond the obvious reason that he's sending 30,000 more troops into danger and extending the war, is that his anti-war far-left base will be disappointed. They thought they were electing him to end the war, not extend it.

We've all seen the silly anti-war bumper stickers around town – Obama has to know that people with those stickers are going to be pissed. If he didn't, he found out when Michael Moore sent him a letter the day before he addressed the nation about Afghanistan. The letter indicated that Moore would consider Obama a "war president" if he decided to send 30,000 more troops to war. Moore also said that if Obama decided to send more troops he will "Turn a multitude of young people who were the backbone of your campaign into disillusioned cynics."

Obama making this decision – the correct decision – in the face of all these critics within his own party is something that should be commended. Hopefully, down the road, he will be vindicated for making the decision when we successfully wrap up the wars in the Middle East.

Lastly, I think we should take a look at what the president has done with health care. Obama came into office with the mission of giving everyone affordable and accessible care. We currently don't know if his health care plans will be realized since they still have not been passed, but what we do know is the plan will certainly make health care accessible to everyone because it will be mandated.

What we don't know is whether or not it will do anything to lower the costs of health care. I would argue it will not and it likely won't, but it's not fair to say at this point. What is fair to say is that health care is no more affordable or accessible now then it was 11 months ago.

Overall, the first year in office for Obama has led to pretty much no progress for our country. The deficit is out of control, unemployment has soared, Guantanamo Bay is still open, the wars are still going and health care is still far from being resolved. But don't worry, there is good news. It's only been one year, Obama still has three. The bad news? It's only been one year, Obama still has three.

Festive films that won't make you cringe

By Mark Schiffer
Collegian Staff

It is difficult to say that that the holidays are an uplifting time for everyone. Packed toy stores, clusters of relatives and flight delays due to inclement weather all manage to form what for some is the pinnacle of stress for their year.

Consequently, more and more people are taking issue with the maudlin tone that tends to be taken in holiday-themed films. For those of you who want to take a baseball bat to the television every time "Rudolph the Red-Nosed Reindeer" is re-run, here are 10 Holiday Films Which Won't Make You Cringe.

10. A Christmas Story – Let's pretend that it isn't shown for 24 hours a day on Christmas every year. If one manages to look past the TBS marathon, it's difficult to deny that what we have here may in fact be the epitome of American Christmas, in the best possible way. While it never feels over-cynical, it manages to avoid the easy outs of hyper-sentimentality favored by many holiday-themed films.

9. Black Christmas – It is only fitting for Bob Clarke to have two movies on this list, especially with the previous film being a family classic. On the other side of the coin, several years earlier he made this horror staple starring Margot Kidder, set in a sorority house. While you may remember the title from the horrific remake released several years ago, the original more than delivers in terms of thrills and chills. With one of the creepiest ambiguous endings this side of "He's still out there somewhere... waiting...," "Black Christmas" is a classic horror film for the Scrooge in all of us.

8. Fanny & Alexander – For the art-house fans out there, this Ingmar Bergman masterwork was originally produced for Swedish television in 1982. Consisting of four episodes, the first of which takes place on Christmas Eve, this Scandinavian tale contains more Dickensian elements than you can shake a stick at. We have evil stepfathers, an endless list of lovable characters, and ghosts. This may be the most plot-heavy film Bergman ever made, and the fact that he pulled it off as his final theatrical piece stands as a testament to his incredible film-making abilities. And with a five-hour plus run time, it is the perfect way to spend those endless snowed-in days.

7. A Charlie Brown Christmas – It is difficult to deny the timelessness of this one. Even non-holiday celebrators (like this writer) understand the elegant beauty contained in the images of the skating children combined with the classic Vince Guaraldi Trio score. The storyline ends up as almost secondary to the effect generated by the isolated snowy setting. This is one worth revisiting every year.

6. The "A Christmas Carol" adaptation of your choice. There's a reason that this story has been retold so many times, folks. Dickens' ghostly tale of redemption continues to resonate, and thus far it has been fairly difficult to screw up in film form. Even the Muppets somehow managed to get it right.

5. The Apartment. Although not technically a Christmas film (the holiday in itself has little to do with the storyline), Billy Wilder's 1960 corporate satire starring Shirley MacLaine and Jack Lemmon has a melancholy wintertime setting which certainly captures some of the gloomier emotions of the holiday season. Although "The Apartment" certainly has an "Up" ending, it feels hard-won and honest. All this is not to say, however, that the film is all doom and gloom. On the contrary, it carries with it a sharply-written script and pitch-perfect performances from its lead actors.

4. Brazil – Terry Gilliam ironically enough chose to set this dystopian classic at Christmastime. Although this film contains little holiday joy, it provides plenty of fodder for cynicism for the grump in all of us. With its trademark unhappy ending and endlessly engaging plot machinations, this razor-sharp satire is the best post-Monty Python work any of them did, according to some (While this writer wishes to stand by "Fawlty Towers", the issue can rest).

3. Gremlins – For many, this film has already become an anti-Christmas classic. Joe Dante's evil imp-like villains have managed to become staples of both the horror and holiday world. Be sure to listen for Kate Berlin'er's deliciously dark monologue about why she hates Christmas.

2. The Ice Harvest – Harold Ramis has had an unfortunate couple of years. With the flop of his artistically-bankrupt "Year One," the time has come to view what in the long run deserves to be remembered as one as his greats, ranking with his comedic peaks in the '80s with "Vacation" and "Caddyshack." We follow John Cusack and Billy Bob Thornton on Christmas Eve, as they attempt to pull off a financial caper. The results are so blackly comic, that this film may in fact be too much for some. It's no wonder that this film was a financial failure.

1. Elves – If you manage to find it, you may be disappointed to discover that this straight-to-video piece of late-80s trash in fact only contains one elf. Despite this discrepancy between title and content, "Elves" is an endlessly enjoyable "horror-comedy," although one could argue that it is in fact neither of those, with an incredibly low budget and bargain-basement acting. Joe Haggerty – who you may remember better as Grizzly Adams – stars as a chain-smoking homeless detective who becomes involved in a plot involving everything from Nazi grandfathers to incestuous evil stepmothers. It all is triggered by a cocaine-using department store Santa Clause being stabbed in the groin to death by the titular elf. This is a horrible, horrible film. It can't be recommended enough.

Primp yourself for holidays

By Fauzia Arain
Chicago Tribune

Holiday party season is in full swing, whether your sights are set on one special soiree or your calendar is flush with festivities. But in all the rushing between the office and your celebration destination, putting your best face forward can easily fall off your priority list.

Don't fret, because professional makeup artist Shannon O'Brien (shannonomakeup.com) has your back ... and face. "When I think of holiday makeup, two things come to mind – metallic eyes and bold lips," says O'Brien, who specializes in beauty makeup (weddings, head shots, fashion) and does makeup for ESPN shows "Around the Horn" and "Pardon the Interruption."

"The smoky eye is changing; the shape has become more catlike and angular," she says, explaining her fresh take on old standbys. "I decided to steer away from the classic holiday red lip and go for a more high – fashion version. A dark wine is so sexy, any woman who wears it oozes confidence."

O'Brien says to avoid feeling flustered and overdoing your face because you're in a rush, pick a focus-eyes or lips – and then follow her easy instructions. Either look can be done in a few snappy steps that clock in at less than 10 minutes each, and both pack a glam, festive punch.

Holiday eyes

1. Sweep silver from Too Faced Eye Shadow Duo in "Ooh & Aah" ($17) all over the lid with a blending brush.

2. Use an angled brush to work the black shadow into the lash line, from the center of the eye to slightly above the outer corner of the eye for "cat eyed" look.

3. Use the blending brush to blend the black shadow into the crease and sweep out past the outer corner of the eye toward the end of your brow.

4. Fill in your brow with the Anastasia Go Brow ($21) pencil and trace the highlighting end across your brow bone just under your brow. Blend with your fingertips.

5. Trim a strip of fake lashes to match the length of your lash line. Apply a dental floss-width of adhesive to the lash band with a Q-tip. Allow adhesive to get a bit tacky and place directly above the lash line.

6. Finally, bronze your cheeks and apply nude lipstick and shimmery gloss.

Holiday lips

1. Prep your pout with a balm or primer and line your lips with Mac lip pencil in "Currant" ($13). You can follow your natural lip line or, to create fuller lips, trace just outside your natural lip line.

2. Now that you have the perfect shape, fill in the lip with Mac Cremesheen lipstick in "Hang-Up" ($14). This lipstick has a patent leather finish, so there is no need to gloss.

3. To complement, but not distract from your lip, sweep a shimmery, sand-colored shadow across your lid. Blend a warm midtone brown into the crease extending toward the end of your brow.

4. Use Mary-Lou Manizer AKA "The Luminizer" ($22) to highlight the center of the eyelid and the high points of your cheeks, creating a golden holiday glow.

5. Add your favorite rosy blush and black mascara, and you are out the door!

WMUA vinyl record convention a success

Music sale a huge hit for lovers of all genres

By Garth Brody
Collegian Staff

It was somewhere around the discovery of adjacent vinyls by KC and the Sunshine Band and Boris Karloff performing a dramatic reading of "Peter and the Wolf" that it became clear: Not a mite of musical minutia would be left unattended to at WMUA's vinyl blowout on Saturday. It was pretty overwhelming. There seemed a bin for every conceivable sub-generic categorization, not to mention the countless bins labeled "Weird" or "?!?!?!?!" or "Who knows?"

The Cape Cod Lounge, where the event took place, was set up with dozens of tables roughly forming two concentric rings, the tables housed the zillions of records, tapes and CDs, with people moseying along in unending loops in the space between them.

By about an hour into the event, ponderous perusal completely clogged the narrower portions of the walking lane. The place was packed, and not just with college kids. In fact, maybe half of the customers browsing the bins were 30-something dudes smelling faintly of cigarettes. In other words, the guys you see wandering around at record stores.

But the sale still had a completely different atmosphere from that of a record store. Some combination of the high ceiling, the teeming masses, and the avant jazz (or noise rock or underground hip-hop or outsider punk) blasting from the WMUA DJ station in the corner gave it the feeling of a trade show for music-obsessed shut-ins. Those 30-something dudes – not to mention all the students – were in their element.

In all the din of strangers talking to strangers about smart-people music, it is a small wonder that the discourse did not degenerate into a kind wherein the person who can name the most obscure side project is the winner. The general attitude was much more earnest than that. Every couple of minutes, at any stand, there could be overheard a moment of genuine discovery – either a vendor would go on at exuberant length about some record the customer wasn't looking for, or the latter would do the same for some record the former didn't have, always to the delight of both.

The ubiquitous spark of sincerity that made the sale more than just a bigger, cheaper version of a used record store came, in large part, from the various solo vendors who travelled to the University of Massachusetts from all over the surrounding regions to display their collections. The success of the event hinged on these hardy travelling merchants.

Dean Proserpio, a record vendor from the Boston area, described his experience selling music at other such sales all over the Northeast by saying, "I find myself at these more 'traditional' record shows with old funk and classic rock ... and I'll be the one guy selling house music."

If not always appropriate for those events, where the music can take a backseat to its rarity, his vinyl stockpile is always backed up by his own heartfelt obsession. He only sells what he knows, which incidentally makes his selection perfect for college-age kids. He jokingly remarked that this makes him feel hip, then resumed eating his sandwich.

At the opposite end of the room, Stephan Brandstatter from Brattleboro, Vt. stood behind a very different array of records, an unlit cigarette hanging from his mouth. Brandstatter has been selling music for 30 years, but last year (in fact, exactly a year and a day before the sale) his record store burned down. Now he sells mostly from his own personal collection, travelling with the music he knows and loves, just like Proserpio, to sales like this one. Jazz, blues and classic rock primarily from the 60s and 70s composed most of his available selection.

Adjacent to Brandstatter's table was that of Rick Spruchman, also originally from Brattleboro (though he has relocated to nearby Easthampton, Mass.). Spruchman's records come from 50 years of his own acquisitions of rock, blues, folk and psychedelic music. But it was not until five years ago that he overcame his crippling collector's Syndrome and started selling the stuff.

Now, he comes to record shows like Proserpio and Brandstatter, touting a similar philosophy that "if you don't feel it, it's just an intellectual exercise." And he definitely feels it. As he raised his prized Gandalf vinyl (with a price tag of $300) to show it off, one could practically see his grey ponytail beard wag.

On the other side of the record tables, customer Brian Eolan, a UMass sophomore, opened his bag to reveal his day's purchases: a vinyl LP by John Coltrane, another by The Cure, and Roxy Music's eponymous debut. The Roxy Music album was the real prize, as he'd been looking for that for, like, three years, and it's always $20 and not worth it." He acquired it at half that price at Saturday's sale.

UMass sophomore Eddie Habib took a less measured approach to the day's proceedings. He explained, "I saw them, they looked cool, they were $10 each, I had $20 to spend, so I picked 'em up." The first of the two victims in his indiscriminate musical rampage was Free Kitten's "Call Now" LP, which he chose for the two lovely ladies on the cover art. Little did he know that Free Kitten was a noisy rock supergroup with members from Sonic Youth, The Boredoms and Pussy Galore – a veritable treasure trove of indie legitimacy. The other album was "Have a Lospy Xmas." Among the bands featured was one called The Space Negros. Needless to say, he left satisfied.

It was pretty difficult not to leave satisfied: if you came with no musical knowledge, there was enough behind the record tables to go around. If you came with no money, there was a bin marked "Cheaper than free: I give you 1¢ for each one you take" with albums like "The World's 50 Most Loved Waltzes".

Even if you didn't have a record player, you could have taken a stack of free magnets from WMUA's table just outside the Cape Cod Lounge's doors. Not everybody likes underground Austrian trance-hop, but everybody likes refrigerator magnets. WMUA has evidently discovered the secret to success here.

Benton gives her all this year

Senior point guard having fun in '09-'10, Zullo finding rhythm from 3-point range

By Neil Carroll
Collegian Staff

Even though the Massachusetts women's basketball team had a 13-point lead with less than three minutes to play against Quinnipiac on Sunday, Kim Benton was going all out.

The senior point guard was in full sprint after a loose ball and flopped onto the hardwood as she slid into the scorer's table, knocking it from its position next to the court. The UMass coaching and training staffs were concerned as Benton peeled herself off of the court, but she wasn't hurt. In fact, she was laughing uncontrollably at the scene as she jogged down the court.

"It's just my personality," Benton said about the play. "I'm very outgoing and I have a lot of energy so I bring it onto the court."

Benton set a career high with eight rebounds in the first game of the weekend for the Minutewomen, and pulled down six in Sunday's contest. She is currently fourth all-time in 3-pointers made in UMass history, but is also a key figure in the team's chemistry.

"As a point guard I have to be a leader on the court," Benton said. "I have to show my teammates that it has to be more fun and we can't always be serious, so I go out there and show [the team] it can be fun and relaxed."

As a senior, Benton is second on the team with 17 assists while averaging four points and three rebounds in eight starts this season, but concentrates on doing all of the small things as a leader of the Minutewomen.

"Kim's nickname is the bulldog, and she is a tough kid … she's confident in her skill and her ability and has a great understanding of the game," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said.

Finding her shot

Redshirt junior Megan Zullo had 20 points and two steals in UMass' 82-66 victory over Quinnipiac in the championship game of the Brown Bear Classic. Zullo hit three 3-pointers in the last three minutes of the first half and finished the day 6-of-8 from beyond the arc.

On the season, Zullo is now shooting 42 percent from 3-point range, but she admits she was not always as good of a shooter.

"I always was more of a driver and penetrator, but when I was playing in middle school and high school I was playing more with my sister," Zullo said of her playing days as a child. "She was the shooter, so I then got a shot because she and I practiced together."

Zullo's twin sister Kim also plays college basketball at Peace College in Raleigh, N.C. and the two talk frequently about basketball.

In high school, the two guards led Farmville Central High School to the North Carolina 1A State Championship in their senior year. In her career in high school, Zullo averaged 21.0 points, 6.0 rebounds, 5.0 assists and 5.0 steals per game.

Zullo attended North Carolina State for her first two years of college but was unhappy with the situation there. She sat out all of last year for UMass because of NCAA rules after transferring, but formed a bond with her teammates in practice and around the campus. Along with Benton and senior Diatiema Hill, Zullo is one of three captains for the Minutewomen.

"I'm extremely happy here, and I think we're all coming together and getting things done," Zullo said.

thing you know they are throwing it around and scoring a goal.

The River Hawks failed to capitalize on two power-play opportunities in the first period, but the Minutemen made the most of theirs as Will Ortiz notched his fifth goal of the season. After a Jimmy Hobbs pass deflected off the skate of Michael Lecointe, Ortiz one-timed the shot into the top right corner of the net to put UMass up 1-0 with 5:8 seconds remaining in the period.

Casey Wellman scored his 12th goal of the season off of assists from James Marcou and Matt Irwin to put UMass up 2-0 in the second period. But just over a minute later, UML's Jeremy Dehner took advantage of a 4-on-3 man advantage to pull the River Hawks within one.

UMass' Rocco Carzo and UML's Chris Ickert were called for matching two-minute hitting after the whistle penalties, and 2:0 seconds later Ortiz would find himself in the penalty box as well, following an elbowing call setting up the power-play chance.

With fewer players on the ice, Dehner took his time after receiving a pass from Nick Schaus, before finding an opening over Paul Dainton's (33 saves) left shoulder for the River Hawks first goal of the night.

"We come up with the second goal and have a two-goal lead, and obviously they are feeling it and we are in charge and then we lose our discipline, lose our focus and we take a couple of penalties," Cahoon said. "They end up scoring a goal and it changes the complexion of the game a little bit and then we get sloppy."

UMass tied the game at two, 10 minutes into the period on Valloram's first goal of the game. After setting a bouncing puck sent to him by Maury Edwards, Valloram beat Dainton between his legs. The River Hawks took the lead with 2:24 remaining in the period on a Paul Worthington goal.

Friday night, the Minutemen got out to an early lead as well but would give up another three unanswered goals to Boston College as it fell 3-1, before the fifth largest crowd (8,169) in Mullins Center history.

UMass jumped out to an early 1-0 lead just 2:08 into the first period, after forward James Marcou scored his fifth goal of the season and team leading 24th point. Just 17 seconds after the Eagles' Brian Gibbons was sent to the penalty box for hitting from behind, Chase Langeraap fed a pass to Marcou who beat BC's goaltender, Milner Parker (23 saves), for the goal.

The power-play goal came against the top penalty kill in the HEA and 12th best in the nation. UMass finished the night 1-for-4 on the power play, while BC went 1-for-5 while on the man advantage.

The Eagles tied it up five minutes later when sophomore Cam Atkinson took a pass from Tommy Cross and fired it past Dainton (29 saves) for the equalizer.

The second period belonged to BC as it took a 2-1 lead 13:16 into the period when Gibbons scored his fourth goal and team-leading 14th point of the season UMass was outshot 16-6. Despite taking only six shots on net, the Minutemen had their opportunities, but failed to capitalize.

The third period saw UMass outshoot the Eagles, 7-5, but none found the net for the Minutemen. Atkinson, however, found the net while on the man advantage with 59 seconds to go. The score was the sophomore's sixth of the season and second of the night, putting the game out of reach.

Harris, Gurley lead team past Crusaders

Holy Cross came alive with eight minutes remaining and lowered Massachusetts' lead to eight points. However they could not close the gap any further. The Minutemen continued their offensive attack until the final minutes of the first half, going into the locker room with a 49-34 lead.

"We made shots. When you make shots that really helps, and I thought that gave us some momentum and enabled us to get Holy Cross to play a little faster," Kellogg said.

Holy Cross continued chasing UMass' lead into the second half, coming within seven points at the 12:55 mark. A 3-pointer at the 12:23 mark by Gurley revived his team's offense and put them on another 11-point run. The Minutemen kept at least a 16-point lead for the remainder of the game, taking the 84-63 victory.

Gurley felt as though this game marked an improvement in UMass' ability to gain a lead and maintain it for the entire game.

"Usually in the past we come out flat in the second half and either give up the lead or teams get an even bigger lead on us," Gurley said. "But this game we were able to sustain a little run and just keep our lead."

Holy Cross held an advantage in rebounds coming into the game, averaging 38 boards per game. However, UMass' defense turned the numbers around with 33 defensive rebounds, 11 more the Crusaders. Cavataro, who led his team in rebounds with an average of 13.3 per game, was held to three rebounds by the Minutemen. Hashim Bailey, returning from an injury, had a team-leading eight boards and three blocks, something Kellogg contributed as a main reason for shutting down the Crusaders.

The Minutemen also took advantage of free-throw opportunities, achieving a perfect 8-for-8 in the first half and 10-for-12 overall. Holy Cross struggled inform the line, connecting with only 18-of-29 free throws.

"I thought it was a good game for us, a tough Holy Cross team on the road," Kellogg said. "Our guys came out and played with a purpose tonight, and we really shared the ball tonight."

UMass will travel next to New Jersey on Monday night to face undefeated Seton Hall.

Minutemen drop third in a row, drop to 5th place in HEA

SECOND PERIOD from page 8

Stopping the bleeding

The Minutemen have now lost three games in a row, the longest losing streak of the season, with the two losses this weekend and last weekend's loss to Quinnipiac.

After the loss to the Bobcats, Cahoon talked about how it was important for the game to not be the start of a slide, but it has turned into one.

"There aren't too many teams that don't go through this, and I'm not making excuses by any means, but it is hard to stop the bleeding some times," Cahoon said.

The losses, however, have not been anything to be ashamed of. The first loss came at then-No. 9 Quinnipiac — now ranked No. 4 — and saw UMass overcome a 3-0 deficit, before falling 5-4 in overtime. In the loss to No. 15 BC, the Minutemen were never out of the game, trailing by one until the final minute of the game when the Eagles scored their third goal. And the most recent loss came at a tough UML team that has been ranked as high as No. 3 this season.

"I think I could fill in these games with a couple of other opponents if I had that choice and I could stop the bleeding in a hurry but we play a No. 4, a No. 15 — who could be No. 4 — and No. 8, so you got to be through you can't be sloppy," Cahoon said of the recent losses. "It is not the mentality in the locker room, we just have to sure up those weaknesses if we are going to beat those types of teams."

Sinking losses

Entering the weekend, the Minutemen and the Eagles were tied for second place in the Hockey East standings with 10 points, trailing only New Hampshire who had 12. But with this weekend's losses and two wins a piece from UNH, BC and Maine, UMass has sunk to a tie for fifth place with Vermont.

The Wildcats now have a six-point lead over the Minutemen with 16 points, and the Eagles currently hold second place with 14 points. Maine and UML jumped UMass with the Black Bears sitting in third place with 13 points and the River Hawks holding fourth place with 11 points.

UMass does not have much cushion above the teams below them, with the Hockey East being as strong as it is, holding just a one-point lead over Northeastern and a two-point lad over Merrimack. But UMass, as well as Merrimack have played two fewer games (9) than most teams in the conference (11) – UML has only played in 10 games, and Providence, who sits in last place with five points, has only played in eight.

Seton Hall next up for UMass starting to prove that he might reach Kellogg's goal of 20 minutes if he can stay healthy.

"I feel really good," Bailey said. "I just have to get healthier, stronger, and better."

Overall, Bailey feels encouraged by his progress at the beginning of the season and feels that he can be one of the best players on the floor representing the Minutemen.

UMass to face Seton Hall

If Kellogg and Co. aren't well acquainted with competitive Big East teams, they will by Monday night.

The Minutemen will face their second team from the conference in three weeks as they face undefeated Seton Hall.

After a 12th place finish and a 7-11 conference record during the 2008-09 season, the Pirates (6-0) are having one of the most successful seasons against non-conference opponents compared to other Big East teams.

Seton Hall is one of five teams in the conference with an undefeated record and has blown out opponents in its last three games with an average margin of 34 points. Its last win came against Hartford at home in an 89-56 win.

The Pirates also beat Comell by 10 points on Nov. 20, shortly after the Big Red defeated the Minutemen at the Mullins Center.

UMass hopes that Seton Hall's victory over Comell isn't indicative of its fate when it becomes Pirates' fourth straight visitor.

On paper, Kellogg knows that trying to hand Seton Hall its first loss of the season is going to be a challenge because of its experience, so he wants to make sure his team is well-rested for Monday.

"I would say Seton Hall is an NCAA Tournament team," Kellogg said. "[It is] probably a good Big East team that has older, more mature guys. If you look at the age of the guys, there is probably a pretty good point differential, which is good for our guys to go and see how they stack up."

The Pirates are led by shooting guard Jeremy Hazell, who averages 19.7 points per game, and someone who Kellogg describes as a potential NBA first-round draft pick.

He also praised forward Herb Pope's (13.3 points, 11.2 rebounds) talent. Pope, who transferred from New Mexico State, is shooting at least 50 percent in field goals and 3-pointers.

As much as Kellogg feels inexperience will be a problem against the Pirates, he feels that the Minutemen are much more prepared than they were the last time they went to New Jersey against a Big East team.

"I'm excited [to play Seton Hall] because they're playing well," Kellogg said. "They're shaming the ball and competing."

The last team to play UMass from that conference is Rutgers, who took control for much of the game until the new point guard, Ricky Harris, scored 20 second-half points to help cut the lead to four.

During that game, Kellogg believes the reason why his team never pulled ahead was because it didn't play with a sense of urgency, but expects that won't be a problem on Monday night.

Hawks, Eagles prey on Minutemen

UMass can't hold early leads, fall to No. 15 BC, No. 8 UML

By Jeffrey R. Larnard
Collegian Staff

LOWELL, Mass. — A hat trick by UMass Lowell's David Valloram ended the River Hawks' three-game losing streak, but extended the Massachusetts hockey team's longest of the season.

After a 3-1 loss Friday night to Boston College in Amherst, the No. 9 Minutemen dropped their third game in a row Saturday night, as they fell 5-3 to their sister program in Lowell.

"They played hard and they stayed with it," UMass coach Don Cahoon said after the loss to UML. "We played hard, and we didn't stay with it, so they get the W."

A 2-0 lead in the second period was erased when the No. 8 River Hawks scored three unanswered goals, but UMass looked poised to rally in what started out as a sloppy third period for UML. In the first 10 minutes, 31 seconds of the period the River Hawks were called for four two-minute minor penalties.

With UML looking out of sorts, Michael Marcou notched his fourth goal of the season to tie the game at three. Both squads were reduced to four skaters, when Marcou grabbed the puck off a face off and sent it to J.J. Syner in the neutral zone. Syner then sent a pass back to Marcou who got the pass in the crease and deflected it past UML goalkeeper Ncs in Hamilton (23 saves).

The Minutemen had a 5-on-3 advantage for 38 seconds shortly after, when the River Hawks were called for having too many on the ice with UML's Joe Caveney already in the penalty box for hitting from behind. UMass failed to capitalize on the opportunity, swinging the momentum back into UML's favor.

UMass finished the night 1-for-6 on the power play, and UML capitalized on one as well, in three chances.

Valloram notched his second and third goals of the game, completing his hat trick, in less than a three-minute period to put the contest out of reach for the Minutemen.

"The game was there to be had and all it takes is a really sloppy shift," Cahoon said. "A breakdown where we had possession of the puck a couple of times and gave it back and the next

Second periods spell disaster over weekend

By Jeffrey R. Larnard

LOWELL, Mass. — The Massachusetts hockey team played well in the first period of this weekend's games, but the second period was not the same story.

In Friday's, 3-1, loss to Boston College in Amherst, the No. 9 Minutemen were outshot 16-6 and then outshot 18-6 against its sister school UMass Lowell in a 5-3 loss the following night. The large difference in shots turned into goals as the Minutemen were outscored 4-1 in the two games.

Three of the four second period goals came in Saturday's loss, as the No. 8 River Hawks scored three unanswered goals in the period to overcome a 2-0 Minutemen lead.

"This weekend, the second period really broke our back. Broke our back Friday night against BC and broke our back tonight," UMass coach Don Cahoon said after Saturday's loss to UML. "We can't have these lapses as we are of late, it changes the psyche and changes the confidence level for sure."

Overall, Cahoon doesn't feel that the second period has been a major concern for the Minutemen and that over the entire season, the first period has been more of an issue for his team.

"I think we've had more problems over the course of the season in the first period and the second period was a little bit of a pick up," Cahoon said. "The last couple of nights the second period has been real bad. Last week against Quinnipiac we had a big second period to get ourselves back into it."

UM tops HC at DCU for 2nd straight win

By Geena Lombardi
Collegian Staff

WORCESTER, Mass. — Building on momentum from a victory over Quinnipiac, the Massachusetts men's basketball team defeated Holy Cross at the DCU Center this Saturday. UMass came into the game with an 8-1 record at the facility, along with defeating the Crusaders 73-59 at last year's matchup.

The Minutemen (4-4) had a dominating first half, taking an early 5-0 lead and maintaining a lead for the entire game. At the 15 minute, 36 second mark, Ricky Harris hit a 3-point shot to put UMass on a strong offensive run that led to 11 unanswered points. Harris was 6-for-10 on the night with a team leading 19 points, 12 of which came from 3-point range.

"It's just confidence I guess. They left me open, in the beginning of the game they were denying me extra hard. I got a couple good looks and transitions and was confident in knocking them down," Harris said.

Anthony Gurley also served as an offensive threat, scoring seven field goals and two 3-pointers. Gurley closely followed Harris for the team lead with 18 points. The two guards had a combined 25 baskets for the night. The Minutemen as a whole scored 12 3-pointers, compared to three by Holy Cross (2-7), proving to be an important part in the victory.

UMass	73

UMass coach Derek Kellogg felt satisfied with his guards' performance and leadership of the team.

"They have the ball in their hands probably 70 percent of the time and they're making good plays and scoring and doing what I'm asking them," Kellogg said.

Holy Cross struggled offensively in the first half, partly due to an injury to leading scorer Mike Cavataio, which limited his playing time. Cavataio, who is 37-for-74 in field goals this year, contributed just one basket in the first half. It was Andrew Keister and R.J. Evans, who stepped up for the Crusaders with a combined seven baskets, over half of the team's 11 of the period.

Zullo, Hill lead to rout of QU

PROVIDENCE, R.I. — Diatrenia Hill and Megan Zullo both set career-highs in points as the Massachusetts women's basketball team beat Quinnipiac 82-66 in the championship game of the Brown Bears Classic tournament in Providence, R.I. over the weekend.

Hill and Zullo finished with 21 and 20 points, respectively, while Hill also added 14 rebounds and six assists in the game to mark her first double-double in four years at UMass. Hill also went a perfect 11-of-11 from the free throw line.

"She does so many good things for our team and it doesn't always show in the stat line," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said about Hill. "She's just somebody that gets people open over and over again and comes up with so many great boards at opportune times."

Hill played well against the Quinnipiac defense, and found comfort in driving and dishing to shooters like Zullo and Kristina Danella. However in Sunday's game, she also got to the basket and drew fouls against the Bobcats defense.

"Coach has been telling me to be a little bit more selfish," Hill said after the game. "I know I look for my teammates a lot, but when I see that people can't stay with me or I have the open gap, I just take it.

In the first half against Quinnipiac, UMass struggled early on but Zullo hit key shots to provide the team a much-needed spark in the waning minutes.

"Coach Dacko has been talking about how [Cerie Mosgrove, Kristina Danella] and I have to always be ready and always confident in our shots," Zullo said. "When I go in there I'm just ready to shoot, and my teammates went in there and got in the gaps and I put it up."

The redshirt junior finished 6-of-8 from 3-point range. More importantly, though, Zullo filled in when Danella was struggling to find a rhythm on offense.

Quinnipiac's Alyssa Jann and Jacki Mann played tough defense against Danella in the first half and frustrated UMass' primary offensive threat. Mann and Jann used their length and size to hold Danella to 13 points in the game.

The Bobcats' Mann also held played well on offense. She had eight of her team-leading 16 points in the first half to go along with eight rebounds in the championship game.

UMass took the lead 33-31 over the Bobcats before halftime and exploded with a 49-point second half performance to seal the victory.

In UMass' first game of the weekend, the team had huge performances from freshman Jasmine Watson and sophomore Danella, and cruised to a 69-54 victory over host Brown.

On defense, Watson was always in position to stop penetration from Brown, and on offense she was able to use her length and skills in the low post. She finished the game with 13 points and six rebounds and was a key in the Minutewomen's victory.

Danella led the team in scoring with 15 points, and even though she missed her first free throw in 28 attempts, the forward still managed to have a strong offensive game.

The Minutewomen used a team effort to shut down the Brown offense. Christina Johnson, Brown's leading scorer on the season, was held to one point and the Bears were forced to look elsewhere for offense. Sophomore guard Hannah Passafiume led the Bears with 25 points, including shooting 5-of-8 from 3-point range.

Two Minutewomen set career-highs in the opening game of the Brown Bear Classic. Sophomore Emilie Teuscher had a career-high nine points on 3-of-3 shooting from 3-point range, and senior Kim Benton pulled down a career-high eight rebounds to lead the team.

Bailey returning to form after transfer

By Adam Miller
Collegian Staff

WORCESTER, Mass. — One of the bigger questions that surrounded center Hashim Bailey's effectiveness was how long he can play without getting tired.

At Memphis, he never averaged more than three minutes per game and was well over 300 pounds. He was still out of shape when he transferred to Massachusetts to play for the men's basketball team, but worked with the coaching staff to get into playing shape and lose weight.

After a year of redshirting for UMass (4-4), Bailey trimmed down to 275 and now averages 15.4 minutes per game, but coach Derek Kellogg still has concerns over his fatigue and some rust that might have come from sitting out last season.

Even with the increase of playing time, production didn't necessarily follow. Bailey gave the Minutemen some size in the paint early on, but got in foul trouble quickly and lacked the stamina to play more than 10 minutes.

To make matters worse, Bailey battled a groin pull that slowed his progress over the season. Despite not feeling anywhere close to 100 percent, the redshirt junior played through his injury, which paid off in the short term.

When UMass played Michigan State, Bailey was one of the few bright spots in its 106-68 loss. He played 25 minutes and finished with seven rebounds.

Kellogg said Bailey got his first start at center against the Spartans simply because of the experience he adds. The usual starting center, Sean Carter, moved to power forward in place of Sampson Carter.

"Our best lineup is usually when you have more mature guys out there," Kellogg said.

However, playing the most minutes in his collegiate career against MSU had a cost. Bailey aggravated his injury and sat out Dec. 2 against Quinnipiac.

Sitting out of the game turned out to be all Bailey needed to have an impressive performance against Holy Cross.

After having a successful practice on Friday, Bailey said that he felt good enough to play.

"He basically said he can go, and when he started going, I didn't stop him," Kellogg said.

Kellogg said that he saw Bailey's conditioning improve against the Crusaders (2-7) and that he is now producing for the Minutemen. Bailey finished with a game-high eight rebounds and three blocks in 16 minutes.

"Having another big guy in there really helped us," Kellogg said. "He looked like the man in the paint."

Although Bailey felt good enough to play almost 20 minutes, he doesn't feel completely recovered. He hopes that as he improves his conditioning over the season, he'll play an even bigger role with the team.

The Memphis transfer is steadily getting more playing time and is

Department strives to improve recruitment

UMass music faculty aims to battle funding difficulties during a nationwide recession

By Michael Phillis
Collegian Staff

The music department at the University of Massachusetts consists of fewer than 250 undergraduates and 50 graduate students and represents the impact of financial constraints on a department that has shown a level of high ambition and in-depth planning.

Three and a half years ago, Jeff Cox was hired as chair of the UMass music and dance departments and was immediately faced with the task of getting the department renewing their accreditation with the National Association of Schools of Music (NASM).

Jeff Cox, chair of the music department, hopes to continue taking ensemble members to K-12 schools to inspire prospective students to consider UMass' music programs.

The accreditation process forces the department to do a comprehensive self-study. Cox, along with the help of other faculty members, garnered student and faculty input about the department, answered a long list of questions from NASM and submitted a plan intended to improve the department during the next several years.

"We created a document that addresses all the basic standards and expectations that the association feels that a quality music program should have," said Cox. "They approved us."

The document that was produced spanned hundreds of pages and can best be described as similar in thickness to the health care proposals currently being debated in Congress. Much of the report boiled down to three main issues: a lack of tenure track faculty, issues with student recruitment and old facilities in need of renovation.

After gaining these results, members of the department made several changes aimed at fixing the department's stature.

Currently, the music department has five major ensembles, which include two main chorals, two wind ensembles and an orchestra, in addition to its marching band. Student music majors belong to at least one of the ensembles for a majority of their undergraduate career.

Music majors are among the busiest people on campus. They practice their instruments, rehearse in at least one ensemble and take studio lessons on their instrument – on top of a regular course load. Because of this, one of the department's main initiatives is to transform its students' schedules to make it easier for them to complete their requirements in four years.

According to the self-study, undergraduate music degrees range from 125 to 157 credits, depending on the specific major.

Cox likens the music department as being very similar to sports programs that have specific needs and must rely on recruiting in order to fulfill specific opening spots.

"They need a quarterback, we need an oboe," he said.

It is difficult, however, for UMass to recruit students because they have a very limited budget for scholarships and tuition waivers. For a four-year period, the music department has about $160,000 to hand out to prospective students in the form of tuition waivers. In comparison, in 2006, the University of Iowa's music department had $450,000 in scholarships to hand out to help recruit a number of students to help fulfill their specific needs.

Tuition at UMass also does not account for a student's entire bill. A tuition waiver does not reduce student fees, a significant portion of the cost to attend the University, whereas a scholarship can be applied to fees if needed.

Understanding that the department did not have too much power to offer financial incentives, Cox and some of the other professors introduced outreach initiatives of their own. An increased number of outreach trips to K-12 schools were introduced.

James Patrick Miller, who was hired as conductor of the wind ensembles, has placed a big incentive on outreach.

"Some of the trips are here in Massachusetts. Some are out of state in New York, Connecticut, Vermont, New Hampshire and even Maine," he said. "I'm in all of those states this year."

Miller will often bring an ensemble or a selection of students to a school like he did during a trip this past semester to Warwick, N.Y.

"[Warwick] is a great school system where they have big ensembles and music is very healthy," said Miller. When an ensemble goes out to perform for a school it allows those students to see what the UMass music department is doing while giving the music education majors the ability to work with students in the public schools to show them what their experience will be like upon graduation.

"The department as a whole has a fairly aggressive program to not only recruit, but also to provide our various communities to access to what we do," said Benedict Smar, the coordinator for the music education major at UMass. "Our performing ensembles do concerts in schools."

According to some alumni, Jeff Cox brought a new energy to the department when he was hired and made a real effort to change a "stagnant" UMass music program. Cox understood that for a university that is limited financially and cannot employ the pure muscle of money to pull prospective students to the University, that his outreach initiatives were vital to the advancement of the department's recruitment efforts.

Tony Thornton is a visiting professor from Los Angeles who is in charge of the choral ensembles for the year as a tenure track search is being conducted to fill his position for the upcoming academic year. Thornton is one of the finalists for that position.

Thornton said he has seen the amount of people who audition

University Dance Program given collection of Morgan images

By Michelle Williams
Collegian Staff

Recently the University of Massachusetts Dance Program received a collection of images taken by the late Barbara Morgan, a photographer known for her dance images.

The donation includes 38 images taken by Morgan in the 1930s and '40s. Including storyboards from Bennington College Dance Festival, the images portray an event thought of as pivotal in the development of modern dance. Morgan was the first American photographer to document the changes and development of modern dance.

Of the photographs given, some are of Pearl Primus, an African-American dance icon and pioneer in modern dance. In the photographs, Primus performs her signature dances. Primus drew on the dances and cultures of Africa, the Caribbean and American slavery for inspiration in her dancing. She helped shaped what is now considered mainstream modern dance despite resistance from critics. In the 1980s, she was a member of the Five College faculty, teaching anthropology and dance at Amherst College.

Barbara Morgan was a photographer, painter and teacher, though she is best known for her work in capturing images of dance. She attended the University of California, Los Angeles as an art student, where she also worked later in life. In 1930, she moved to New York where she concentrated on photography. She captured dancers Martha Graham, Merce Cunningham, Doris Humphrey, Erick Hawkins and notable others. Morgan has received awards including the Lifetime Achievement Award by the American Society of Magazine Photographers. She has also received a grant from the National Endowment for the Arts.

The collection also includes images of Erick Hawkins. A leading American modern-dancer and choreographer, Hawkins was the first male danc-

Pirates plunder UM

Freshman forward Terrell Vinson, along with fellow freshman Javorn Farrell, scored 12 points and grabbed eight rebounds in the loss to Seton Hall. With the win, the Pirates remain undefeated at 8-0 this season.

After putting together its best performance so far this season on Saturday, the Massachusetts basketball team fell way short against Seton Hall on the road Monday night, 86-68, snapping its two-game winning streak.

The Minutemen cut a 35-point deficit to 18 after an abysmal first half in which they shot 19.4 percent from the floor, but could not stop the Pirates on defense, who recieved strong performances from a number of different players.

Senior guard Ricky Harris and redshirt junior Anthony Gurley both had 15 points for the Minutemen (4-5), but the Crusaders (7-0) remained undefeated behind impressive play by guard Jeremy Hazell and forward Herb Pope. Pope led all scorers with 22 points and a game-high 15 rebounds, going 9-of-15 from the field, while Hazell went 8-of-14 from the field and made five steals.

Gurley had five turnovers, while forward Terrell Vinson had four against the Hall who had a 44-19 lead going into the half.

Along with Harris and Gurley, the freshman class showed promise on the offensive side of the ball, with Vinson and Javorn Farrell adding 12 points and eight points, while guard Freddie Riley and forward Sampson Carter both added seven off the bench.

Vinson led the team in rebounds with seven, while Hashim Bailey

er to dance with the company of Martha Graham. After leaving Graham's troupe, Hawkins formed his own called The Erick Hawkins Dance Company. He changed the path performances were taking, insisting on performing only to live music, touring with the Hawkins Theatre Orchestra. In 1994, he was presented the National Medal of the Arts by former President Bill Clinton. Of the images of Hawkins included, one is titled "El Penitente." Taken in 1940, the photograph shows Hawkins mid-air with his arms strained and veins pulsing, portraying the physical tension of the dance. He has his chin tilted upward, facing a grey sky in the background.

The collection will be a permanent part of the University's art collection and will be preserved at the University Gallery. To view the works, appointments must be made through the gallery's registrar.

The donation was given by Nils Morgan, a grandson of Barbara Morgan, and his spouse, Kara Rillings Morgan. According to a release, the couple made the choice to give the collection to the University based on the integrity of the program. With the donation, Nils Morgan said in a release, "As part of the Five College Dance Department, UMass is a prominent center of dance in higher education. It also offers an outstanding fine arts program. We are confident the Barbara Morgan images will be put to thoughtful creative educational uses."

In a release, Director of the Dance Program Peggy Schwartz said, "We are truly honored to receive this gift. These historic photos will inspire and educate our students, our audiences and generations of dancers yet to come."

The department plans to restage some of the dances in performances by the University Dancers, the University's student performing company.

Schwartz has lectured and published works on dance education and national standards in the arts, and she regularly presents at conferences of the Congress on Research in Dance. She and her husband Murray Schwartz are currently working on a biography of the late icon Pearl Primus titled "The Dance Claimed Me: A Biography of Pearl Primus" set to be published in 2010.

With the gift, Peggy Schwartz said in a release that she believes UMass will be known as a center for black dance education. "With the inclusion of significant photos of Pearl Primus and Asadata Dafora, UMass becomes a major locus of Primus scholarship and home to important images of the development of black dance in America."

Faculty hiring and outreach give new look for his ensembles increase by "more than a third" this semester over previous years.

The chorals have been involved with outreach along with the other ensembles. A recent event that occurred this semester where, "Over a 100 high school students [came] for a daylong festival," according to Thornton. "The more that we can bring students to our campus… it will be great for us in terms of recruiting efforts," he said.

There has been a strong incentive to demonstrate to public K-12 education institutions that UMass has something positive going on and that, when these students apply for college, they should consider UMass Amherst.

"A lot of the people who should be observing our program aren't right now," said Miller. "My goals for my students and the ensembles are to get out there and do great stuff musically so that people take note of what we are doing … because that has artistic ramifications. It has recruiting ramifications, and it has most importantly, a significant impact on our students that are here now and the students who used to be here … our alumni."

Both Miller and Thornton have been hired (or are looking to be hired in Thornton's case) for a highly coveted tenure track position in the UMass music department.

"In the wind ensemble symphony band positions, it's been about seven years [that we have had an interim person in that position]," said Cox. "It's really exciting, it's a period of growth."

During the course of the NASM review in 2006-2007, then-Chancellor John Lombardi stated that he wanted the UMass music department to compete against schools like Indiana University. According to senior Jill Gilfoil, programs like Indiana University are among the most competitive music programs in the country.

There are fewer tenure track faculty positions at UMass than at other institutions. As a result, these spots, especially because of their job security, are some of the most competitive in academics.

According to the NASM review and Cox, the UMass music department consists of about 50 percent tenured positions and 50 percent term appointments or lecturers. "The norm really in other flagship institutions would be to have a lot more tenured and a few not tenured," said Cox.

The NASM report said, "One of the most pervasive themes throughout the analysis is the [department's] need to move from term lecturer appointments to tenure track positions." The report continued later on, "The [department] has become a training ground for young, talented faculty – only to see them taken away to tenure track positions at peer institutions."

"That's a sensitive issue; it's true," said Cox in regards to the above quote. There have been a lot of new tenure track hires every year since Cox took over as chairman. There are three current tenure track searches for the department: one for the choral conductor's position, one for jazz studies and one position for a pianist.

Heather Teed graduated from UMass in 2008 with a master's degree in performance. She said the reason the tenure track positions are so important is because they are some of the most highly sought after – and therefore attract the best candidates – of any academic positions.

"I think the department is going through a lot of change," said Smar. "We have a lot of new faculty, and we have had a lot of faculty retire. I'm not suggesting that we have a lot of new positions, just a lot of new people."

The funding for faculty is $3,766,048 for the current academic year. This is down from $3,982,702 for fiscal year 2007. When faculty members retire, the music department is not immediately granted a search to replace them.

"When there is any faculty position opening, the department must formally request to be allowed to search for a replacement," Cox said in an email. "This requisition request goes to the Dean of the College for his consideration. If we are granted the chance to search, and then are able to hire a new faculty member, the salary to pay that new faculty member is provided to the department."

One of the restraints on the department's budget comes from having to pay down a debt of $116,000 over a three-year period. The debt will be paid off by the end of the current academic year, according to the NASM review.

Among the interviews conducted, there was a theme of shared enthusiasm for the wind ensemble conductor, James Patrick Miller.

According to Gilfoil, crowds have increased and people are showing a renewed dedication to the wind ensembles now that Miller has taken over after an interim conductor held the position for several years.

"[Symphony band] is a great place to be and a worthy place to be, everyone has something to learn there," said Gilfoil.

Erin Laman plays the Clarinet in the symphony band. "I remember the first rehearsal that we had for symphony band this year, we just sat down, and it just sounded so much better. Last year, I just remember watching the clock and thinking this feels like such a long class, but this year I don't find myself watching the clock, and the class is over before you know it."

It is by investing in the kind of tenure track positions Miller now holds that demonstrate the kind of people that can be brought to UMass to teach students. Cox has made an effort to advocate for the need for more tenure track faculty and by bringing it up the chain, he has been excited by the ability to search for new people.

Miller's ensemble practices in room 36 in the Fine Arts Center. Outside of the room is a sign that reads, "Area of Refuge" advertising the area's safe place if the campus were to be struck by a nuclear weapon. To get down to the practice room, three sets of stairs must be descended along down a hallway surrounded by poured cement. According to Teed, the environment can be described as "industrial."

In the past three years, there have been significant renovations to the Fine Arts Center. The NASM review says, "Our facilities show the wear and tear of a 30-year-old building which necessitates constant repairs including makeshift solutions to heating and cooling problems, water seepage, and lack of adequate air flow in the building."

Work over the summer did much to revitalize the Fine Arts Center into a more music friendly place. Many of the leaks have been fixed, airflow issues have been handled and the place looks cleaner than it had in the past because of renovations.

According to Massachusetts State Senator Stan Rosenberg, there has been a sharp reduction in funding for higher education in this state.

"Forty years ago, the state paid 90 percent of the UMass budget," he said. "Twenty years ago, it was about 66 percent and now we are down to about 30 percent … The reduction in state spending on higher education appropriation is driving up the need for more student charges and increased financial aid."

With the reduction in the amount of money going to UMass from the state, budgets are stretched, especially in this economic recession. The music department under Jeff Cox has set out a plan for their own development but the financial picture remains restrictive and unclear.

Cox has attempted to generate new revenue streams for the department by applying for grants. "What we can do is work real hard to try to establish new revenue sources to help us have more than just the basic budget allocation from the dean."

Cox is applying for grants especially for the purpose of being more competitive with scholarships in order to bring in students, especially from out of state who pay higher tuition and can contribute to the school's revenue stream.

Thornton talked about how he sees the changes in the department right now.

"We have an amazing department chair, Jeff Cox. In the past, there have been some pretty significant financial issues within the department. [Cox] has really gotten us back on course. We are on the top of the list in terms of recruiting out of state students."

Right now, Cox has to wrestle with the plans he has and the realities of the budget.

"You have to plan. What makes it more complex right now, this is shared throughout the university, is all these concerns about what will happen to our budget in the future? You do plan for the future; one of the biggest things is to try to diversify our revenue sources."

Defending the Constitution

Eric Magazu

Yesterday, Dec. 7, was Pearl Harbor Day, one that President Franklin D. Roosevelt called "A day that shall live in infamy." While seemingly less ubiquitous than the notorious, but more recent, Sep. 11, 2001, Americans continue to commemorate Dec. 7, 1941 even as we approach its 70th anniversary.

Pearl Harbor Day provides us with an opportunity to reflect upon the dependence that we place upon our military as a free people and the relationship between the military and civil government in a nation founded upon liberty.

The glory that we owe to our American military is that the top brass, down to the enlisted men and women, consistently refer to the Constitution, and, through the Constitution, to our elected leadership.

We may find a difference of opinion on this matter between the political left and the political right. Virtually all mainstream politicians, be centered left or centered right, will laud the accomplishments and the sacrifices of our military men and women. In this, there is no dispute, but there appears to be a slight difference in the way they may view the importance of our military as it relates to our freedom.

On the political left, there seems to be a fear of giving too much credit to the military for securing our freedoms. The examples of right-wing military juntas in Latin America are often brought up as specters of placing too much stock in the sacrifices of our fighting men and women. If we rely too heavily on the military for our freedom, it is, under this line of thinking, feared that the military could become sainglorious and believe that it is supreme over our civil government.

On the political right, there may be too much "Pomp and Circumstance" being played to our military." Our soldiers provide us with insurance that protects our nation and our ideals from foreign attack. If we did not have our armed forces, America would be at the mercy of every foreign nation. A nation that did not have such a strong heritage of liberty may assert sovereignty over our land, and we could see our freedoms erode.

But it is our culture, our morality and our ideals that preserve our freedom.

Militaries are used in many countries, and generally they serve at the command of their respective head of state. Armed forces may be used in ways that protect freedom, but equally they may be used in ways that protect tyranny.

The glory that we owe to our American military is that the top brass, down to the enlisted men and women, consistently refer to the Constitution, and, through the Constitution, to our elected leadership. Our armed forces will grant allegiance to the administration of a president, who is constitutionally-sanctioned a Commander-in-Chief, even when his administration acts in ways that they may view as negatively affecting the armed forces.

The extraordinary nature of our military lies in the fact that, as our fellow citizens, they too accept the authority of the Constitution.

The submission of the military to civil authority is far from being its only glory. The high glory due to our armed forces is that ordinary men and women will volunteer to serve, putting their lives on the line to defend their fellow Americans. We rightly hold in awe any person that puts his life on the line or, may God forbid it, trades in his life, so that we may live in freedom. No one can show greater love than this.

We may hope one day, as John Lennon's song "Imagine" teaches us, that there may be nothing that we will have a need to die for, but, as for today, those brave men and women who put their lives at risk, both in our military, as well as in our police and civil defense forces, show amazing love for their fellow citizens.

If our ideals are strong enough that we can look to them and be ready, not only to live by them, but to die by them, our country will be in good shape for a long time to come. If we remember the birthright of sacrifice bequeathed by our forefathers, and hold steady anchor in our ideals of liberty and freedom, we will never go too far off the path. In this spirit, may we hold a perpetual vigil, by shining light on the events that occurred 68 years ago at Pearl Harbor.

Winterizing the holidays

Thomas Moore

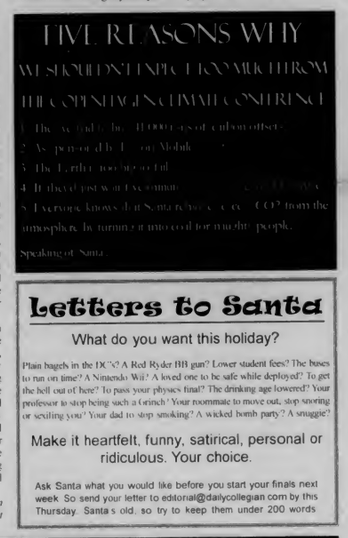
Another week and a half and most of us will be shipping out in every direction to our homes. Some will hop on planes and endure sleepless, multi-lay overs, red-eye flights to more temperate climates. Others will cruise on down 91 a few miles to their shelters and hunker down for another New England winter. But, wherever you're going, here's a fun topic that I think we should all consider as we enter into this season: political correctness.

Now I know what you're thinking, because I too would rather flip the page than hear some kid's rant about how we all have a right to say what we want. But that's not what I'm talking about. What is important is how a postmodern movement to preserve individuality is actually forcing us to make compromises that deconstruct what we once held as important beliefs.

A good friend of mine, who has been working as a resident assistant for a while, shared with me what he and the other RAs were told during a routine staff meeting last week. Because RAs are expected to represent the University of Massachusetts with honor and dignity, they are called to a level of respectfulness toward others with special emphasis on their residents. This means a strict and swift review of all misbehavior as determined by the contract that RA agree to uphold while they are employed by the University. Simply put, RAs can't get hammered, pee in the elevator, and drop a flaming couch from their 15th floor lounge in John Quincy Adams and expect to collect their stipend and stay in their free dorm for much longer.

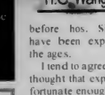
To the RAs all over campus, I encourage you to completely disregard the new policy regarding this upcoming school break.

More than just refraining from arson, RAs are expected to refrain from using profane or otherwise derogatory language as well. Political correctness, as it seems, is the reason (among others) why your resident assistant doesn't refer to you with ethnic slurs or use religious slurs to get you to hold the door for them. Which is great, don't get me wrong.



But here's where it crosss the line. The RA who I was speaking of earlier told me that they were all advised by their superiors to not refer to this upcoming season as the "holiday season," since that would exclude people who do not participate in holidays. Never mind Hanukkah, Kwanzaa, Al Hijra, Bodhi Day, Christmas, Ashura, Boxing Day, Maghi and World Religion Day. This season, as the school administration has seen fit, will be called purely: "The Winter Season."

Now it's easy for us as politically corrected Americans to take this new censorship lightly. It's also easy to not tip the Wings delivery person or to rush out of the bathroom without washing our hands, but that doesn't mean that we should. Let's pretend to take this seriously for just a minute.



To the RAs all over campus, I encourage you to completely disregard the new policy regarding this upcoming school break. When it comes down to it, your beliefs and passions should be of more importance that of an institution. I understand that there are those of us who don't observe any type of religious or ethnic holiday, so by all means—feel free to adhere to the new suggestion of calling this vacation a winter break.

But let me start off this season with a little jab at the politically correct culture and an attempt at preserving what is extremely important to me. Without the intention of offense or the force feeding of my own beliefs to you as the reader, it is out of joy and love that I wish you all a Merry Christmas and a Happy Holiday.

Friendship has snags that can be overcome

H.C. Wang

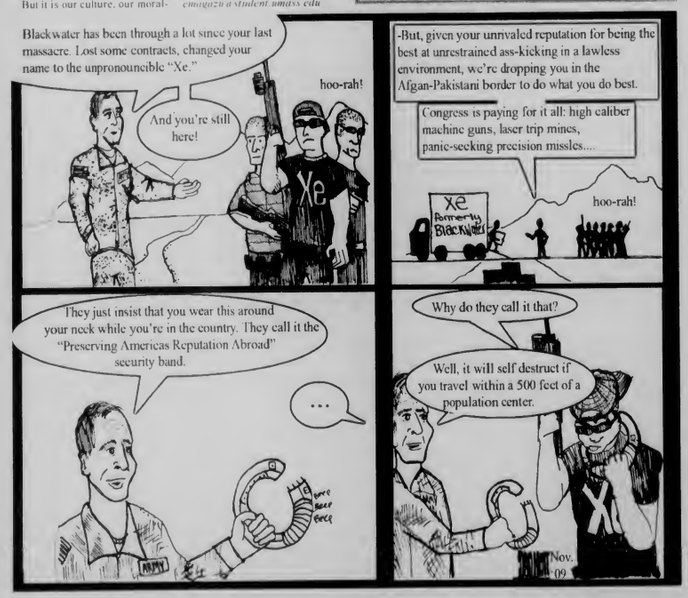
The Beatles once said in a song: "I get by with a little help from my friends." Aristotle said, "Friendship is a single soul dwelling in two bodies," explaining how friends are all one needs in life. Bros before hos. Similar sentiments have been expressed throughout the ages.

I tend to agree with the school of thought that explains if someone is fortunate enough to find and keep one true friend in a lifetime, then they are truly blessed. Friendship is a word that seems to be thrown around these days without the true meaning being strongly understood. To be a good friend and to have a good friend makes life more fun, interesting and easier to handle. My personal criteria have been criticized in the past for being too stringent – am I expecting too much when I demand quality in the people that surround me?

Consider this: it's like learning to play with others in the kindergarten sandbox. The other kids deserve a turn, too.

There is plenty to idealize about the golden goodness of friendship – soul mates, brain twins, someone who is capable of listening to all thoughts and opinions about life and understand what is meant, someone who never judged or deserts even in times of hardship and disagreement. Sounds perfect, doesn't it? Well, every one is human, but is it wrong to demand a little compassion and dependability?

The number one thing, as always between any two people hoping to engage in a successful interaction of any kind, is communication. Which can be easier said than done when it comes to certain individuals, but remember that we each have our quirks and weaknesses. Focus on strengths instead. Nobody likes to be in a conversation where the other person is constantly doing all the talking. Be a good listener. If just sitting back and listening seems to be difficult, stop and think about why that is.



Consider this: It's like learning to play with others in the kindergarten sandbox. The other kids deserve a turn, too. Is what one person wants to truly any more important than what the other person wants to say? If there is some kind of perilous time restraint on the topic, then of course by all means say it. Otherwise, keep a mental check to switch off between speakers for starters if necessary in order to achieve equal gabbing time.

On the other hand, avoid tallying in most other instances. Just like keeping score on how many orgasms each person gives and receives would quickly tear apart the relationship, keeping score for every little thing from who spends more on Christmas gifts to who called who last is a surefire way to lead to one or both parties feeling used and shortchanged. Cut each other a little slack. True friends are those who stick by through the bad times and the good. Life is hard by nature and not everything is always sunshine and kittens. However, as someone who has time and again felt disappointed by people, I must recommend caution against too much slack as well.

If the feeling is that one person's needs are consistently taking precedent over another's, something about the relationship needs reevaluation. Look back and think introspectively. Has there ever been a single serious heart-to-heart conversation through the course of the friendship or is that person just fun to hang out with on occasion? Grow that backbone. Don't let other people, even someone who is supposedly a friend wear the boots all the time.

If that isn't enough to convince, here's something else: Maintaining strong friendships can even lead to a longer, healthier life span. Attitude and the ability to deal with stress and problems seem greatly increased with each close friend that one has. Friends provide a kind of health benefit that even intimate partners and family members don't provide. Researchers haven't quite worked out all the details yet, but it has been suggested in various health and psychology publications over the years that being surrounded by good friends can actually boost one's immune system. Now that is something truly worth treasuring.

Ronan furrows deep into 'Bones'

By Samantha Marsh
Collegian Staff

On Dec. 11, 2009, Paramount Pictures will release a limited viewing of the much-anticipated film adaptation of Alice Sebold's 2002 novel, "The Lovely Bones." The film, directed by Peter Jackson ("The Lord of the Rings" trilogy), tells the story of Susie Salmon, a young girl who meets an unfortunate demise at the hands of her neighbor.

But that's only the beginning. "The Lovely Bones" traces the dramas that unfold after Susie's death, as she watches down on her family from a heaven-like place called the "in-between."

Young Irish actress Saoirse Ronan plays the role of Susie Salmon. Ronan was last seen as Briony Tallis in the 2007 film "Atonement," for which she was nominated for several Academy Awards, including Best Supporting Actress.

When asked about what it felt like to be nominated in a recent conference call, Ronan said that, "It was crazy. I was working – I was actually on 'Lovely Bones' at the time, so I was very busy with that. And then, suddenly this thing happened and it was exciting, and it was kind of nerve-wracking and – but you know, it was great and it was a great honor for me to be nominated so young and it was a film that I really enjoyed doing. I was really, really happy."

Ever since her nominations, Ronan's celebrity status has only gotten bigger. With award season coming up, it would be easy to get caught up in all the hype, but Ronan tries to stay calm in regards to awards. "To be honest, I try not to think about award season at all, especially when it concerns a movie that I've made," she said.

Ronan said that she thoroughly enjoyed filming "The Lovely Bones," in part because she felt that the characters were so relatable. Ronan feels that young girls, herself included, will be able to easily see a part of themselves in Susie.

"I mean, Susie's a typical teenage girl," said Ronan, "so I think that hopefully, when girls go and see this movie, they're going to connect with her in some way. I mean, you know, she's interested in photography and fashion, and things like that, and boys of course… I'm interested in all those things!"

"The Lovely Bones" is expected to reach a diverse audience, but the primary focus has been on teenage girls and young adults.

Ronan believes the film's overall message will be understood by both teenagers and adults alike.

"I think that the message of this movie, although it may not seem like it to people who haven't seen it yet, is ultimately hope, and how you get there," said Ronan.

"You know, when Susie arrives in the in-between, she doesn't want to go forward, which would mean accepting her death. She wants to be back on Earth with her family and she knows she can't do that. And to get there, you know, it's about her love for her family and not the hate and vengeance that she has for her murder."

Ronan has said that although the film may seem very dark and dreary, it is also very uplifting, perpetuating a message of hope and inspiration for viewers.

Filming a movie with such a traumatic plot line could be an intense experience for young actors and actresses, however Ronan was able to stay strong and figure out what she needed to do in order to film sequence correctly.

"When we dealt with very emotional scenes, intense scenes, there would be a lot of discussion between me and Pete and Fran, and Philippa, who are the writers, as well. We just talked a lot about it and just made sure that we were going in the same direction and we were on the same page," she said.

The relationship that Ronan formed with Jackson and the writers of the film allowed her to make the best decisions when filming these dramatic scenes. Although the film was based on a best-selling novel, Ronan chose to wait until after she finished filming to read it.

"I just really wanted to focus on the screenplay version, and also I felt like I was a little bit too young to read it at the time. I was 13," she said.

"So, as you know the book is little bit more visual and a bit more violent than the film, so it just made sense. But, I read the book this year for the first time and I absolutely loved it. I felt every emotion possible. And I think because I had been through the whole experience of making the movie and living through the story, I think that helps me to really connect with the book, and to understand the book fully," said Ronan.

"The Lovely Bones" is expected to attract readers of the original novel as well as bring in new fans. The film also stars several veteran actors, including Mark Wahlberg, Rachel Weisz, Stanley Tucci and Susan Sarandon. The film is expected to be released everywhere on January 15, 2010.

Samantha Marsh can be reached at smarsh@student.umass.edu

Saoirse Ronan stars, along with Susan Sarandon, in "The Lovely Bones," an adaptation of Alice Sebold's 2002 best-seller of the same name. Despite dark themes, Ronan feels the film is inspirational.

Brooklyn-based jazz musician Marco Benevento played to modest crowds last Thursday in Northampton's Iron Horse Music Hall, but left little to critique in his performance.

Modest crowds no deterrent for easy-going Benevento and co.

By Angela Stasiowski
Collegian Staff

Marco Benevento is quickly becoming known in the jazz circuits of New York, making Brooklyn his primary stomping ground. Yet this past Thursday, Benevento and his talented trio travelled to Northampton's Iron Horse Music Hall for a new school culture shock unlike any the Pioneer Valley has experienced.

The 10 p.m. performance drew a modest crowd to the quickly chilling street outside the venue. Benevento warmed up his act as attendees waited to warm up freezing extremities indoors. His music is difficult to classify, swinging from jazz to post rock with an emphasis on piano distortion. His music spans genres and decades, with Benevento creating original tunes and covering the likes of Leonard Cohen, The Knife and Beck.

Yet when a bearded Benevento took the stage in a baseball tee and jeans, he looked more like a grunge rocker than a jazz musician. His casual style of dress and his accessibility were half his appeal, making him a true musician for the new generation.

With no opening act, Benevento dove directly into the music. It was not until midway through the show, however, that he introduced the other two components of the trio.

With their unassuming demeanor and uncompromising musical skill, drummer Andy Borger and bassist Reed Mathis seemed well-matched with Benevento. Borger and Mathis accompanied the musician throughout the 13-song set, which was devoid of any encore performance.

A stellar rendition of Benevento's original track "Atari" from the album "Invisible Baby" proved to be one of the show's highlights. True to the gaming console, the song featured a prominent 8-bit sound over Benevento's jazz-inspired piano styling. The two complimented each other perfectly in the live setting.

"The Real Morning Party" was another example of a Benevento original. The performer showcased his multi-tasking ability, taming piano and keyboard simultaneously.

The sixth song in the set was a cover of the Knife's 2008 single "Heartbeats." Benevento's cover of the tune is featured on his most recent album, "Me Not Me." His interpretation began with simple electronic blips, swelling into something entirely new as layers of piano, drums and bass began to unfold.

"That was the song of the year for me," proclaimed Benevento afterwards. Perhaps it was his love of the tried and true tune that made his version so distinct.

Benevento also covered "Golden," a tune that was originally recorded by contemporary alternative-country legends, My Morning Jacket. Benevento transformed the acoustic guitar track into a dramatic piano performance, layered over drumbeats and lush with synthetic sounds.

Taking suggestions by the end of the evening from the crowd, Benevento combined requests for "something funky" and "Johnny Cash" into, "a funky Johnny Cash number."

While the aforementioned "funky Johnny Cash number" was never brought to fruition, Benevento turned up the tempo with the next few tunes. "I'm going to turn this into a dance party," he said with a laugh, taking to the keyboards again.

The show ended with a request for "Echo Park," a song that had originally been recorded with drummer Joe Russo, whom Benevento had performed with under the Benevento Russo Duo. The song was a perfect choice to bring the set full circle, leaving the crowd wanting more but not unsatisfied with what they had already received.

In all, Thursday's performance left little to critique. The set list was an appropriate length, and there was the right ratio of original and cover tracks. No encore was needed, though it would have undoubtedly been appreciated by rapturous fans of Benevento.

One can only hope that Benevento was not discouraged from future performances in the Valley by the show's modest turnout.

Erotic toys provide new pathways to holiday cheer for college students and loved ones alike

By S.K. Murphy
Collegian Staff

For years you may have hurried down the stairs on Christmas morning, eager to thrash your way through the slew of toys and presents set out for you by jolly ole Saint Nick. And while the magic of those innocent times may have dimmed with age and too many keg stands, the joy of getting toys at Christmas time doesn't have to dissipate just because you're in college now.

Quite the contrary, 'tis the season to spread a different kind of Christmas cheer, and stuff the stockings of your loved ones with the kind of gifts that keep on giving: the erotic kind.

Swiss Navy Lubricant. First comes mistletoe, then comes the bedroom. But before you can get anywhere on that extra-long twin mattress you're forced to sleep on in the dorms, you have to have a reliable lubricant. And far and away, Swiss Navy stands uncontested as the gold standard of the industry. While Swiss Navy offers up lube in all kinds of varieties – from passion fruit-flavored to water-based – the company's crowning achievement is its silicone-based lube. With a non-sticky feeling that leaves users feeling slippery but hardly sloppy wet, Swiss Navy sets you barreling on a sleigh ride that you'll never forget towards winter wonderland.

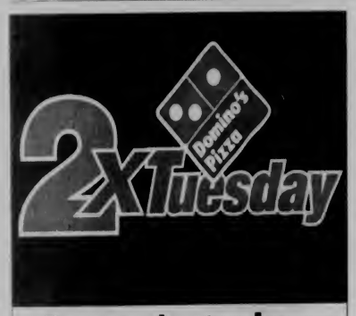
Taboo: The Bitch. Know someone who's been especially naughty this year? Plop them into submission with this 7-inch candy cane of pleasure. Although it comes in either black or red, be sure to go with the latter in spirit of the holiday season. And at the tender price of $14.99, Taboo's sleekly designed massager works as a no muss, no fuss introduction for the novice user to the land of vibrators, far cheaper – and far less intimidating – than the oft-lauded but wallet-crunching Jack Rabbit. For those on the nice list, try The Tease. The Bitch's tamer cousin which boasts a feather tickler where the flogger used to be.

Ladyfair personal shaver. Just because Santa probably has a full bush doesn't mean you have to. Show off a trim hedge for those trips down to the South Pole with Ladyfair's double-edged shaver, ideal for ridding your hot boy of any errant hairs, or even for shaping it into a seasonally-appropriate design – a snowflake, perhaps?

If the fear of nicks and bumps has got you feeling less than jolly during the holidays, be sure to start off with a smattering of Couchy-Original rash free shaving cream, unscented and gentle on those with sensitive skin.

Clone a Willy. Perhaps the hardest part about ending the semester is the knowledge that with it comes an inevitable separation from your heart's desire. Hard up for a way to keep yourself in the heart and bed sheets of your gal or fella? Send them home with a vibrating likeness of your manhood with Empire Lab's do-it-yourself molding kit. Just invert your junk into the kit's container, add water and – hey, presto – a sentimental rubber keepsake for your love to take back home for those long and lonely winter nights. And for more holiday fun, roast chestnuts over an open fire kindled by the mold of your very own penis with Clone a Willy's candle kit.

6-Hour Love Shot. Empire Labs also gets props for manufacturing this tasty mouthful, useful for the college guy who wants to conquer that 15 page final paper and their partner in one fell swoop. The Love Shot combines a specially-patented male enhancement formula with the effects of a typical energy drink, and promises increased stamina for the bedroom and beyond. The concept isn't wholly unique: similar products include Deep Throat, an energy drink which hearkens back to the 1972 porn classic (and Woodward and Bernstein's infamous informant).



"This Isn't Twilight: the XXX Parody". "Twilight"-themed gifts are a hot commodity this holiday season, and while this may not be the next installment in the saga, it will certainly help hold you over between sequels. Jumped in the same oral field as "This Isn't Big Love: the XXX Parody" and "Pirates XXX" (a flesh-filled parody of "Pirates of Caribbean"), "This Isn't Twilight" is loyal to both sources of its inspiration. Nor can one disregard the all-star cast scooped up to headline the film, including Talon (no surname) and Jenna Haze, winner of the Adult Video News' 2009 Female Performer of the Year award. With talent like this, you may not even need to see "Eclipse."

If Santa smiles kindly on you this year, you'll have more toys that you really know what to do with come Christmas morning. While toying them may seem like child's play, there's more upkeep required of your adult toys than was likely necessary with the Easy Bake Oven you had when you were a kid. For a safe clean-up of your toys after use, go with Berman Anti-Bacterial Toy Cleaner. Developed by Dr. Laura Berman, founder of the Berman Center for Female Sexuality, this toy cleaner uses triclosan (commonly found in mouthwashes and shaving creams) to safeguard your toys against bacterial build-up and general grimmness.

SK Murphy can be reached at skmurphy@dailycollegian.com.

Although Swiss Navy manufactures several kinds of personal lubricants, the company's crowning achievement is it's silicone-based lube.

SHU wins to stay undefeated

and Sean Carter each had six rebounds. Vinson scored nine of his total in the final 20 minutes of the game, with the contest way out of reach for UMass.

The Minutemen were 9-of-29 from 3-point range, and missed their first 14 shots from beyond the arc, while not making one three-pointer in the first half, compared to the Pirates who were 4-of-15 from deep. UMass struggled from the field, shooting just 293, after converting 15-of-21 free throw attempts.

The Pirates started off strong, building a 16-point lead midway through the first half, when Jordan Theodore scored five straight points to give the Hall a 16 point lead with under eight minutes to go, going on a 13-2 run after only being up by five points with 11 minutes to play. They then took a 25-point lead with a jumper and Hazell's second three-pointer of the half with under a minute to go in the frame.

UMass came out strong in the second half, especially from beyond 3-point range, converting 7-of-9 three-pointers to cut the deficit to 24 on several occasions while outscoring Seton Hall 49-42 in the second half.

The Pirates offense, however, was too potent, as they took their largest lead of the game (35) with just over eleven and a half minutes to play in the second half.

The Minutemen are back in action when they host Grambling on Friday at 8 p.m. at the Mullins Center.

Notes: Harris passed Mike Pyatt to move to ninth in career scoring with 1,506 career points as a member of the Minutemen. Gurley has scored in double figures in every game this season, while Vinson scored in double figures for the fourth time this season.

Senior Ricky Harris drives into the lane against Quinnipiac earlier this season. Harris scored 15 points to lead UMass in a loss against Seton Hall.

After loss, UMass squads travel to Puerto Rico next in January

Standout diver Jason Cook took first in both the one- and three-meter. The sophomore finished with scores of 323.47 and 347.17, respectively.

Junior John Clark notched second in the one-meter (271.57), and junior Adam Duffield placed third in the three-meter (290.94) –two points behind Yale's Drew Teer.

On the women's side, sophomore Hannah Swift took first in the one-meter dive with a score of 251.40. However, her score of 226.57 in the three-meter was nudged out of first by Northeastern's Rachel Peterson (227.31).

The women traveled again to Boston to compete against the Northeastern team they defeated at the Terrier Invitational.

"After facing them at the Terrier, we surprised them by being so tired," Newcomb said. "We did not swim as fast, but we did not have expectations to."

Junior Jennifer Corriveau took the women's first victory of the day with a 100-yard backstroke time of 1:01.08.

Megan Nowak followed with a 100-yard breaststroke first-place finish (1:08.76). The junior edged Northeastern's Keary McClernan by just twelve-tenths of a second for the win. McClernan later took the 200-yard breaststroke by more than a second over silver finisher Nowak, who touched in at 2:28.80.

"Nowak's 100-breast was the performance of the week," Newcomb said. "She got right up off the block and swam a great race."

In the 200-yard medley relay, the women took a lead into the third leg, but finished behind Northeastern with a time of 1:51.47. Corriveau was joined by freshman Amino Meho and juniors Jessica Starosielec and Sarah Kanellas.

The women took first in the 400-yard freestyle relay, with Meho and Corriveau swimming with sophomore Molly Papish and senior Elizabeth Walsh.

Other top finishes were swam by Walsh (200-yard freestyle, 1:57.35) and sophomore Kayla Tegeler (200-yard butterfly, 2:13.90).

The women also held three of the top four spots in 1000-yard freestyle. Papish took second (10:45.10), with freshmen Julie Magyar (10:49.02) and sophomore Chelsea Downing (10:52.03) finishing behind her.

The 200-yard individual medley was also a heavy UMass victory, with Nowak (2:16.80) and Starosielec (2:19.18) finishing second and third behind junior Tavis Potter (2:13.30).

"Tavis was our performer of the week," Newcomb said. "I was really impressed with her racing." Potter also improved on her 200-yard freestyle time.

The teams will next travel to San Juan, Puerto Rico for the Loyola Invitational on Jan. 9th.

UMass teams drop to Bulldogs and Huskies

Men and women swim in different locations

DANIEL HERBERHOLZ
Collegian Staff

Despite competing in different places, the men and women came back with the same result.

Two weeks after impressive showings at Boston University's Terrier Invitational, the Massachusetts swim teams traveled for the first time this season to different locations.

The men lost against Yale, 193-107, while the women lost to Northeastern, 174-123.

Both UMass coaches highlighted eited team-wide fatigue, with women's head coach Bob Newcomb saying this weekend was "back to dual meet mode."

The men were in New Haven, Conn. to face a Yale team whose coach, Frank Keefe, is in his final season.

"They are looking to do something special for their coach," men's coach Russ Yarsworth said. "They're swimming especially fast at home."

The Yale swim team won 13 of the 14 races, losing only at the end of the day in the 400-yard freestyle relay.

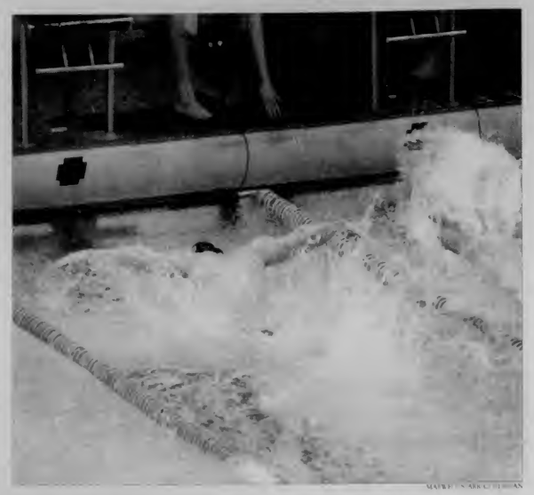
"There just wasn't a lot of pop," Yarworth said of his team's racing. "We were just flat all week. We challenged [Yale] in the relay, though."

The 400-yard relay was swam by juniors Chris Howard and Trevor Ziegler, freshman Jorge Fortin, and senior Juan Moliere. The group pulled out a time of 3:06.96, almost six seconds ahead of Yale (3:12.84).

Sophomore Ryan Brooks joined freshmen Peter Sacco, Sasan Tehrani and Tim O'Neill to finish just behind, in third, at 3:13.02.

Discounting the relay, however, the men could only bring in second and third place finishes.

Sophomore Joey Sbordon had two silver finishes with his 500 and 1000-yard freestyle times of 4:42.28 and 9:48.87.



Fortin took second in the 200-yard freestyle (1:44.49) and third in 100-yard freestyle (47.77), just behind second-place finisher Ziegler (47.63).

One stand-out race for the men was the 50-yard freestyle, in which four of the top five times were by UMass swimmers. Moliere led the group, taking second with a time of 21.47. Close behind were Howard (21.63), Tehrani (21.69) and Sacco (21.88).

Second places were also notched by sophomore Kyle Jennings (200-yard backstroke, 1:54.56) and senior Mike Berthaume (100-yard butterfly, 50.74).

"I learned that they're going to race how they practice," Yarworth said, adding that it was not for lack a of effort.

Despite doing well at Boston University's Terrier Invitational, the Massachusetts swim teams struggled over the weekend against Yale and Northeastern.

Louisville loses big at Freedom

BY BEN LAMBERT
Collegian Staff

The Charlotte 49ers upset Louisville, 87-65, on Saturday to hand the Cardinals their worst loss at Freedom Hall in the last nine years. The 22-point margin was the widest in Rick Pitino's tenure as head coach in Louisville.

The game was Charlotte's last visit to Freedom Hall, as the Cardinals will move to a new Downtown Arena for their next season.

A-10 Basketball

Freshman center Chris Braswell led the way for the 49ers, scoring 21 points and grabbing 14 rebounds. The performance was his third double-double of the season. Sophomore Derrio Green added a career-first scoring 20 points, including 4-of-8 shooting from 3-point range. Redshirt freshman Shamarr Bowden also had a big game from deep, shooting 5-of-12 on the way to scoring 17 points.

The 49ers started quickly, leading by 15 at the halftime break. Charlotte then scored the first seven points of the second half to put the game on ice. The No. 20 team, Louisville, never cut the lead to fewer than 14 in the second half.

Center Samardo Samuels led the Cardinals with 14 points, while Jared Swopshire grabbed eight boards.

RAMS EARN COMEBACK WIN

Rhode Island battled back to defeat Providence, 86-82, at the Ryan Center on Saturday. The Rams outscored the Friars, 51-33, in the second half to overcome a 14-point halftime deficit.

Senior guard Keith Cothran scored 19 points, including going 7-for-7 from the free throw line, to lead five Rhode Island players in double figures.

Senior Lamonte Ulmer had 13, junior Delroy James added 12, freshman Akeem Richmond tossed in 11 and sophomore Orion Outerbridge chipped in 10 points for the victory. Rhode Island has had five players score in double figures in three games this season.

The Rams pressured Providence into a season-high 19 turnovers, and held the Friars to 36.7 percent shooting in the second half. Rhode Island set the tone for the game early, troubling Providence into three turnovers in its first five possessions.

Forward Jamie Peterson scored 20 points on 7-of-15 shooting and snagged 11 boards in the loss. Guard Sharaud Clark added 17 points, and Vincent Council scored 16 points and grabbed six rebounds off the bench.

OWLS TIE BEST START

Temple defeated Penn State, 45-42, in a defensive struggle at the Liacouras Center on Saturday. The two teams combined for the second-fewest points in the arena's 13-year history.

The Owls improved to 6-2 with the victory, which marks the best start for the team since the 1999-00 squad that also won six of its first eight contests.

Senior Ryan Brooks led the way, scoring 19 points in the victory. He was the lone bright spot on offense for the Owls, who had no other players reach double figures. Forward Lavoy Allen brought down 13 rebounds in the game.

Penn State All-American candidate Talor Battle, who entered the game averaging 20.1 points per game, was held to eight points on 3-of-15 shooting. Guard Chris Babb led the Nittany Lions with 11 points off the bench in the loss.

Bonnies defeat Marist at home

BY ANDREW MORRISON
Collegian Staff

The St. Bonaventure women's basketball team took a decisive 61-43 victory on Sunday against visiting Marist.

Senior Dana Mitchell was able to collect her seventh career double-double for the Bonnies with 22 points and a season high 10 rebounds in the win. Mitchell is now fourth on the all-time scoring list for the Bonnies.

A-10 Basketball

St. Bonaventure (8-0) shot 22-of-49 from the floor on the night and went 12-of-13 from the free throw line.

The Bonnies started the game with a 10-2 run before seeing their lead turn into a three-point deficit with six minutes to play in the first half after the Red Foxes (4-3) went on a 9-2 run of their own. After back-and-forth play before the end of the first half, St. Bonaventure took a 27-21 lead.

In the second half, the Bonnies' high-powered offense was put on display. The team started the second frame with a 15-6 run that was highlighted by back-to-back 3-pointers by freshman Chelsea Bowker. St. Bonaventure held the lead for the duration of the game.

The Marist offense was lead by Rachele Litz who had 13 points, and Corielle Yarde added 11 points.

SPIDERS BEAT RIVAL VCU

Richmond junior Brittani Shells recorded her first career double-double with 18 points and 11 rebounds in her team's 66-52 victory over cross-town rival Virginia Commonwealth University. Sophomore Abby Oliver also added 15 points off the bench for the Spiders.

Both teams started the game slowly on the offensive front and were mostly evenly matched. The first half saw ties at 4-4 as well as at 17-17 before Richmond (7-2) took a 23-17 lead with four minutes to play and extended its lead going into the break.

The game was won in the second half when the Spiders out-rebounded the Rams (3-2), 26-11, contributing to a 52-32 edge in rebounds for the game. VCU was also held to 33 percent shooting on the day, contributing to its offensive struggles.

Minutemen fall to rival UConn following win over Coast Guard

BY HERB SCRIBNER
Collegian Staff

After a fiery, dominant battle against Coast Guard, the Massachusetts men's club hockey team lost its edge when it went toe-to-toe with rival Connecticut.

The Minutemen (14-4-0) celebrated Military Appreciation night this past Friday, when they honored military workers at the Mullins Center by facing off against the Bears (1-7-0).

"It was well-received, and it did well," UMass coach Robert Talloni said.

After the ruffles, the prizes, and all the dust was settled, the scoreboard showed UMass topping Coast Guard, 10-3.

"You never know, year-to-year, how they're going to do," Talloni said. "This particular year, we were probably a little too strong for them. They are in the SECHA league, and they weren't maybe as competitive as they wanted."

Assistant captain Julian Maleski proved to be an important factor in the game, dishing out four assists in the contest. The absence of captain Alec Goolsby, who leads the team in assists, gave Maleski the opportunity to play well.

A pair of goals were scored by forwards Brian Dragunas and Craig Cardone, with Cardone racking up an assist during the game as well.

"We gave everybody a lot of chances to get some ice time," Talloni said. "It was a good night, and we like to thank them for what they do for our country."

Despite letting in three goals, goalie Mark Leonard stopped 30 shots. Across the ice, Bears goaltender Mark Ryan stopped 61 shots during the contest (an average of one save per minute).

"He did a fantastic job," Talloni said.

The next match for the Minutemen, however, did not go as well as UMass went skate-to-skate with the Huskies (8-7-3).

"We went there, and we were up for the game ... big game for us," Talloni said.

It was a back-and-forth battle between the two NECHA American West division rivals.

The first period saw two successful scores by UConn, giving the Huskies an early edge over the Minutemen. Coming back into the second period, UMass started quickly in trying to eat into the deficit.

"We came right back, top of the second period, and after the first or second shift ... bang," Talloni said.

Once the Minutemen got a goal back, the Huskies turned on the jets and knocked in two goals to take a 4-1 lead.

Following the back and forth pattern of the game, the Minutemen also scored two straight goals to come within one goal of UConn. It was a lead, however, that the Huskies never surrendered as they narrowly beat the Minutemen, 6-5.

"On the five-on-five, we were dominant," Talloni said. "[Overall] they didn't dominate us, and we didn't dominate them."

The Huskies will head to the Mullins Center this Friday for a rematch as the Minutemen look to even the score. With UConn at the head of the NECHA American West division, even more pressure will be placed on the game.

"We're ready to see them Friday night at our place," Talloni said. "We're going to tweak some stuff, and I'm sure their coach will look to tweak some stuff."

After the rematch, the Minutemen will take on fellow division team Sacred Heart before taking off a month for winter break.

"I think it's a time for us to really get our game going with those five games around the holidays," Talloni said.

When hockey picks back up in the spring, there will be tryouts for new additions for the team. On Jan. 11, the UMass club hockey team will be holding open tryouts at the Mullins Center.

U-Dems, Republicans host healthcare forum

Debate focuses on potential reforms and recent legislation

BY CHRISTA ROMANO
Collegian Staff

On Tuesday, Nov. 8, University of Massachusetts students filed into Fernald Hall to attend "What Does Healthcare Reform Mean to You?" a forum focused on the proposed healthcare reforms currently being addressed by U.S. congressional leaders.

The debate, put on in a collaborative effort by the UMass Democrats and the UMass Republican Club, focused on the issue of what Congress should do about the rapidly rising costs of health care and how Americans will be able to afford it.

The debate also focused on whether the United States should switch to a national plan or allow each American to find insurance on a private, individual level.

UMass Democrats Treasurer Scott Harris and UMass political science professor Brenda Bushouse sat on the Democratic side of the panel during the debate.

The two were strong advocates for a bill that Democrats in Congress have been pushing, which would create a government-run health plan, installing a new mandate on employers to provide health insurance coverage and a guarantee of subsidized healthcare for the poor.

They argued that this Obama-supported plan would improve affordability and availability of insurance for all citizens.

"I'd be interested to see if the Republicans have a better alternative to this health care plan," Harris said during the debate.

Republican representatives on the panel included sophomore political science major Dan Stratford and junior economics major Eric Magazu.

The Republican team provided counter arguments to the Democratic bill, believing the proposed legislation may result in overconsumption of free care and a decrease in free-market competition among hospitals and insurance companies.

In addition, they argued that it would remove personal choice. "Health care which works for one person may not work for another," Magazu said.

Senior journalism major and debate moderator William McGuinness asked how the proposed health care plan will affect college students.

"College students will probably be the least effected. We are often the healthiest group and use the healthcare system, by and large, the least often," said Magazu.

"We're putting in more than we're taking out. It's cheaper for students to just keep the premiums for themselves, save them and then spend them when they have families."

Harris said that he could not disagree more.

"In a long-range view, you will get sick. I'm sorry, but you will, and you want to be able to afford that eventually. Our demographic especially needs health care to be cost-effective," he said.

"We may not be visiting hospitals for as many serious issues, but we are seen for things like the flu and sport-related injuries much more often than other demographics."

He noted that with no insurance coverage, even a single visit for an everyday checkup can cost upwards of $1,000.

Bushouse pointed out that a national plan is especially important for college students because young people typically move from place to place before finding a career and can't rely on their employers for long-term coverage.

"You want your plan to follow you," said Bushouse.

"This was the first debate of this year, so I'm happy that we had about 30 people in attendance," said UMass Democrats President Charlie Felder.

"Next semester, we plan to do more debates on everything from Afghanistan to domestic policy and maybe even the health care issue again."

While the debate left the big questions still unanswered, it was considered a success by both political clubs.

"I think it's great that our clubs are working together to help the UMass community," said UMass Republican Club President Derek Khanna.

The UMass Police Department made several campus arrests this past weekend, which ranged from charges of drug possession, weapons possession and assault.

BY MICHELLE WILLIAMS
Collegian Staff

THURSDAY, DEC. 3

Sean Ramon Smalls of 2301 Burton St., Richmond, Va., was arrested on at 12:24 p.m. on Sunset Ave. in Amherst.

The arresting officer had been following Small's vehicle while driving on Infirmary Way after seeing the driver cross a solid yellow lane along the road.

When he pulled Smalls over, the officer detected a strong odor of freshly burnt marijuana.

The passenger in his car admitted to having recently smoked marijuana and also admitted to having more in the vehicle, along with a scale.

Both were confiscated.

The arresting officer also found a black, loaded, semi-automatic .380 pistol underneath the driver's seat in the vehicle.

Smalls did not have a permit for this weapon. Smalls was charged with carrying a firearm without a license, carrying a firearm on school grounds, possession of a firearm without an FID card, and both Smalls and the passenger were charged with a fine for possession of a class D substance.

FRIDAY, DEC. 4

Sam Migdol of 117 N. Whitney St., Amherst, Mass., was arrested at 10:00 a.m. in the University of Massachusetts' lot 11.

Migdol is currently facing charges of possession and intent to distribute a Class B drug.

Criminal charges are currently pending.

Kaitlin A. Cintolo of 19 Garden St., Danvers, Mass., was arrested at 10:30 a.m. in lot 11.

She was charged with operating a motor vehicle with a suspended license and operating a motor vehicle without an inspection sticker.

John Parry of 3 Hillboro St., Quincy, Mass., was arrested at 7:07 p.m. in lot 33.

He was charged with possession of liquor while under the age of 21.

Benjamin Freociello of 254 Concord Rd., Billerica, Mass., and Ryan Will of 13 Debbie Dr., Pelham, N.H., were arrested at 7:48 p.m. in lot 22.

Both were charged with possession of liquor while under the age of 21.

John Donovan of 10 Sylvester Rd., Dorchester, Mass., and Scott Riley of 96 Beaumont St., Dorchester, Mass., were arrested at 8:51 p.m.

Both were charged with possession of liquor while under the age of 21.

SATURDAY, DEC. 5

Jillian Marie Greaves of 44 Whichita Rd., Medfield, Mass., and Rachel Margaret O'Shea of 15 Hearthstone Dr., Medfield, Mass., were arrested at 12:38 a.m. in lot 32.

The arresting officer saw a group of four people walking through the rows of cars.

Two people in the group stopped at a Lexus ES300 and Greaves entered the vehicle through the passenger door.

The other two people in the group left.

The officer watched Greaves search through the glove compartment and front seat areas while O'Shea waited outside.

After the two spoke, O'Shea enter the vehicle from a rear door and began to look through the articles in the car.

When asked if either knew the owner of this car, both responded that they didn't.

Both have been charged with nighttime breaking-and-entering a motor vehicle for three different vehicles.

Anthony T. Gooding of 64 Iffley Rd., Boston, Mass., and DeShawn Michael Townsend of 13 Ames St., C47, Dorchester, Mass., were both arrested at 2:48 a.m. in Coolidge Hall.

Three UMPD officers responded to a police cadet being assaulted by Gooding.

Both had been signed in by a resident on the 15th floor and were found arguing in the hallway.

They resisted arrest and pepper spray was used.

Gooding was charged with assault and battery and both Gooding and Townsend were charged with disorderly conduct.

Angel V. Villanueva of 294 Elm St., Holyoke, Mass., was arrested as a result of a traffic stop.

Villanueva was charged with having a warrant out for his arrest, unlicensed operation of a motor vehicle and a motor vehicle lights violation.

Thomas D. Falco of 4 Shelley Ct., Sparta, N.J., was arrested as a result of a traffic stop on Massachusetts Ave.

Falco was charged with possession of liquor while under the age of 21.

California school district puts breakfast within reach for kids

BY TRACY CORREA
MCCLATCHY-TRIBUNE NEWS SERVICE

FRESNO, Calif. — The number of students eating breakfast in Fresno, Calif.'s Central Unified School District more than doubled this year after a simple change: Food was moved out of the cafeteria.

Breakfast was already offered to all students, regardless of income. But participation jumped from 16 percent last school year to 34 percent this school year after the district bought food carts, packed them with convenient meals and placed them in strategic locations such as school entrances and bus drop-off sites.

The carts allow students to easily pick up breakfast — such as a sausage sandwich and milk — without having to step into a cafeteria line.

They can eat on their own terms while visiting with friends before class starts.

"Not having the kids walk across campus (to the cafeteria) made a huge difference," said Deb Pollock, food services director for Central Unified.

The new breakfast program is part of an ongoing effort by Central to entice more students to eat breakfast, which studies have found is critical to learning.

A study last year by the Harvard School of Public Health, drawing from more than 100 published research articles, found serving breakfast to children significantly improves their cognitive or mental abilities and enables them to be more alert, pay better attention and perform better on standardized tests.

The same study also said children who eat breakfast are sick less often.

Laurel Ashlock, Central Unified's chief academic officer, said the district will evaluate how well the breakfast program improves student performance, including standardized test scores.

More school districts are pushing breakfast, especially districts where students qualify for free or reduced-price meals but fail to take advantage of them. At Central, about 62 percent qualify for free or reduced-price meals.

District officials say there are varied reasons why students don't eat breakfast at home, but often it's due to low family incomes. As a result, the majority of students qualify for free or reduced-cost meals at school.

School officials say even when free breakfast was available in the cafeteria, students often bypassed it so as not to lose precious pre-class time with friends — and also to avoid having to wake up earlier to leave time for breakfast.

It's not as difficult to get students to eat lunch at school, because they're already awake and on campus.

School officials keep trying to boost the rates of breakfast consumption.

Last year Central Unified — a district of about 14,500 students — started offering free breakfast to every student. But participation only edged up two percentage points.

It wasn't until the food was taken out of the cafeteria and moved to strategic campus locations this year that the numbers really began to climb.

While the food carts made a huge difference at all of Central's schools, the numbers really shot up at the district's two high schools.

The biggest jump in student participation, at Central High School East campus, climbed from 10 percent last year to 41 percent this year.

It turns out requiring students to sit and eat in a cafeteria was a big barrier, said Pollock. But having the freedom to eat breakfast on their terms, where they wanted, made all the difference, she said.

The portable meal program is at all of the district's schools. However, Pollock said elementary schools have designated eating areas because younger children require monitoring.

Central Unified heavily promoted the new breakfast program this year. Fliers were sent home to parents and signs on school grounds tout the free — and convenient — breakfast. "Our motto is, 'Free breakfast, every day, every student,'" said Pollock.

However, the new program doesn't cost the district more. Because of increased breakfast participation last year, the district qualifies for slightly more than the $1.13 average reimbursement from the U.S. Department of Agriculture.

Pollock said the additional money allows the district to feed all of its students for free, without regard to qualification. Any extra federal revenue goes back into the district's food program to cover overhead and food service improvements, she said.

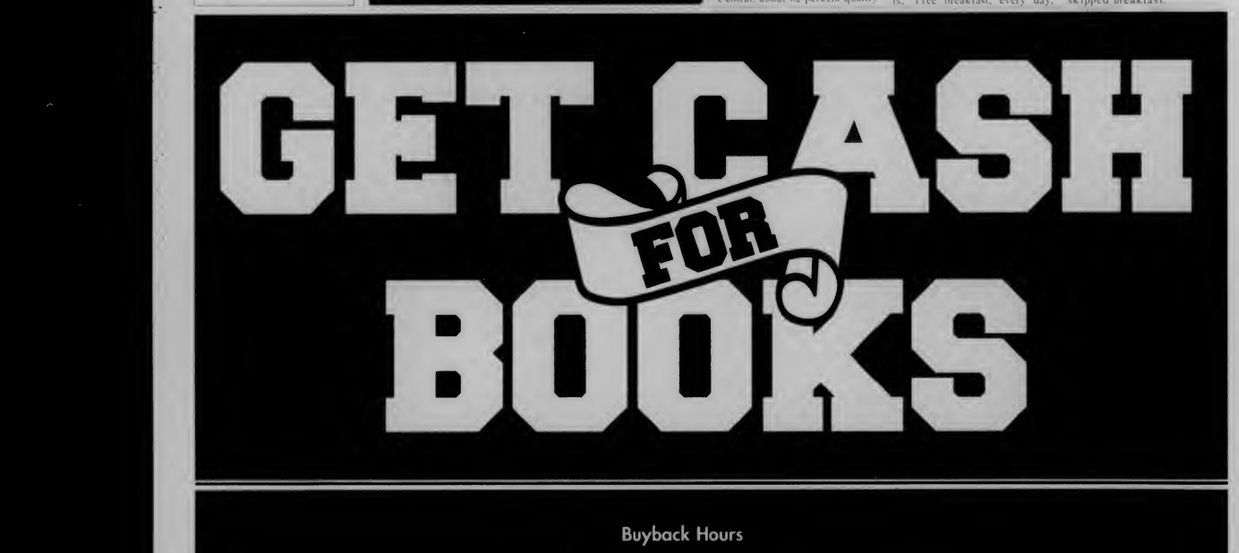
The district also received $233,000 in grants from the California Department of Education to expand breakfast programs.

The money paid for 18 serving carts, 13 warming carts, five milk chests and several food-storage freezers.

The grants also covered promotional material, including signs at school touting the program.

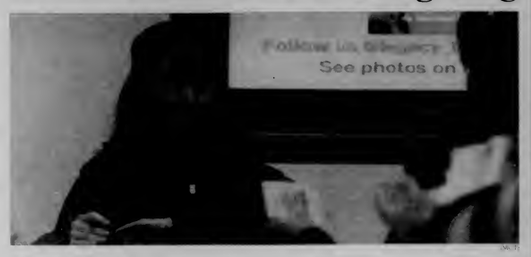
Karen Simmons Gillian, a child nutrition consultant with the California Department of Education, said Central Unified is the first in the region to put breakfast food carts in the path of students.

"No district, multi-campus, is doing what Central is doing," she said.



Gillian is a field services unit consultant for the state who works with districts in parts of Fresno and Merced counties.

Other districts or individual schools also have tried unconventional approaches to increase the number of students eating breakfast.



Pollock said Central considered bringing breakfast to the classroom, but decided against it because teachers already have so much to deal with during class time.

Central's new approach is also credited with cutting down on the number of sick students.

Patricia Gomes, who oversees Central Unified's 12 nurses, said fewer students are coming to school nurses complaining of headaches and stomach aches — common among students who have skipped breakfast.

Texas fans sleep in parking lot to see Palin at book signing

Sarah Palin greets fans at Legacy Books in Plano, Texas, last Friday, where the former governor of Alaska signed about 1,000 copies of her book, "Going Rogue."

BY ANNA M. TINSLEY
MCCLATCHY-TRIBUNE NEWS SERVICE

PLANO, Texas — Natalie Nichols had never voted before she cast her ballot for John McCain and Sarah Palin in last year's presidential race.

No offense to McCain, the Republican presidential candidate, but Nichols' vote was for Palin.

"She inspired me," said Nichols, a 32-year-old mother of four from Texarkana, Texas. "Because of what I saw in her, I went back to school, and I'm running for county clerk in Texarkana. This is all because of her."

So about 1 a.m. Friday, she and her husband pulled into a parking lot near Legacy Books — the store where Palin signed copies of her book, "Going Rogue" — and slept for a few hours.

By 5 a.m., they joined a growing line of people waiting for hours in freezing weather for Palin's book signing.

"To meet her was so intimidating," Nichols said. "I was on the verge of tears, in awe. It was the experience of a lifetime. I wouldn't have traded it for the world."

Palin, former governor of Alaska, arrived around 11 a.m. Friday, shaking a few hands but not speaking publicly before she headed inside. The crowd chanted, "Sarah, Sarah!" and "Palin, Palin." Those outside carried signs that read, "Palin Power 2012" and "Sarah: Welcome to Texas. Wish you could be in the White House."

On the second floor, she signed about 1,000 pre-sold copies of her book and about 100 more for people who had waited outside for a chance to see her. She left about 1:45 p.m. through a back door.

As she signed books, several of her relatives — including her parents and husband — walked through the store, taking photos with North Texans and even signing Palin's book when asked. Baby Trig was also there.

"We're trying to get some books out there and tell Sarah's story," husband Todd Palin told the Fort Worth Star-Telegram.

David Ryan Lutz, 24, of North Richland Hills, Texas, was first in line to get Palin's signature on a book he bought as a Christmas gift for his 82-year-old grandmother.

He and his dad got to a nearby parking lot about 10 p.m. Thursday night and slept in their Ford Focus for a few hours before getting out and starting the line about 3 a.m.

"It was cold," Lutz said with a grin. "Colder than I thought."

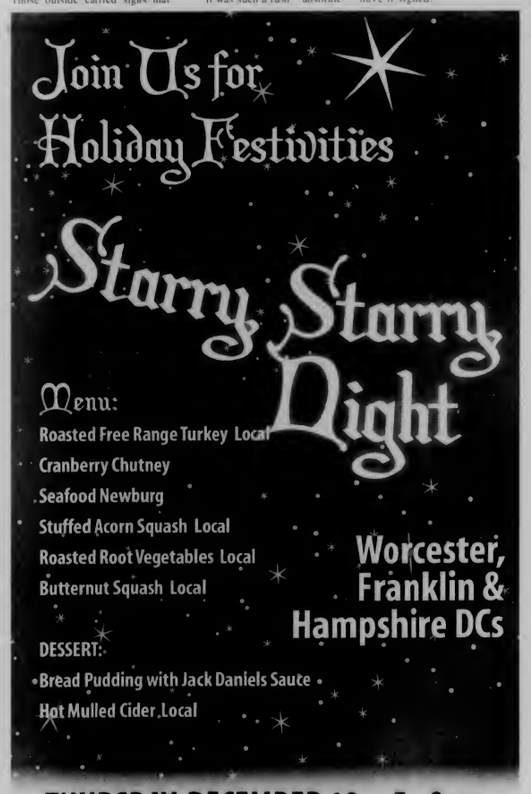
But it was all worth it when he told Palin about his grandmother.

Because he was first in line, Palin wrote "Grandma Lutz" before signing the book.

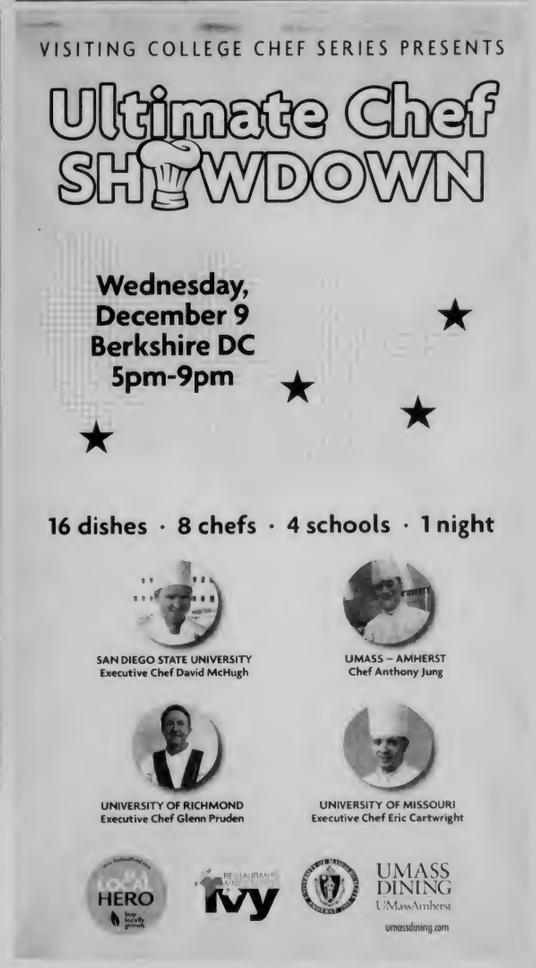
"It was such a rush, absolutely amazing," Lutz said. "Suddenly I'm right in front of her, and she was thanking me for coming and staying up all night."

Right behind him was Michelle McCormick, 26, of Fort Worth, Texas, and her mother, Andrea, of Oklahoma. The McCormicks also slept in their car outside the bookstore.

"I wanted to see the rock star of the Republican Party," Michelle McCormick said. "I thought she was given an unfair shake during the campaign. They picked on her kids and clothes."



She told Palin, "Gov. Palin, welcome to Texas."



"Then she gave me a handshake and looked me right in the eye," McCormick said. "It was worth it — the 30-degree temperatures, the lines, for two seconds with Sarah Palin."

Jeran Akers, a former Plano, Texas, mayor, showed up about 7 a.m. to join the line and get three books signed. "This is the first time I've ever stood in line to meet anyone," he said. "She was everything she appears to be on TV — an ordinary person like us, bold enough to speak out."

Kyle Hall, Legacy Books' director of marketing and events, said that the event had few problems and that more than 100 extra people who waited outside without a ticket were allowed in to buy a book and have it signed.

Obama outlines new strategy for Afghanistan

By Steven Thomma
McClatchy-Tribune News Service

WASHINGTON — Looking to end one of America's longest wars, President Barack Obama will send another 30,000 U.S. troops to Afghanistan by next summer, but start to withdraw at least some American forces in July 2011.

The first Marines could arrive in Afghanistan by Christmas, the vanguard of an accelerated buildup that would see all of the extra troops there by next summer.

"I have determined that it is in our vital national interest to send an additional 30,000 U.S. troops to Afghanistan. After 18 months, our troops will begin to come home. These are the resources that we need to seize the initiative, while building the Afghan capacity that can allow for a responsible transition of our forces out of Afghanistan," Obama said Tuesday in a speech to cadets at the U.S. Military Academy in West Point, N.Y.

"I do not make this decision lightly," Obama said, stressing that he recognizes how weary Americans are with war, and how eager they are to focus most on rebuilding the battered U.S. economy.

"If I did not think that the security of the United States and the safety of the American people were at stake in Afghanistan," he said, "I would gladly order every single one of our troops home tomorrow."

New troops from the U.S. and its allies, Obama said, "will allow us to accelerate handing over responsibility to Afghan forces and allow us to begin the transfer of our forces out of Afghanistan in July of 2011."

"Just as we have done in Iraq, we will execute this transition responsibly, taking into account conditions on the ground. We will continue to advise and assist Afghanistan's security forces to ensure that they can succeed over the long haul. But it will be clear to the Afghan government and, more importantly, to the Afghan people that they will ultimately be responsible for their own country."

His promise of a surge of troops, coupled with a timetable for beginning a withdrawal, was a grand gamble aimed at navigating among the military's request for more troops, Islamic insurgents' belief that they can outlast the U.S., and antiwar public opinion, especially among his fellow Democrats.

At the Pentagon, however, some officials already fretted that the strategy is rooted in the political realities in Washington, not in the burgeoning security problems in Afghanistan and Pakistan. Obama's emphasis on a timeline for withdrawal, stressed by officials who briefed the media, could encourage the Taliban to wait out the U.S. effort, some fear.

Obama's escalation strategy is aimed at stopping terrorists from retaking hold of Afghanistan, their base for planning the 2001 attacks against the U.S., while also signaling to the Afghan government that it must stand up to defend its own country, and to war skeptics in the U.S. that the war, now in its ninth year, won't drag on indefinitely.

To skeptics at home, he insisted repeatedly that terrorists are gaining ground in Afghanistan and Pakistan and remain a grave threat to the U.S. He acknowledged the costs, saying that the escalation would cost at least $30 billion this year alone, coming atop nearly $1 trillion already spent in both Afghanistan and Iraq.

"We simply cannot afford to ignore the price of these wars," he said, though he didn't say how he'd pay the added costs beyond working with Congress to find a solution.

Moreover, he said, the costs are one reason why the U.S. can't afford an open-ended commitment to wage war in Afghanistan, especially at a time when the U.S. is struggling to get back on its economic feet.

"That is why our troop commitment in Afghanistan cannot be open-ended," he said, "because the nation that I am most interested in building is our own."

The West Point audience of about 4,250 included cadets and the families of cadets, as well as the secretaries of Defense, State and Veterans Affairs, and top Pentagon officers.

From Afghanistan, the U.S. commander who requested as many as 80,000 extra troops for his "low-risk" option called the final decision a good one.

"The Afghanistan-Pakistan review led by the president has provided me with a clear military mission and the resources to accomplish our task," Army Gen. Stanley McChrystal said in a statement. "The clarity, commitment and resolve outlined in the president's address are critical steps toward bringing security to Afghanistan and eliminating terrorist safe havens that threaten regional and global security."

Obama defended his three-month-long deliberation on McChrystal's plea for more troops and a new strategy, dismissing criticisms that he delayed needed reinforcements.

"There has never been an option before me that called for troop deployments before 2010, so there has been no delay or denial of resources necessary for the conduct of the war," he said.

While Obama stressed the timetable to start withdrawing troops — the message he wanted to send to Afghanistan and anti-war Americans — administration officials stressed that the scheduled only sets the start of the withdrawal of U.S. forces and leaves it open for Obama to determine later whether and how quickly to keep withdrawing those troops and how long to take.

"Those variables — pace and end — will be dictated by conditions on the ground," a senior administration official said, one of two briefing reporters on condition of anonymity, which they insisted upon.

The official forecast a continued U.S. presence there for the foreseeable future, albeit with a much smaller footprint.

"While we do not intend ... to commit American combat forces indefinitely to Afghanistan, we do reaffirm our long-term strategic partnership with Afghanistan, but not at anything like 100,000 U.S. troops in their country," the official said.

By reserving the ability to keep U.S. troops there until Afghan forces are able to defend their country, Obama hopes he's sending a message to terrorists that they can't simply wait him out.

"If the Taliban thinks they can wait us out, I think that they're misjudging the president's approach," the official said.

Obama told Afghan President Hamid Karzai about the plan in an hour-long call late Monday night.

During the talk, Obama "emphasized that U.S. and international efforts in Afghanistan are not open ended and must be evaluated toward measurable and achievable goals within the next 18 to 24 months," according to White House press secretary Robert Gibbs.

"Both presidents agreed to redouble their efforts to improve the delivery of services to the Afghan people, particularly at the local level, and to reinvigorate economic development and investment, especially in the areas of agriculture, mining, water management and energy."

Obama also called Pakistani President Asif Ali Zardari Tuesday morning, then briefed more than 30 leaders of the Congress from both major parties at the White House before leaving for West Point.

Obama laid out a plan he hopes will stop the Taliban's resurgence, clean up Afghanistan's government and stand up its own defense forces so that U.S. troops can start withdrawing.

The public is divided over sending more U.S. troops. Gallup found 47 percent support sending more troops, up 5 percentage points in two weeks, but still short of a majority. At the same time, 39 percent want to start withdrawing troops, down 5 points in two weeks.

Liberals complained that Obama's war will divert resources from priorities at home.

"Perhaps nation-building should begin at home," said Rep. Dennis Kucinich, D-Ohio. "An escalation of the war in Afghanistan at a time of such economic dislocation and hardship raises questions about America's priorities and whether or not we are losing our way as we attempt to stride aside the globe as some Colossus."

At the same time, some conservatives lambasted Obama for taking more than three months to announce his decision and then for setting a timetable to start withdrawing troops.

"It worries me that the president's commitment to our mission does not match that of our troops on the ground," said Rep. Tom Price, R-Ga., the chairman of the Republican Study Committee.

"It is troubling that the president rejected Gen. McChrystal's full request for resources. Even more concerning, the president managed to declare the beginning and the end of a military operation at the same time. This type of conflicting message does not offer confidence to our allies, gives our friends and enemies' reason to doubt the president's resolve, and is simply counterproductive."

President Obama announced increasing federal troops stationed in Afghanistan by 30,000, with an intended withdrawal date set for July 2011.

Penn State scientist criticized over 'Climategate' concerns

By Faye Flam
The Philadelphia Inquirer

PHILADELPHIA — A few words culled from some hacked e-mails in Britain have generated chaos in the world of climate science — throwing dark clouds over Pennsylvania State University and stirring up negative publicity for the field that shows no sign of abating.

The disturbance, now known as "Climategate," is threatening to damage scientists' careers, inflame cynicism over the science of global warming, and perhaps alter the course of the major U.N. climate summit in Copenhagen.

The stolen and leaked e-mails that have generated the most discussion focus on the so-called hockey stick graphs created by Penn State climatologist Michael Mann and others — graphs that have famously illustrated world temperatures taking a sharp turn upward in the 20th century.

But in all the sound and fury, one inconvenient truth is emerging — the e-mails give little new information and appear to have failed to change the mind of anyone within the scientific world.

One bona fide climate expert, Richard Lindzen of MIT, has gone on the record accusing Mann and others of data rigging and outright falsification. But Lindzen is well-known for expressing doubts that global warming should be a serious concern. The meteorology professor says he's thought for years that the hockey stick graphs were generated through dishonest means. The newly leaked e-mails underlined what he already believed.

Many others familiar with the issue say that at worst, the whole "scandal" revealed a few evidentiary problems with data sharing and perhaps bias in this field, but that any accusations of misconduct are unjustified and insult the entire scientific enterprise.

The consensus that human activity has altered the atmosphere and warmed the planet rests on much more than a hockey stick.

The controversy began last month when hackers broke into a server holding a decade of e-mails from the Climate Research Unit (CRU) at the University of East Anglia in England. The CRU is one of three institutions leading efforts to chart the climate's course over the last millennium.

The other two big players in this field, sometimes known as "paleoclimatology," include Penn State and the National Climatic Data Center in Asheville, N.C.

Reconstructing climate in the years before thermometers requires a kind of environmental forensics. Scientists search for clues in ancient tree rings, bore holes, coral bands and the composition of gas bubbles trapped deep in the ice sheets of Antarctica and Greenland.

To get those, they scuba dive off remote islands, trudge through swamps in search of ancient stumps and brave frostbite on the ice caps.

As adventuresome as that can be, nearly all the 1,000-odd hacked e-mails communicate technical and mundane aspects of the job — details on data analysis and logistics over attending conferences, for example.

The whole controversy swirls around a small handful — most of them correspondence with or about Penn State's Mann. Critics of climate research have focused on one message in 1999, which referenced a "trick" and an effort to "hide" a temperature decline.

That e-mail was written by the East Anglia climatologist Phil Jones. He wrote that he planned to use Mann's "Nature trick," referring to a paper Mann had published in the journal Nature the previous year.

That paper incorporated the tree rings, ice cores, corals and a number of other "proxies" into a kind of formula that could approximate the world's temperature as it fluctuated over the last 1,000 years.

Also included in the graph were real temperature measurements, starting in the mid-1800s and continuing to the present.

Others before Mann had reconstructed the historical Medieval Warm Period and the Little Ice Age that gripped the world during the 1700s, but Mann's paper was the most complete to date and revealed the influential graph that became known as the hockey stick.

Many scientists were sounding the alarm over human-generated climate change well before that graph appeared.

Phil Jones, who has stepped down temporarily as CRU director, has said publicly that he never meant to imply that he or Mann had used deception. By "trick," he said he meant only a technique for highlighting data on a graph.

The trick, said Mann, who faces a Penn State inquiry, was simply a concise way of showing the two kinds of data together — clearly indicating which was which. "There's nothing hidden or inappropriate," he said. Mann said his method of combining proxy data has withstood numerous statistical tests — lining up neatly with thermometer readings during the 150 years where they overlap.

Critics also pointed to the phrase "hide the decline" in an e-mail written by Jones. That, said Mann, referred not to a decline in measured temperatures but to a decline reflected in a certain kind of tree-ring measurement that relies on wood density.

For reasons researchers still can't explain, those wood measurements track neatly with temperatures from the late 1800s to the 1960s. After that, they show temperatures going down while the thermometers show the opposite.

Scientists have been discussing this "divergence" problem in the open for years.

Opinions differ among scientists as to the importance of the divergence problem, but most say there's enough other evidence to support the hockey stick. One exception is MIT's Richard Lindzen.

"Anyone familiar with these issues would say these (e-mails) explicitly refer to falsification and rigging of data," Lindzen said the failure of the proxies to reflect temperature trends in the last few decades is a real problem. If the proxies don't align with temperatures for the last 30 years, he said, how can we rely on them to tell us what the temperatures were for the last 1,000?

He accuses the scientists of covering up this deficiency, thus creating a more alarming-looking graph. "The trick here is replacing the kind of data you're using with something to make it look different."

Other climatologists found Lindzen's accusations shocking. "I haven't seen anything in the e-mails that calls into question the fundamental science," said Thomas Peterson of the National Climatic Data Center. "I don't see how one comes to the conclusion that it's fraudulent."

Nor does the current flap change his view. "There are so many independent lines of evidence that the warming in the present time is really unusual," he said. "These e-mails do nothing to undermine the strong scientific consensus that Earth is warming and this is from human activities."

Andrew Solow, an expert on geostatistics at Woods Hole Oceanographic Institution, agrees about the lack of trickery. "I would use a word like that to describe some methodological step," he said, "but it wouldn't mean it was meant to trick anyone."

Still, he said it's not obvious to experts how the hockey stick graphs are created. "These are complicated things to do, and in my opinion there has been a lack of clarity over what exactly has gone into these reconstructions," he said.

This is not the first time Mann's work has been put to the test. In 2006, Texas A&M climatologist Gerry North was asked to lead an investigation for the National Academy of Sciences.

North worked with three statisticians and several high-ranking climate experts, picking through Mann's arguments and data. He said the panel came away with a few quibbles over Mann's methods and when they re-did it, the graph didn't have as dramatic an upward slant as the original hockey stick.

But overall, "we thought that qualitatively the paper got it right. The last 30 years were warmer than any 30-year period in the last 600 years and plausibly the last 1,000 years."

North said he did not agree with the way that some other researchers created a continuous graph of global temperatures over the last 1,000 years by combining the proxy data in the past with thermometer data in recent years.

In the late 1990s, he said, "people were running up and down the halls of Congress waving these graphs and saying the Earth was about to burn."

Still, he saw no fraud in this. "It's not the way I would have done it — but it's not a lie."

The two other changes leveled at Penn State's Mann and his counterparts in East Anglia were gleaned from e-mails that mentioned their unwillingness to share data and their suggestions to boycott a scientific journal for publishing a paper by known climate-skeptics Willie Soon and Sallie Baliunas.

Peterson said the data-sharing issue is important but the responsibility for this rests on the worldwide scientific community.

Many institutions refuse to give up temperature data for free, he said. "This is one of the things I've been very frustrated by."

Solow said that while 20th-century warming is undeniable, the field has been plagued by unjustifiable assumptions of precision — as when people claim that any particular year is the hottest of the millennium.

The other problem Solow sees is an unhealthy matting of science and advocacy. He says his students sometimes tell him they want to be involved in policy so their work will have meaning. "I tell them if you lay down with dogs, you get up with fleas."

Texas' North, echoing many others, said that even if Mann and Jones had decided to go into some other field and their work never existed, he'd still be concerned about global warming.

Climate models, he said, are becoming increasingly alarming. Then there's the retreat of glaciers and shrinkage of sea ice. Even basic physics helps make the case, he said. If the carbon dioxide component of the atmosphere doubles — as predicted — the temperature should go up by about 2 degrees. That part, he said, is hard to deny.

According to a recent study, many students are still opting to purchase course materials in campus bookstores rather than through online vendors, citing convenience as the primary reasoning.

Textbook sales higher in stores than with online alternative

By Patricia Alex
The Record

HACKENSACK, N.J. — It may be one of the last frontiers of the digital download. A generation that gets its music, news and other information off the Internet is still lugging around heavy, expensive hard-cover textbooks.

Other options — such as electronic textbooks, book rentals and Internet shopping for used books — are increasingly available and growing wildly, but the lion's share of textbooks are still bought new and at retail, according to industry analysts.

"The bookstore is still making tons of money," said Samantha Binetti, a junior at William Paterson University in Wayne, N.J.

She frets about the costs but still buys most texts new at the campus store.

Augusto Suarez goes to the library at Bergen Community College and makes copies of all his textbooks.

"It's cheaper," he said. "The only problem is there are 15,000 students and one book. Most students still go to the bookstore."

The average new textbook costs $57, but most undergraduates can summon an anecdote about having paid $200, $300 and even $400 for a required book.

Students spend an average of about $700 a year on course materials, according to the National Association of College Stores.

Rutgers University senior Katie Gattuso said she has vaguely heard about less-expensive options like e-texts.

"I've actually never seen anybody using them," she said. Professors haven't promoted the new options, and she said she's seen no advertising for e-books on campus.

"You kind of just take your professor's word and go to the bookstore and buy it."

Indeed, for many students it's just easier — and often quicker — to go to the campus bookstore, especially if Mom and Dad are paying.

Then there is no worry that the edition will be outdated or the format difficult, a complaint with some e-textbooks.

However, cheaper alternatives are poised for growth.

The country's five largest textbook publishers, including Pearson Education in Upper Saddle River, N.J., in 2007 worked together to launch CourseSmart — a company that provides electronic versions of popular titles.

The firm now offers subscriptions to nearly 7,500 textbook titles on 6,000 campuses nationwide.

The subscriptions last anywhere from a semester to a year and cost less than half of what it does to buy a new book, according to the company.

The texts can be downloaded on computers and iPhones.

Sales are up 600 percent this year over last, said Frank Lyman, vice president at CourseSmart.

No consensus on climate

Unless you've spent the last few weeks trapped in a closet at the MSNBC newsroom with nothing to read but the New York Times, you've probably heard the news about "Climategate," the scandal currently embroiling scientists at the renowned British East Anglia Climate Research Unit (Anglia CRU). Hackers broke into the Internet server at Anglia CRU in mid-November, releasing thousands of e-mails that appear to show well-known climatologists conspiring to stifle dissenting opinions, tamper with data and destroy incriminating evidence — all in an effort to promote their theory of Anthropological (human-caused) Global Warming (AGW).

Alana Goodman

To call these e-mails "damning" would be an understatement. One message from Nov. 16, 1999 revealed scientists discussing a "trick" they used in order to "hide the decline" in temperature statistics. In another from Feb. 2, 2005, climatologists chatted about how to shield their data from lawful public access. Amid controversy over these and similar e-mails, Anglia CRU Director Phil Jones resigned his position on Dec. 1.

But this scandal is just beginning, and Anglia CRU is nothing but the tip of a growing iceberg. The shadiness within the field of climate change research is far-reaching – extending all the way from eastern England to our own peaceful little community right here at the University of Massachusetts.

Many students are probably unaware that our University is home to one of the top three climate research centers in the country, the UMass Climate System Research Center (UMass CSRC). The facility has employed some of the world's most respected climatologists – some of whom were heavily involved in the Anglia CRU controversy.

Scientists Michael E. Mann, Malcolm Hughes and Caspar Ammann are just three current or former UMass CSRC researchers whose email addresses appeared among the Anglia CRU correspondences. Messages written by standing UMass CSRC Director Raymond Bradley also popped up among the flurry of hacked e-mails.

While most of the e-mails from UMass researchers were fairly benign, some raised concerns. In one message from March 11, 2003, Mann suggested using strong-arm tactics to pressure a climate research journal into black-balling papers written by skeptics of man-made global warming. "Perhaps we should encourage our colleagues in the climate research community to no longer submit to, or cite papers in, this journal. We would also need to consider what we tell or request of our more reasonable colleagues who currently sit on the editorial board," he wrote.

Many of the e-mails reveal an animosity toward AGW skeptics that goes beyond mere professional disagreements. In one message sent to Mann, Jones expresses delight at the death of climate change skeptic John L. Daly. "In an odd way this is cheering news!" he wrote. Another e-mail from May 29, 2008 appears to show Jones conspiring with Mann and Ammann to destroy e-mails they sent regarding the IPCC Fourth Assessment Report, in order to avoid having the documents publicized through a Freedom of Information Act Request.

The revelations in these e-mails may be damaging, but don't expect them to halt the efforts of the climate change movement.

Many of the movement's supporters are quick to point out, rightfully, that the messages stop short of disproving the actual hypothesis behind AGW.

But the scandal has discredited other major claims espoused by AGW climatologists. Perhaps the greatest boon of the hacked e-mails is that we can finally toss aside the silly myth that there is a "scientific consensus" on man-made global warming. "Nobody is debating any more that significant climate changes are coming," Steven Sherwood, an AGW supporter and atmospheric physicist at Yale University, told the New York Times on Aug. 12, 2005. Of course, the Anglia CRU messages clearly show this isn't the case. A significant chunk of the e-mails reveal the climatologists scrambling to suppress the research of their skeptical colleagues. In fact, the scientists spend an inordinate amount of time fussing and griping about a group of people that they publicly claim "don't exist."

Scientific theories, no matter how "irrefutable" or "important" they might be, should still be open to scrutiny. Questions, concerns and skepticism should be welcomed, not quashed.

Many of these AGW skeptics have good reasons for their cynicism. There are a lot of things about the human-caused global warming theory that just don't add up. But even if there were no logical objections to the hypothesis, that's beside the point. Scientific theories, no matter how "irrefutable" or "important" they might be, should still be open to scrutiny. Questions, concerns and skepticism should be welcomed, not quashed.

It's the climatologists' blatant disrespect for this concept of free scientific inquiry that makes the Anglia CRU e-mails so uncomfortable to read. It appears that if these scientists had their way, their findings would be presented with decrees instead of data. Their comfort with manipulating statistics is the epitome of elitism – they believe so strongly that global warming is caused by humans that any evidence to the contrary is tossed aside. From their perspective, these are noble lies, told in order to "save" mankind from certain doom.

These tactics don't belong in public research institutions; they belong in the 17th Century Vatican. This jaw-dropping dogmatism isn't science – it's religion. And like school prayer and church hymns, it's time to get faith-based "science" out of publicly funded universities.

Kennedy's religious run-in

The fact that this may be my last column for the Collegian, at least for a while, gives me the stones to explore a subject that I normally try to avoid: Religion.

Ben Rudnick

The reason I feel it is necessary to "go there" is a result of the recent brouhaha between Rep. Patrick Kennedy of Rhode Island and the head of the Roman Catholic Diocese of Providence, R.I., Bishop Thomas Tobin.

Their conflict stems from the fact that Kennedy is a staunch advocate of abortion rights, which places him in direct opposition to Roman Catholic theology.

Kennedy's feud with Bishop Tobin has apparently been brewing since February 2007, when the Bishop requested that he no longer take Communion, one of the basic rites of the Catholic Church.

Things heated up in October of this year when Kennedy criticized the church for opposing the health care reform bill then under consideration because of its subsidies for abortion, and really got nasty after Kennedy voted against the Stupak Amendment.

The reaction to their feud worries me because of the widespread lack of understanding of the separation between government and religion enshrined in our Constitution.

To be sure, most of us are leery about mixing religion with politics, and rightly so.

Our nation was founded, in part, in response to the religious oppressions and orthodoxies of our European forebears. As such, a prohibition against government interference in what religion we choose to adhere to, and how we choose to express that adherence, is written into our fundamental laws in the Bill of Rights.

However, the generally hyperbolic rhetoric of responders on websites across the political spectrum, not to mention more mainstream pundits such as Chris Matthews and Larry O'Donnell of MSNBC, all have one thing in common; a misconception that the First Amendment prohibits religious groups from expressing their political views.

The church must have the right to determine what beliefs are and are not a part of its faith and the government cannot decree they accept those who do not accept those beliefs. This does not mean that Patrick Kennedy cannot call himself a "Catholic."

Simply put, there is nothing in the Constitution to prevent religious people or organizations from trying to influence the policies of our government.

The First Amendment states that the government will not get involved in religion, either by favoring one over any other or by interfering with how individuals choose to practice their faith, yet religious groups and people have the same right as everyone to express their political views.

Clearly, if the government were to pass a law "respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof" there would be a constitutional issue to argue.

However, the same amendment that protects religion from the influence of government extends everyone the right to speak out on the functioning of government at all levels.

There is no exception to that fundamental law because of a person's religion, not even for those who hold high office in a religious organization, like a church.

Furthermore, one result of the way the constitutional separation of government from religion is structured is that there will be occasions when a person's opinions on politics and government will conflict with some aspect of their religious ideology.

In those cases, each of us must be free to decide for ourselves which will take precedence, civics or theology.

However, the flip-side of that separation coin is that a centrally organized religion, such as the Catholic Church, has the right to decide what rules a person must follow if they wish to be considered a faithful observer of that theology.

The church must have the right to determine what beliefs are and are not a part of its faith and the government cannot decree they accept those who do not accept those beliefs.

This does not mean that Patrick Kennedy cannot call himself a "Catholic," and he plainly has a right to continue to consider himself a follower of that faith if he so chooses.

However, the Roman Catholic Church has the right to refuse to allow him to participate in its rituals if he does not live up to all of their rules.

While it is true that Bishop Tobin is among a small minority of Roman Catholic leaders who have chosen to take such a hard stance regarding the opinions and actions of pro-abortion Catholic politicians, the Constitution requires that any decision as to the propriety of his actions must be left to the authority of the Vatican.

Congressman Kennedy is equally free to choose to disregard those views in supporting abortion rights, but he has no right to demand that the church accept him despite his violation of its tenets.

The church cannot force him to follow its rules, but neither can he require it to break them by giving him Communion.

Unless we choose to repeal the First Amendment, it cannot be done any other way, and I don't think we really want to go there. Do you?

Does a big bank account mean you don't deserve privacy?

It seems that for better or worse, Tiger Woods is still one of the most famous athletes in the world. Unfortunately for him, however, it's not his long drive or clutch putting that's making headlines. Well, it's not his clutch putting, anyway.

Dave Coffey

Recently, Woods has been under a high amount of media scrutiny regarding alleged affairs he's had in the recent past with up to seven different women. Obviously, this has raised more than a few questions, such as, "Why might someone who's married to a blonde Swedish supermodel want to have an affair?" and, "Seven?!"

But there's a couple questions regarding the Woods situation that I keep asking myself, one of them being, "Should I care?" Of course, this situation is like many others where the issue of media scrutiny into celebrities' lives comes into question. How much attention should ultimately be given to the personal lives of famous people, especially regarding some of the more seedy details?

The first thing that pops into my mind is that people, even famous people, deserve some privacy concerning their private lives. And really, that's all fine and dandy when we're talking about your average celebrity. But then I stopped and thought for a moment about the far-reaching fame a figure like Tiger Woods has. Sometimes it's easy to forget the potential exposure he has to a wide range of people.

Never mind that he's the number one-ranked golfer in the world, one of the most famous figures in modern professional sports and the highest paid athlete of all time (with an estimated net worth of $600 million).

His huge exposure comes from the fact that he's not only known as one of the most talented athletes of all time, but also one of the most marketable.

Everything from TAG Heuer watches to the Tiger Woods PGA Tour video game series sport Tiger Woods' larger-than-life namesake and likeness. He has written as a columnist in Golf Digest magazine since 1997, designed his own golf courses and established several charitable and youth-oriented projects. He was inducted into the California Hall of Fame as well as The California Museum for History, Women and the Arts. On top of all this, he also spoke at President Obama's inaugural address.

What does this long and winding resume say about Woods? Besides demonstrating his ambition, it shows that whether you realize it or not, Tiger Woods reaches the eyes and ears of millions of consumers every day. Whether you drink his special brand of Gatorade or purchase his endorsed Nike gear, Tiger Woods certainly means at least something to a lot of people.

But does even a monstrous amount of fame and influence permit such scrutiny into a celebrity's life as has been witnessed over the past couple of weeks?

But does even a monstrous amount of fame and influence permit such scrutiny into a celebrity's life as has been witnessed over the past couple of weeks? The answer to me is no. My reasoning is that if it were anyone else with a more average amount of wealth and fame, this would simply not be news. While some might call his alleged "transgressions," among other things morally questionable he has not been accused of doing anything illegal or somehow involving his professional life with said transgressions. Like it or not, zooming in on Woods' life during some rather trying family times is, in a way, discriminatory. By that I mean that in this situation, the attention isn't regarding what the person allegedly did; it's regarding the status of the person in question. You have to admit this much press would almost certainly not be given to a non-celebrity for the same actions.

Of course some people would say that when one has that much money and fame, it somewhat makes up for the fact that your private life will indeed be scrutinized for millions of media consumers to see. But, and I hate to be that slippery-slope-where-is-the-line-exactly kind of guy, that leaves a few gray areas concerning what you can do in your private life depending on how much money and fame you have. How much money must one acquire before their private lives can be put under a magnifying glass? Apparently Woods is wealthy enough to intrude into his private life, but what about someone with half the net worth, or perhaps half of that? Can someone with only $900,000 in the bank engage in affairs without worrying about media scrutiny, but a millionaire would be refused the same privilege?

One should also remember that Woods has technically only admitted, "transgressions" in a public statement, and not explicitly stated any extramarital involvement with any of the seven women in question. But even if he did, it's technically none of our business. Even if he makes a million dollars a day, his private life is still his private life and more importantly, not news.

Bringing a musical legend to new generation

The King of Rock 'n' Roll plays guitar during a concert in Texas early in his career. Today's release of "Elvis 75: Good Rockin' Tonight" pays homage to the swooner, who would have turned 75 years old next month.

By Mark Schiffer
Collegian Staff

On Aug. 17, 1977, a very sad and confused southern boy was found dead in his hotel room. Whether believed to be the result of too many prescription pills, or simply the stresses related to touring, it was a loss that had a powerful cultural impact worldwide.

It was at this point when the myth of Elvis became completely cut-off from his actual music, as well as when his then-kitschy image prevented his music from having seemingly any relevance at all. Elvis is currently associated with screechy blue-haired queens in Memphis, placing wreaths on his grave while talking about how they saw him last night in their hotel rooms. Hopefully, with today's release of "Elvis 75: Good Rockin' Tonight," all this will change.

What is being sold is the entire basis for the Elvis legend, which may be viewed for the first time for the majority of this generation. We've seen the idea behind Elvis deconstructed, discussed and evaluated in film, literature and even the plethora of impersonators he has inspired. However, many people of a younger age spectrum have up until recently viewed him, and consequently his music, as dated relics of yesteryear. The release of this box set may transform all that.

For most, the music contained on "Elvis 75: Good Rockin' Tonight" needs no introduction. The early years are always going to be remembered as the peak, and the later over-orchestrated pop covers are probably going to be dismissed. The key is to listen for the never-changing persona. The King of Rock 'n' Roll never stopped being the nice southern kid who played "Love Me Tender" on an acoustic guitar. He didn't know anything of social change, yet when the record producers put him in the studio to sing "In the Ghetto," he put his heart and soul into it. While this song certainly isn't ever going to be remembered as a high point in the career of Elvis, it carries its own kind of desperate charm.

For that matter, so does much of the later material contained in this box set. Listeners can hear him lost in a studio filled with female backup singers and endless orchestras, unsure of where exactly he fits in. This is especially noticeable on his late-in-life rendition of "Unchained Melody." The cascading pianos and angelic choirs threaten to overwhelm, but through it all we can hear the last gasps of life from the last days of a legend.

We can hear the promise in the early recordings, and see it fade as time goes by. The box set follows a coherent chronological progression, and, along with the accompanying essay by Grammy-winning music writer Billy Altman, we are given the full tale of Elvis' personal life and musical career. The essay reads as a breathless account from a fan that knows every Elvis tale, and has read every biography. It is a valuable part of this wonderful set.

Certainly, the voice comes across as maudlin today, but at no point does it feel that it could be portrayed any other way. Every song was Elvis being Elvis, he knew no other existence. Sometimes he was jubilant, sometimes he was melancholy and sometimes he was hateful.

But at all times, he was Elvis.

Top 10 cinematic sensations seen on big screen this year

By Nora Drapalski and Garth Brody
Collegian Staff

Charged with the task of sifting through the plotless horror tales and cringing chick flicks, we have unearthed the top 10 best movies of 2009 from beneath the piles of ...bad stuff. Imagery and originality battled it out, narrowing it down to these few gems.

10. "Bright Star" Although this extremely low-budget indie film (rumored to cost under $9 million to produce) managed to slip under the radar for most Americans. "Bright Star" was the most visually spectacular film introduced to the states this year. Cinematographer Greig Fraser, costume director Janet Patterson and director Jane Campion combined their efforts to create a series of breathtaking shots that are worthy of praise in composition alone. This tragic romance of the life of poet John Keats is so true to reality that the story seemingly lacks originality. But the beauty of the film itself is the reason why "Bright Star" squeezes onto the list at number 10.

9. "Ponyo" Disney-distributed and Studio Ghibli-produced, "Ponyo" continues the tradition of filmmaker Hayao Miyazaki weaving morals and values into a delightfully entertaining animated motion picture. The all-star ensemble cast, including Tina Fey, Liam Neeson and Matt Damon, brought this Japanese tale to life by lending their voices to the "Little Mermaid"-inspired characters. While the English dub lacks the societal relevance the original version has, "Ponyo" is still one of the best international films brought to America this year.

8. "Adam" Quirky, dark and romantic – is there a better combination for a romantic comedy? Writer and director Max Mayer certainly doesn't think so, as he displays in "Adam," the story of a man who finds himself alone for the first time in his life after the death of his father and sole caregiver. Hugh Dancy's portrayal of a man with Asperger's Syndrome does not make light of the disorder; rather, his depth and devotion to the character clears the mist of misunderstanding that surrounds the syndrome. The beautiful dialogue Mayer penned provides plenty of awkward situations between the socially inept Adam (Dancy) and Beth (Rose Byrne) that are so adorable that "Adam" justly finds itself as my number-one pick for romantic comedy, and number eight on this list.

7. "The Hangover" The trailers for this movie gave the impression that its level of humor would be somewhere between adolescent and infantile, and that its only saving grace might be the subversive genius of Zach Galifianakis. But the film's humor works brilliantly, as it happens. The comedic chemistry between the aforementioned Galifianakis, Bradley Cooper and Ed Helms not only delivered all the belly laughs appropriate for a big summer comedy, but veered toward the absurd and distasteful more often than one might expect. The writing was so sharp just on the ground level that the layer of satire coating the whole thing seemed almost superfluous.

6. "District 9" A low-budget, Peter Jackson-approved independent film plucked straight from its filming in South Africa and graciously deposited in the open hands of movie fans across the country, "District 9" confronts racial prejudice through an unusual twist on the sci-fi conflict between humans and aliens. Unlike most alien invasion movies, the "Prawns" have already been living on Earth for a long period of time before the plot of the movie even begins. The conflict between the two species serves as a barely concealed metaphor of the South African apartheid, emphasized by the choice of filming location and Director Neill Blomkamp's own childhood experiences. Humorous, depressing, overly violent, stunningly realistic for a fantasy film and not a star in sight (except for producer Peter Jackson), "District 9" redefined what blockbusters are made of.

5. "Star Trek" Doesn't it make you feel warm inside when a big-budget summer flick like this gets universal acclaim and Oscar buzz? Almost disgustingly entertaining from start to finish, "Star Trek" satiated long-time fans with canonical rigor and plenty of subtle nods, delighted fresh audiences with a wonderfully self-contained story that was light on exposition and melted the icy hearts of film critics everywhere with unpretentious, undeniable, stand-up-and-applaud fun. J.J. Abrams was already a household name after the successes of "Lost" and "Cloverfield," but he has guaranteed his spot in the sci-fi hall of fame with this one. Plus, Leonard Nimoy was in it.

4. "Inglourious Basterds" Quentin Tarantino reminded us this summer that he really likes feet, blood and spaghetti westerns. And we loved every minute of it. Even if the titular band of brutal Jews deserved a bit more screen time, the other plot-line (the one nobody knew about until they saw the movie) gave us a pair of Oscar-worthy performances from Melanie Laurent and Christoph Waltz. The latter, in particular, made quite an impact as Nazi Colonel Hans Landa, the "Jew Hunter." The violence was senseless, the emotion curiously genuine and Tarantino's style as engaging as ever. The opening and climactic sequences may be the most perfect things he has ever made.

3. "Up" When Pixar announced that its next hero would be a balloon-wielding old man, audiences were skeptical, but they held hope that the studio would release yet another hit. In true fashion, Pixar delivered. A comedy with an intelligent plot and heart-wrenching drive, "Up" entertained children and adults alike. It allowed the audience to derive their own meanings from the story, offering something truly different for everyone.

2. "A Serious Man" The Coen brothers' black comedy takes all the dread and alienation from "No Country for Old Men" and transplants it into a 1967 Midwestern suburb, and this time there are no silenced shotguns. Larry Gopnik, played with surprising sympathy by Michael Stuhlbarg, is a Jewish college physics professor, and bad things happen to him. The neurotic bleakness is artfully crafted, with cinematography by Roger Deakins providing a constant visual sense of suburban doom. This is the most subtly unnerving film yet by Joel and Ethan Coen, and also one of their funniest. For a movie that should be difficult to watch with all the protagonist's tribulations, there is consistent humor in the underlying nonsense of the conflict.

1. "The Hurt Locker" Cheating death is not something most people would voluntarily subject themselves to everyday of their life. However, Staff Sergeant William James, played by Jeremy Renner, does just this as he diffuses bombs for the U.S. Military in Iraq. In a performance generating Oscar buzz already, Renner takes on the role of a soldier in the dirty, gritty war-torn country of Iraq, with an unexpected intensity coming from the former "28 Weeks Later" star. Through careful editing and a well-developed narrative, suspense and drama thrust "The Hurt Locker" into the category of unforgettable and powerful films that can only be placed in the number-one slot.

And while they didn't make it in time to be on this Top 10 list, "Nine," "The Lovely Bones," "Invictus" and "The Road" promise to be on the must-see list in the upcoming months.

The year's biggest box office flops: worst movies of 2009

While their on-screen chemistry shined, Jack Black and Michael Cera were cursed with a sub-par script, landing "Year One" at the bottom of the barrel of this year's movies.

By Shayna Murphy
Collegian Staff

No best-of-the-year film list would be complete without a glimpse at the films that made audience-goers cringe in 2009. From harebrained comedies to ambitious prestige pieces that just fell short of the mark, the following is a list of films that failed to scintillate at the Cineplex.

5. "Year One" Michael Cera, with the puppy-dog looks and anxious delivery, seems like the ideal straight man to counter Jack Black's increasingly frenetic on-screen antics. Paired in a comedy that promised to take the two on a quest across the annals of human history, Cera and Black didn't disappoint with their chemistry. Rather, the blame for this mammoth failure rests on the shoulders of a director who ought to have known better. As the driving force behind "Groundhog Day" and 1981's "Stripes," Harold Ramis should have taken a quick glance at this puerile screenplay rife with awkward scat and sodomy jokes – and kept on walking. Instead he stuck around; it may be the only joke in "Year One" that sticks.

4. "Whatever Works" Larry David inhabits the neurotic, hyper-intellectual New Yorker stereotype originated by Woody Allen back in the 1970s. While David's acerbic wit has served him well in other ventures, including a 9-year stint on "Seinfeld" and his current show "Curb Your Enthusiasm," he is overkill in the role of the already bitter and curmudgeonly Boris Yelnikoff. Get ready to squirm as David turns suitor to then 21-year-old Evan Rachel Wood, a young talent trying to make due with a character whose limitations – she's a runaway who speaks with a Southern twang and dons her fair share of scrunchies – are painfully obvious. For his part, Allen, whose script for "Whatever Works" is over 30 years old, seems like he might still be jet-lagged from his recent European vacation (see "Match Point" and "Vicky Cristina Barcelona").

3. "Observe and Report" Creepiness, thy name is watching Seth Rogen date rape a barely conscious Anna Faris for gags. No, let's amend that. Creepiness, thy name is watching an amply endowed (just not in the right areas) Randy Gambell jaunt across a shopping mall and assail unsuspecting ladies with the sight of his manly bits flapping, like a flag at half-mast in the wind. While Rogen's mall cop was debased before the film's trailer even made it into regular rotation due to it's similarity to another mall cop movie, the issue with "Observe and Report" is not that it followed too closely on the heels of the much more successful (though equally mediocre) "Paul Blart: Mall Cop." Rather, Rogen's film lacked the jocular goodwill that pervaded "Paul Blart." Viewers were left with a disturbing look of a semi-demented wannabe cop teetering on the brink of psychosis as he struggles to gain respectability in his chosen profession.

2. "X-Men Origins: Wolverine" I enjoy fan fiction just as much as the next geek. But this, the work of director Gavin Hood, errs on the side of just plain ludicrous. Still sweating up the ladies, Hugh Jackman returns as the titular hero for another bout of mutant walloping in "X-Men Origins: Wolverine." While Wolverine's creation into an adamantium-filled powerhouse is well-known, "Origins" goes further back in his history. Try antebellum-era history, which binds the future Wolverine with a half-brother, the villainous Sabretooth (played by Liev Schreiber). Before Weapon X transforms the boys into their famous alter-egos, their mutant power appears to be immortality, as a quick montage early in the film reveals they've fought in almost every notable American war (forget the fact that the boys are supposed to be from Canada), starting with the Civil War. I suppose any explanation for those perennial muttonchops of Wolverine's will suffice.

1. "Precious" Sixteen-year-old Clareece Precious Jones (newcomer Gabourney Sidibe) is poor, illiterate and by the time director Lee Daniels finds her, about to give birth to her second child. But Jones, who in a twist of sad irony prefers to be called Precious, doesn't have any boyfriends to speak of, boiled up every night along with the pig's feet and collard greens her mother (Mo'Nique) cruelly demands are visions of the abuse she's suffered since childhood at the hands of her sweaty, shadow-figure father. "Precious," based on the bleak novel "Push" by Sapphire, has all the horrors of Sapphire's original work but lacks much of its soul and nuance. Blame Daniels and screenwriter Geoffrey Fletcher, who intrude upon the natural dark flow of the story with fantastical montages and a noxious soundtrack of inappropriately chipper soul tunes. And while Mo'Nique delivers a tour-de-force as Precious' bellowing mother, the sharp nuances of her performance are dulled by the heavy hand of a director who seems confused about whether he's directing a glossy music video or straight-up drama. The answer, of course, is the latter, but far be it from Daniels to realize there's a big difference.

Minutewomen to face size issues down low ors for their performances over the weekend. Danella ended the weekend with 29 points and 13 rebounds.

UMass is off to a 5-4 start this season and will look to build momentum off of two consecutive wins. UVM however, is now also coming off of back-to-back victories.

Vermont is playing very good basketball, and Providence is playing very good basketball as well," Dacko said of this week's schedule. "We're happy to come back to the Mullins Center and hopefully we'll get a great crowd."

Last year, the Catamounts won the America East Tournament and consequently advanced to the NCAA Tournament. On a bigger stage, UVM did not have as much luck, as they lost to Connecticut in the first round, 104-65.

The Catamounts also went up against UConn this year but lost, 84-42, on Dec. 3. In that game, Pilypaitis led UVM with 20 points.

Last year, the Minutewomen went to Vermont for the season opener and lost, 83-69. In the victory over UMass, UVM's Pilypaitis recorded a double-double with 26 points and 10 rebounds.

UMass will have to battle underneath the hoop for rebounds against the Catamounts' tall lineup. Four out of the five starters for UVM are listed at six feet or taller.

Although Dacko continues to preach rebounding to her team, the Minutewomen were out-rebounded in both games of the Brown Bear Classic, but survived thanks to points off of the bench. UMass has 43 points from non-starters in the win against Brown, and 38 points from non-starters in the championship game against Quinnipiac.

"These kids are coming together," Dacko said of her team's effort so far. "We're still a work in progress but I'm really proud of them."

Long range threats include Benton, Mosgrove, Teuscher

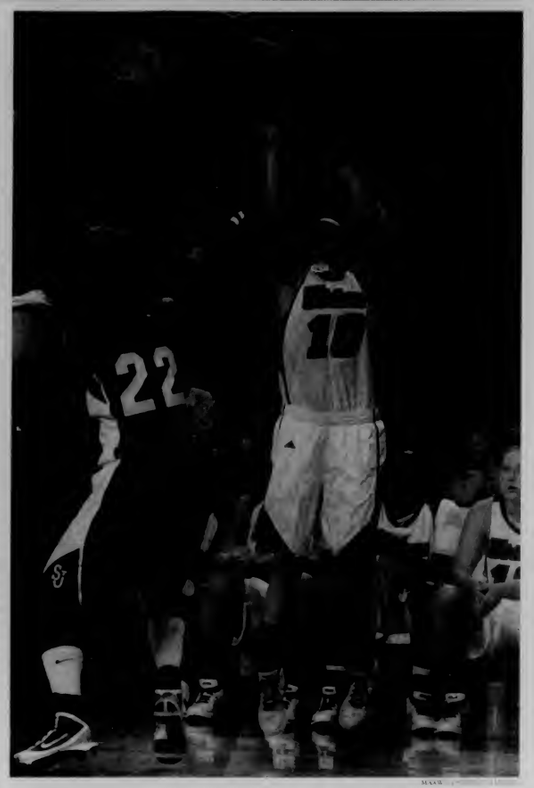
Kristina Danella also provides a consistent threat from 3-point range. The guard trails Zullo with 18 3-pointers on the season, with several of those shots coming at critical times. Because Danella's shooting ability is honored by other teams, she forces opponents to play her extremely tight in the closing minutes of games.

In the season opener, Boston University fouled Danella at the top of the arc with 17 seconds remaining. Danella then converted all three free-throws, sending the game into overtime en route to a UMass victory. She then struck again against Brown last Saturday, hitting consecutive 3's to ignite an 18-5 run for UMass, which ultimately put their lead out of reach.

However, the UMass long-range attack still commands attention even when either Zullo or Danella is out of the lineup. Senior Kim Benton, junior Cerne Mosgrove and sophomore Emily Teuscher have all proven to be threats from deep.

Benton's struggles early on have overshadowed her strong shooting ability. The guard is fourth all time at UMass with 102 3-pointers, including 50 in her freshman season. She can both find and provide an open target, but is shooting 19 percent from beyond the arc this season.



Like Benton, Mosgrove cannot find her touch. In nine games this season, she converted 11-of-40 3-point attempts. As a sophomore she proved that she can knock down long-range shots, shooting 35 percent from deep in 30 games.

Teuscher recently proved that she is also a threat on the perimeter. In the best performance of her young career, the Miamisburg, Ohio, native scored nine points on perfect shooting on three shots from long range against Brown.

However, Dacko feels that not all credit should go to the shooters and ball handlers. She credits the team's recent improvements down low with some of the improvements on the perimeter. Freshmen Shakia Robinson and Jasmine Watson and sophomore Nicole Jones improved their post play in recent weeks. All of them can draw defenders in the paint, while scanning the perimeter and dishing the ball out when the time is right.

"I think the best offense is an entry pass into the post, because then the perimeter players can relocate," Dacko said. "The post players have been doing an excellent job of [finding players on the perimeter]."

Mike Mastone can be reached at mmastone@student.umass.edu.

Redshirt junior Megan Zullo takes a 3-point shot during UMass' 80-point loss to St. John's. The guard is shooting 42.2 percent from 3-point range as the Minutewomen's second-best shooter.

Calipari bringing wins to Kentucky

By Chris Shores
Collegian Staff

John Calipari is bringing Kentucky back to its winning ways quickly in his first year as head coach. The former Memphis coach led the Wildcats to an 8-0 start and a No. 4 ranking in the Associated Press Top 25 Poll.

Kentucky solidified themselves as contenders with their 68-66 win against North Carolina last week. But the challenges will continue to come for the Wildcats in the coming weeks. Calipari and his team will take on 14th-ranked Connecticut at Madison Square Garden tonight. They will then travel to Indiana to take on the Hoosiers, who have only lost once at home this season.

Freshman guard John Wall earned Southeastern Conference Player of the Week for the third time last week after averaging 18.1 points, 4.1 rebounds, 7.7 assists and 2.6 steals per game. The only time this season that another player won the honor was when fellow Kentucky freshman guard Eric Bledsoe did in the first week of the season.

Red Raiders debut in Top 25

Texas Tech earned votes for 23rd in the AP Top 25 Poll after an undefeated start. The Red Raiders (8-0) won a spot in the poll for the first time since 2005, thanks to an overtime victory against Washington.

On Dec. 3, Texas Tech defeated the then-12th ranked Huskies, 99-92. Forward Mike Singletary (13.9 points per game) hit a 3-point shot at the end of regulation.

Red Raiders fans, thinking the game over, swarmed the court, only to be told that the shot had not counted because time had expired. Texas Tech eventually won it decisively in the overtime period.

Junior John Roberson played a key role in the victory with 25 points, two rebounds, seven assists and two steals in the win. On Monday, Roberson earned the Big 12 Player of the Week.

The Red Raiders also took on Texas Christian University last night. Entering the game, the Horned Frogs were 5-3, with three of their victories coming at their home court in Fort Worth.

Following the matchup against TCU, Texas Tech does not play again until Dec. 19 at Wichita State.

Tar Heels survive weekend

Last week, defending champion North Carolina had the difficult task of taking on two top-10 teams in a span of five days. The Tar Heels split their games against Michigan State and Kentucky, but fell one spot in the ranking this week, from 10th to 11th.

On Dec. 1, North Carolina (7-2) once again defeated Michigan State, 89-82, in a rematch of last year's championship matchup. The Tar Heels jumped out early and took a 50-34 lead into halftime.

But the Spartans closed the gap in the second half and narrowed the lead to six points several times in the final minutes. Forward Ed Davis and guard Larry Drew II, both sophomores, each had career highs for points in the win.

The Tar Heels' next matchup did not have a similar outcome as they lost a road game to undefeated Kentucky, 68-66. In a reversal of their previous game, the Tar Heels found themselves down by double digits at halftime and had to play catch-up in the second half. Wildcat freshman John Wall hit two key free-throws with 4.3 seconds left in the game to seal the win for Kentucky.

North Carolina will take on Presbyterian at home on Dec. 12 but then will have to prepare for undefeated Texas on Dec. 19.

Maine sweep Friars with weekend sweep

By Herb Scribner
Collegian Staff

For Maine's hockey team, things could not have gone better this past weekend in the Hockey East. The Black Bears completed a two-game sweep over Providence with 3-1 wins.

A big difference in this game came from goalie Scott Darling, who earned Pure Hockey Co-Defensive Player of the Week honors. Darling stopped 47 shots during both games against the Friars (7-7-1, 2-5-1 HEA), which came to a total .959 stop percentage.

Across the ice at the other net, Providence's goaltender Alex Beaudry also had a stellar performance in both games (60 saves total).

Besides Darling, the Black Bears (8-7-1, 6-4-1 HEA) had forward Gustav Nyquist, who was successful on the offensive front. Nyquist scored two goals on Friday night, including the game-winning goal.

Friday night's game was scoreless through the first period of play, with the first score coming in the second period by Providence. The Friars' lead broke 14 seconds later, as Nyquist knocked in his first goal of the evening. His second goal came midway through the same period, giving Maine a lead that it never gave up.

Maine is the first team in the Hockey East to sweep the same opponent in a two-game series this year.

Vallorani POW for UML

David Vallorani earned Player of the Week honors after a stunning performance this past weekend, leading UMass Lowell to a 5-3 win over No. 15 Massachusetts.

Vallorani had three goals in the game against the Minutemen (9-5-0, 5-4-0 HEA). His first came 10 minutes into the second period, when the River Hawks (9-5-1, 5-4-1 Hockey East) were down by a goal.

After both teams earned another score, Vallorani rekindled the scoring flame as he netted a goal with less than seven minutes left in the third period. Though he gave Lowell the winning edge with his second goal, Vallorani scored another goal with three minutes left to put away the Minutemen.

Over the course of the season, Vallorani has seven goals and seven assists. Four of his goals came from Hockey East games specifically, as did six of his assists.

His goal-scoring ways led him to the top of the River Hawks' leading goal-scorer list, and is tied with forwards Kory Falitz and Paul Worthington (each with seven goals apiece).

Merrimack splits weekend

Merrimack split its two-game series this weekend against Northeastern, with the victory coming on the home ice of the Warriors, improving their home record to 7-1-0.

Merrimack (7-7-0, 4-5-0 HEA) took the first game with a final score of 3-1, which included a heavy offensive effort from Justin Bonitatibus, who had an assist and a goal during the game.

While freshman John Hefferan scored his first career goal to give the Warriors the initial lead, it was Bonitatibus who gave Merrimack the edge after Northeastern knotted the game up.

Bonitatibus one-timed a pass from freshman Stephane Da Costa, scoring his third goal in as many games. The goal was not the only weapon that Bonitatibus had in mind for the Huskies (6-7-1, 4-6-1 HEA), as he, along with senior Pat Bowen, passed the puck to sophomore Elliot Sheen, who netted his fifth goal of the year.

The offensive effort displayed by Bonitatibus and fellow teammates was enough to earn the Warriors a win on the home ice, though the same could not be said the following night.

Looking for revenge, Northeastern goaltender Bryan Mountain stopped 26 shots by the Warriors, leading to its 2-1 victory.

The Huskies took the first lead, off a defensive lapse from Merrimack. However, the Warriors came right back to knot the game up.

A little over a quarter through the third period, the Huskies earned the victory off a shot from freshman Garrett Vermeersch.

Though coming out of the second game with the victory, Northeastern was outshot, 25-17, throughout the contest.

Hockey East

Maine swept Providence in two 3-1 games this past weekend. Goalie Scott Darling played a major role in the win with 47 saves.
